that he is come vpo thee as a cruel liō that hath torne thee in peeces. Thou canst alledge no such thing: and therefore thou mayst wel seeke to thy good God, & returne vnto him: & seing he sheweth himself so kindharted and pitiful towards thee, he wil still be thy father & preseruer. Ye see thē how this cōpāisō ought to serue our turne, & that it behoueth vs to maister our affectiōs when we feele to much hart burning and repining in our selues, & that we be tēpted to stomaking & rebeking against God. It behoueth vs I say to think vpon the things that are set dōwne here. And Iob aledgeth again vnto God, that he is a poore fraile man and nere vnto death, and that therefore it is a maruell why God shuld persecute him so roughly. I know (sayth he) that thou wilt send me to the graue too the house that belongeth vnto all that liue. Seing that the state of all men is such as thou hast set thē here to make them passe away as it were in a moment: why shouldst thou try thy self and vter thy force vpon them and against them? Lo what Iobs meening is: we haue herd the like sentences hertofore, and it is not without cause that they be repeated here. For vndoubtedly God wil haue vs to pray vnto him and setteth the infirmities of our frayle state before him, to moue him to take vs to mercy, and to ease vs: as when it is sayd in the Psalme, that the Lord knoweth how we be but dust, and that whē we haue passēd through this world, we must be faine to come to rottēnesse. And seing we knowe that God spareth vs and pitieth our miseries, ought not that promis to moue vs to pray vnto him after that sort. And again in another text it is said, that god forgiveth mēs sinnes bycause he seeth they are but a shadow that passeth and vanisheth away. Therefore when we pray God to deliuer vs from our miseries, let vs learne how we ought to alledge that we ourselues are nothing, and that although we haue life, yet we die in the turning of a hād: infomuch that euē in our cheef floure & flourishing time, we be likened vnto grasse which is greene to day and cut downe to morowe, so as it withereth and drieth without moysture or substance. The alledging of these things vnto God wil make him pitiful towards vs to deliuer vs from our miseries. Not that he hath neede to be put in mind: for he knoweth our infirmities better thā we ourselues, and therefore needeth not to be aduertised of it. But like as our praying to him is for our ownselues: so likewise al the requests and reasons which we alledge in our prayers, are to our own vse & profit. I hē if a mā alledge vnto God, that he is a poore fraile creature: he beholdeth himself in himself, & teacheth himself lowlinesse. If we think not vpon our state, we shal alwayes be puffed vp with pride, or else we shal not be disposed as we ought to be to obtaine mercie. But if our Lord bring vs once to that point that we be ouerthrowen in our selues: then shall we be the better disposed to seke his ayde, yea and that with greater earnestnesse and desire.

And furthermore our Lord also receiueth and accepeth the seruice which he demaundeth aboue all thing, that is too wit, the seruice of a broken and lowly hart, as it is sayd in the Psalme. Ye see then that the alledging of our frayltie vnto God, and that we be but dust and rottēnesse, yea and that we be nought and worse than nought, must bee to induce him to take vs too mercy: but let vs marke also, that there must be no repining mingled with it, nor any such complaints as we may haue any grudging or hartburning: as surely Iob had not so good stay of himself here, as he ought to haue had. For to what purpose sayth he, I knowe I must go to the graue, euē to the howse of all liuing creatures? no doubt but he sheweth heere excessse of the passion, wherewith he was tempted: not that he was ouercome of it, but yet he felt such rebelling in himself, as he yelded not so peaceably to Gods wil, as he ought to haue done: as if he should say: Thou tryest mee here, thou persecutest me, and who am I? must thou needes shew thyself so sharpe and rigorouse against a poore creature that is nothing? Then behoueth it vs to beware of such impacience as this. And herein wee see what the corruption of our nature is. For euen the best things in vs are alwayes mingled with some faultinesse, except God preserue vs by miracle. I sayd heretofore that it is a good and holye thing, that men which are smitten by Gods hand, shuld for the obteyning of mercy alledge their owne feblenesse, and shewe that their life is nothing, and that they haue not any strength in them, and that death threatneth them euery minute of an houre. This I say is a good and holye thing: and it serueth too humble vs, to the end wee may offer vnto God the sacrifice that pleaseth him so well. But yet notwithstanding we turne this thing to euill, according as wee see in this present example. If a man say vnto God, Lord who am I? Thou knowest I am but a shadowe that passeth and vanisheth away, and all my strength is but a smoke: if a man (I say) speake so, and therewithall frette and repyne bycause he thinketh it straunge that God should chastize him: No doubt but the same is a wicked and cursed passion, and yet (as I haue told you) this complaint is good and profitable. And so it is in dede: but men can not withhold themselues from mingling some excessse alwayes with it, and from peruerting the thing that is good. And so there is such an vngratioufnesse in our nature, as we corrupt the good, and turne it into euill. So much the more then behoueth it vs too stand alwayes vppon our gard, and to mistrust our selues, seing we be so wauering that we cannot followe right foorth the things that God cōmaundeth vs. Yet notwithstanding we must not therefore discomfort our selues: for our Lord will take vs in good worth, so we cōdēne the excessse in our selues. Truly we must not vse here any flatteries, nor make our selues beleue that vice is not vice. But we must condēne it, & whē we haue so don, no doubt but our lord receiueth vs. Here withal it behoueth vs to retorne to Iobs intēt. I go to my graue (saith he) & I know that none shall stretch his hād thither, or that God shall not stretch his hād thither. But the naturall sense is this: whē neuer so many men haue bewayled me, yet shall none of them stretch his hand thither to succour me: when death hath once caught me, there is no more remedie: all mans helpe booteth not. VVee see then that Iobs intent is to say, seing that death tarieth for vs and is allotted to vs: and when we be dead we are cleane dispatched and no man can succour vs: at least wile giue vs some truce whyle wee bee here. VVhy vtterest thou so greate rigour against vs? Thus ye see in effect what Iob ment too say. And I haue tolde you already, in what wise it may be lawfull for vs too vse this complaint: that is too witte, without murmuring or disputing. And by the way let vs marke, that to the intent wee list not vp our selues against God, ne stryue against the roddes wherwith he scourgeth vs in this extremitie: it behoueth vs to come to one other consideration: which is, that although we go forward vnto death, and haue alwayes one foote in the graue: yet we knowe that God hath stretched out his hand to deliuer vs thēce. For to what end came Iesus Christ into the world? Yea why went he downe into hell, that is to say, why suffered he the anguishes that were due to all wretched sinners, but to deliuer vs from them? So then if men cannot now conceyue good hope to be cōforted in death: it is al one as if they would denie that our Lord Iesus Christ hath suffered it in his person. For wheras the Sonne of God

god abaced himself so farre, as to be subiect to our curse, and to feele Gods hand against him: that was to the end to deliuer vs from death, and to assure vs that the victorie which he hath purchased, is for vs. Seing then that he hath power ouer death: let his resurrection always come before our eyes, and let vs assure our selues that God hath stretched out his strong and victorious hand, to deliuer vs from the bondage of Sathan. And therein let vs consider, that although we haue many aduersities to suffer in this mortall life, and that it please God to exercise vs: we must not think it straunge nor enter into the waylings and complaints which are made here, to say yea, what am I? when I haue passed through this world, I must go to the graue, and no man can rescue mee. But we shal be rescued wel ynough, if we haue Iesus Christ for our redeemer, who is ordeyned too be our pledge and warrant, & hath abolished the paynes of death, brokē the bāds of Sathan, and burst open the brasen gates, to set vs free. Seing we know this, let vs be pacient in the middes of al the aduersities of this world, assuring ourselues, that although we haue battels here bylowe, we haue a rest prepared for vs about in heauen: and if we fight manfully here, let vs assure our selues that we cannot but triumphe in heauen. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in mind, for the fencing and arming of ourselues against the temptations wherwith Iob was assaulted, and which he had somuch a do to withstand. Furthermore let vs marke well the thing that he addeth: which is, haue not I wept with him that was in aduersitie, and had hard and sharpe dayes or tymes: was not my soule sorrowful with the poore or afflicted? Now then I haue looked for good, and euill is happened vnto mee: I haue hoped for light, and behold here is darkenesse. Hereby Iob declareth, that he seeth not the reason why God dealeth so roughly with him, for asmuch as in his prosperitie he had not ben cruell but pitifull towards the poore and such as were in heauinesse, and that he had not ben drunken in his pleasures, but had alwayes considered what the miseries of mans life are, so as he wept with them that did wepe, and kept company with such as were tormented with aduersitie. Thus ye see what Iob alledgeth to shewe that: there is no reason why he should be so afflicted. And surely when God beateth vs with his roddes: commonly it is bycause he seeth that we canot beare our owne ease, and that our flesh groweth ouerlusty, or else we be cruell towards our neyghbours. Lo heere the twoo causes why God doeth ordinarily afflict vs. And we see also, that in the scripture he threatneth those that do so passe their bounds in their prosperitie: wo be to you (sayeth it) that laugh, for you shal wepe. And why? for men cannot forbear from ouerreaching themselues, when they be in rest, and things fall out as they would haue them: for the they forget themselues, and think they are exempted from all aduersities, and are as it were drunken folkes: like as a drunken man hath no stay of himself, but rusheth with his hornes as a wild beast: euen so fare the most parte of men when God handleth them gently: that is to say, they abuse his goodnesse, and sling out at ouers, and giue the brydle too their lustes. For hath a man meate and drinke, euen his fill: therevpon in feweth whoredome and shamefull wantōnesse, yea and blasphemies, outrages, and violences: and moieouer fond ielts & playes, and such other things, and (to be short) a man cannot hold himself in good modestie so long as he is at his ease. Ye see then that the cause why God afflicteth men, is for that he seeth it is for their behoof to be so corrected. Furthermore there is yet one other inconuenience. For they that haue the world at will, passe not for poore men that are in aduersitie, but despise them and set their feete in their neckes. VVee see that in this respect it was sayd in reproche of Sodom and Gomor: behold there was aboundaunce of breade, and therewithall pleasure & crueltie, so as they voutfaded not to succour such as were in neede. For somuch then as they that are at their ease, wil not intermedle themselues with the troubles and incumberances of their neyghbours, but hold themselues as it were in an earthly paradyse, and exempt themselues from the feeling of all their grees and aduersities: God must be faine to handle them roughly when their turne commes about: and for somuch as they haue had no pitie nor compasison of the miseries that they haue seene in their brethen: God must be faine to make them feeble by force anon after, that they be but men. They would discharge themselues of all worldly miseries: and God she-weth them perforce, that they must of necessitie knowe themselues to be such as they are. Ye see then that the doctrine which we haue to mark, is that Gods ordinarie afflicting of men, is eyther bycause they haue ben cruell in the time of their prosperitie, or bycause they haue made themselues drunken in their lawlesse pleasure. But herewithall let vs marke also, that God might iustly kepe vs occupied with aduersities, though the foresayd causes were not, and that he hath secret determinacions wherof we perceiue not the reason, like as it happened vnto Iob. And that is the cause why Iob complaineth. For it seemeth to him that God ought not too haue afflicted him after that maner, seing he had behaued himself so aduisedly: but rather he thinketh that God should haue spared him, seing he had be so fellowlike and freedly a mā, and be sad and sorie with such as were in aduersitie. But what for that? Heerby we see that we haue two things to beare away. The one is, that if our Lord make vs to prosper, so as we haue peace and rest, and all that is necessarie for vs, & we be exempted from all greef for a time: we must not be to delicate, nor to tender in shrinking away, frō shewing pitie and compasio towards such as are in aduersitie: but we must be touched with the grees of our neyghbours, to mourne with the and to releue the to our power, & at leastwise to pray vnto God for the, whē we cā help the by none other meanes. Thus the ye see the first doctrine that we haue to marke. And furthermore, let vs not fall a slepe in our pleasures, so as wee should not continually knowe that here is not any thing certain, nor be readie to suffer whensoever it shal please God. The first thing I say which we haue to beare in mind, is that we must not forget our selues whē God spareth vs. For what is the cause that prosperitie cōinueth not stil with vs? It is for that we abuse it, as I haue said already. And secondly, if God sed vs afflictions, let vs bethinke our selues wel, & examine whether we haue not bene sleepe in the time of our prosperitie. For hereby we be put in mind to know our faultes, & to condemn the before God, saying: Lord thou hast good cause to punish vs, & whie? For since the time that thou didst prosper vs by thy fauor, we haue forgotten thee, & layde the brydle in our neckes, and taken to much libertie. And therefore it is good reason that thou shouldest punish vs, and that we should feele the fruite of our sinne and vnrulynesse. Lo howe wee ought to call to mynde our former faultes, when God visiteth vs by any affliction: And specially howe wee ought to consider well, whether wee haue not bene vnmercifull towards such as deserued our succour. For if we haue made no account of others: it is good reason that oure Lorde shoulde handle vs roughly again, that we shuld lern to acknowledge our faults bi our Lords sharpnesse and rigor towards vs. Mark that for one point. But yet further, although we haue indured to help our neighbors, & haue had cōpasison of their miseries, &

Re. 12. c. 15. mourned with thē that mourne, as S. Paule exhorteth vs to do: yet notwithstanding let vs not cease alwayes to dispose our selues to the suffering of the corrections which it shal please God to send vs, yea euen though we knowe nor the cause why he doeth it. If we haue ben watchfull in the time of prosperitie, and not abused our ease: yet will not God misse to handle vs roughly now and then. If we aske why he doeth it: the reason wil not be manifest at the first: But he doeth it to humble vs: and so let vs alwayes acknowledge him to be rightuouse. And that is the cause why I sayd, that we ought to beare in mynd these two reasons distinctly: First, that we reméber the threatenings which are written in the holy scripture against such as are vnmerciful to their neyghbours, and play the beasts in their prosperitie: And secondly, that we consider, that although men behaue themselves myldly, soberly, and frendly: yet notwithstanding God ceaseth not to afflict them after an extraordinarie maner, as we see hath happened vnto Iob. VVhat is to be done thē? In steade of that he sayeth here, I haue wayed for light, and behold here is darknesse: I haue hoped for good, and behold here is euill: let vs looke for good according as God promisetith it. For (as S. Paule sayeth) the feare of God hath promyses, not only of the euerlasting life, but also of the present and transitorie life. So then let vs alwayes looke for welfare at Gods hād: but yet let vs not looke for it in such wise as we shuld not be readie to receiue aduersitie, whensoever it shal please him to send it vs. For whereas God promisetith vs to hādle vs gētly, & to vse fatherly & louing kindnes towards vs: it is but condicionally, so farre forth as is expediēt for our saluation. And why? For his temporall benefits are such, as it behoueth him to deale them forth and to distribute thē by measure. And what is the reason? It is the same that I haue ailleged already: namely, that it is an impossibilitie (or at leastwise a very hard matter) that men should not either abuse and corrupt Gods gifts, or bestow thē cleane contrarie to his meening. So then we may well hope that when God hath done vs good, he wil continue the same, yea and also incease it still: but wee must not also looke that we should not therewithall dispose ourselues wholly to receiue aduersitie, whensoever it shall please him too send it. VVhy so? we must not make rekening that wee haue an euerlasting state in our life without any chaūge. Let vs consider that as our life is frayle, so also it behoueth vs to be subiect to many chaunges, and that if wee haue prosperitie to day, God may disapoint vs of it to morow: and though we see not the reason why: yet he knoweth it, and let vs be contented with it. Ye see then after what sort the faythfull ought to looke for the temporall benefits of this world: that is, that when they inioy them, they must beleue fully that God will continue his dealing towards them as he hath done thitherto. Howbeit in looking for prosperitie, it behoueth them to prepare themselves to receiue aduersitie, in such sort as they may not be taken vnwares, nor think it strange if he bereue them of his benefits when he had handled them as gently as may bee for a time: I say they must not thinke it any nouelty if God turne his hand the contrarie way and smite them. Thus ye see that our looking for prosperitie

must be with continuall disposing of our selues to suffer aduersitie: yea and to suffer it patiently, too the end wee miscarrie not when it commeth vpo vs. And furthermore let vs in conclusion marke well what is sayd here concerning Iob. He complaineth that he was a companion of dragons, and a brother of Estridges: that is to say, as a wyld mā, so as he was no more of the number and company of other men, but God had so farre forsaken him, that he was become as a wild beast. And who is he that speaketh it? A man that liued in such holynesse and perfection, as he might rather haue ben compared with an Angell, than with a mortall creature, and yet for all that, we see how he was hādled. Here by we be warned to put our selues wholly into the hands of God, and not to cease to trust in him though he scourge vs roughly, & seeme minded to ouerwhelme vs vterly: But to put that thing in vre which we haue seene here before: namely, that though he should kill vs, yet we would hope still for his mercy, and fight against the battailes of death, and grounding ourselues vpo his promyses, hold our owne still and continue stedfast in the middest of all our aduersities. Lo what wee haue to marke. And furthermore if God scourge vs for our sinnes: we must be the lesse plunged in sorow by reason of those afflictions, and take them so much the more meekely and with a quiet mind, considering how we haue neede to be hādled so sharply, in respect of the diseases that are roted in vs. In the meane whyle, forasmuch as we cannot be mery but with offending of God: wee haue a threatening added here, that he wil baūge our harp into mourning, and our organs into voice of lamenting. VVe see how the world abusheth Gods benefits in these dayes. For if euery man looke into himself, wee shall see that if our Lord giue vs rest, by and by we starte out of our hinges (as the Prouerb saith: ) And againe, if we come to the common state, alas we see that the world is as farre out of order as may be: and (to be short,) it seemeth that men haue conspired to greue God, and the more that he sheweth himself louing and kind towards vs, it seemeth that wee become so much the bolder to prouoke him. Sith it is so, we may wel be affrayd that he wil turne both our harpes and our organes to weping wayling & sorow. For we are wel worthie of it. And good reason it is, that he should cast vs into heauinesse and anguistie, seing that we haue abused his benefits so shamefully. Yet notwithstanding if it please God to make vs feele his hand by afflictions, whither we know the cause of it: or no: let vs not therfore cease to flee vnto him, in hope that he wil receiue vs to mercy: yea verely if we condēne our faults, and that our condēning of thē be in such wise, as we assure and warrāt ourselues that he wil cōtinue his goodnes towards vs, & make vs alwayes to fele his grace, euen if he haue filled vs with it to the ful.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs so to feele them, as it may be to bring vs to trewe repentance, and that yet notwithstanding we may not cease to tast continually of his goodnesse towards vs, to put our trust therein, and to flee thervnto for our refuge in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ. And so let vs al say Almightie, &c.

I Haue made a covenent vwith myne eyes: And haue I looked vpon a mayd?

2. And vwhat is the portion of God from aboue, and the inheritance of the almightie of heaue?
3. Is there not a cutting off for the vnrightuouse, and confuzion for such as conspire (or practise) vickednesse?
4. Doeth not he behold my vwayes, doeth not he count all my Steppes?

Ye haue seene already heretofore howe Iob protested, that he was no such man as his friends, would haue made him beleue: for they were of opiniō that he was a reprobate afore God. Therefore he declared that he had liued holyly and vprightly: now he returneth againe to the same matter, and not without cause. For it was a grieuous temptation that men shoulde take him to be an hypocrite, notwithstanding that he had walked in vprightnesse of heart and playne meening before God. And furthermore he had had no regard of his owne reputatiō, nor what men thought of him: for God knew him. True it is that he ought not to haue thought it straunge that he should be afflicted of Gods hande, although he had liued as wee see here: but yet was it good that he knewe the ende and cause why God visited him so. But we shall see this more fully in the winding vp of the Chapter. Nowe let vs looke to that which is contained here: which is, that Iob intendeth to declare, that he hath serued God faithfully, and that his induring of so grieuous and excessiue miseries, is not for any offence that he had comitted, but for some other secreete reason knowne vnto God, which men can neyther know nor discern. First he giueth record of his soundnesse when he sayeth, that he made a couenaunt with his eyes not to caste any vnbast lookē vpon any mayde liuing. And it is a signe of great and as it were Angelicall perfection in man, if he be able to protest that he hath not bene prouoked vnto euil. For it may well be that a man shall haue some sodayne & fleeting temptation, and yet notwithstanding not consent therevnto, but rather shake it off and hate it. And truly it were a great vertue, if a man could haue all his witts so sound and vnattaynted of any corruption, as he could neuer be inticed. But Iob passeth beyond this. And for the better vnderstanding hereof, let vs marke that there are three degrees of faultinesse ere sinne haue his full shape: I meane, euen although the sinne come not to actuall doing. VVhen S. James speaketh of sinne, he vseth the similitude of childebearing. For he sayeth, that lust conceyueth, and afterward bringeth forth sinne, & that the sinne is accomplished when it commeth into the actuall deede by executing of the thing. But I say there are three degrees of faultinesse in a sinne although it come not to the outward deede. The firste is a fleeting imagination or thought which a man conceyueth by the beholding of any thing: for therevpon some one toy or other will come in his head. Or else although he see nothing, yet notwithstanding his minde is so tickle vnto euil, as it carrieth him here and there, and maketh many fancies to runne in his head. And out of doubt the same is a faultinesse, but yet is not that imputed vnto vs for sinne. The second degree is, that vpon the conceyuing of such a fancie we be somewhat tickled, and feele that our wil swayeth that way, and although there be no consent or agreeyng vnto it: yet notwithstanding there is some inward pricking to prouoke vs vnto it. Nowe that is a wicked sinne and as it were already conceyued: afterwarde followeth consent when wee settle our will vpon it, so as there is no let in vs for the performance of the euill, but the wante of occasiō and oportunitie: there yee see the third degree, and then is the sinne fully shapen in vs, although there be no outward deede at all. And this is well woorthy to be noted: For although it may seeme a harde matter, yet notwithstanding there is nother man nor woman but he findeth the thing that I speake of, and hath experience of it from day to day. As for example, when we be afflicted it will come in our imagination to thinke, doth God minde vs?

There is noman that can holde himselfe from such conceytes. For our nature is so corrupted and inclined vnto euill, as it is vnpossible that wee shoulde not haue such conceytes. And surely it is already a fault, when such a thing doth but come in their minde, notwithstanding that wee chace it away and thinke thus with our selues: how nowe? I like not of this: it is a blasphemie to thinke that God pitieth not such as call vpon him, or that he will not succour such as seeke him: it is all one as if we would denie that he gouerned the world. Therefore when soeuer such things come in our thought, surely it is a faulte, and it behoueth vs to conclude, alas Lord, wretched creatures are we and full of vanitie, sith wee can conceyue so monstrous thoughts. The second poynnt is, that when aduersitie presseth vs, and our grieffe increaceth more and more, wee fall to such murmurings as this: Alas, should I linger after this sorte if God thought vpon me? would he not haue a care to helpe mee? he doth it not, but dissembleth, and therefore it seemeth that he hath quite giuen me vp. VVhen we conceyue such thoughts, and debate with our selues whether God hath a care of vs or no: then it behoueth vs to consider what a one he hath declared himselfe to be towards vs, and to receyue his promises, and to ground our selues vpon them, to say, no, howsoeuer the worlde go, yet will I trust in my God, and flee to him for refuge. Howbeit although we finally attayne to this assurance and vndoubtednesse: yet notwithstanding if we wauer and doubt before we come therevnto, it is a greater faulte than the first, and we are already guiltye of mistrust and vnbelief before God, because we haue receyued so wicked a temptation. Lastly commeth the third degree, when we be vtterly ouerthrowne and know not what to say, but onely after this sort: See my miserie hath gotten the vpper hande, and God hath forflowed to long to reach me his hand: I see I am quite paste hope of recourie. VVhen we be so cast downe as we can nomore call vpon God, nor take tast of his promises to rest vpon them and to comfort our selues with them: that is the third degree of sinne. For like as when a childe is ful shapen in the Mothers wombe, there remaineth no more but that it should be borne, so in this case there wanteth no more but the comming of it into the outward deede. But now let vs come to Iobs woordes, I haue made a league (sayeth he) or couenaunt with myne eyes. I haue tolde you that this is a token of great perfection. And why? For if a man can withholde his sight, so as he conceyue not any thing that might drawe him vnto euill by looking aboute him, and shewe that there is true charitie and honesty in him: It must needes be sayd that he is cleere as an Angell from all corruption. And Iobs protesting hereof is not in vayne: wherefore lette vs consider that he liued in this worlde as an Angell of God. True it is that of nature he was not so: and also whereas he sayth that he made a couenaunt: that was done after he had so profited in the feare of God, as hee had thrust his vnruely lustes vnder foote, and so ouermastered his affections, as he was able to bridle them and keepe them vnder to say, I will not lust any euill to couet it or wishe it, I will haue no vayne in me that shall tende to the displeasure of God, but I will bridle my selfe both in myne eyes, and in my mouth, and in mine eares. Thus ye see in what wise Iob made his couenaunt. It was not by hauing such a soundnesse in his nature: for he was a man subiect to affections as we be: and no doubt but he had many temptations in his life. Howbeit he walked in such wise, as he was so inured with the feare of God, as not to admit any wicked lustes. Then was it become an habite (as menne terme it) that is too say, he was so inured vnto it, as he was no more wauering to starte out on the one side or the other, or to prouoke himself to this or that: To be short, we see here how Job met to declare, that he not only indeuered, to serue God: but also had inforced himself in such wise to it, as he had tamed and subdued all the affections of his flesh: inso-much that it was nomore payne to him to serue God, because he had not the battayles which we haue in vs by reason of our fraytie, yea & by reason of the corruptiō that is in our nature. But let vs marke that this came not of his owne power, neither could he of himself haue purchased such perfectiō: but it behoued god to reforme him in such wise by his holy spirit, as he was after a sorte separated frō the cōmon range of men. For it is not without cause that Dauid maketh this request vnto God: Lord turne away mine eies that they may see no vanitie. If Job had of himself had the things which he protesteth here: no doubt but Dauid might haue obtained such a stedfastnesse as well as he, so as he should not haue cōceyued any vanitie, nor had his eyes misseled & caried away by any meanes. But forasmuch as Dauid cōfesseth that he neither had it nor could obtayne it but by the meere grace of God: it followeth therefore that Job could not thorough his owne free will, make such a couenant as to say, that reason beareth such sway in him as he could ouermaster all his affections: but he meeneth here to yeeld God the prayse of that benefit. Then doth he not vaunt and magnitie himself, as though he had purchaced such a grace by his own trauell: but he acknowledgeth that god had so gouerned him, as his eyesight did not prouoke him any more vnto euill. Furthermore when Job speaketh so, let vs marke that on the other side he doth vs to vnderstand, that if a man behold a wife or a mayde, and thereby be tempted vnto euill: it is sinne already before God, yea although there be no outwarde acte, nor any putting forth of a mans selfe to deslowre or to beguile the woman, nor any will at all to consent in a mans self to wish it. Then although a man haue not that intent with him, but resist the sayd temptation wherwith he is prouoked: yet notwithstanding he fayleth not to offend God. And there is not a poynt better worthy to be marked than this. Verely wee heare the sentence which our Lord Iesus Christ giueth vpon it: namely that wee must not thinke our selues to be cleere & discharged before God, by absteyning frō whoredome in respect of the body: but that if a man do but looke vpo a woman with an vnchast looke, he is already condemned for a whoremonger before God. And moreouer (as I haue sayd already) although our will consent not vnto it, yet muste wee confesse that we haue done amisse before God, so that we must humble our selues. The Papiests can wel ynough say, that if a man consent vnto euill (that is to say, if he lust after it in such wise as he would fayne do it if occasion serued) they graunt that such a consent is a damnable sinne. But if a man haue an euill liking, so he consent not thoroughly to it, the Papiests say it is no sinne at all: and that is a horrible blasphemie. It is sayd thou shalt loue thy Lord thy God with all thy hart, & with all thy strength. VVhat is ment by minde & strength? God hath not limited the loue that we owe vnto him, that it should be only in our harts & mindes: but he sayd that our wit, reason and vnderstanding, & all our strength, (that is to say, al the abilities & powers that are in our nature,) must also be thorowly applied therunto. Now then if a man cōceyue any euill, although he consent not to it nor yeelde his affection fully therunto, I pray you doth he loue God with al his mind? No: if a man haue neuer so litle a peece of himself inclining to corruptiō, although with all the rest he indeuour himself to accomplish the lawe: doth he loue God as he ought to do? No vndoubtedly: for sinne is nothing els but a transgressing of Gods lawe. Therefore let vs conclude, that all the vayne thoughts which prouoke vs vnto euill, are sinne: and that wee are guiltie of them too Godward: vnlesse he beare with vs of his infinite goodnesse. But he forgiueth them to those that are his. Neuerthelesse it behoueth them to acknowledge it for sinne: and whosoever doth flatter himselfe, doth but prouoke Gods wrath, and couer the mischiefe to his owne damnation. For in the ende his hypocrisie muste be discouered and layd open to be punished with all the rest. They then which imagine that they do not amisse nor offende God when they be tempted to euill, gayne nothing by it, nother do they amende their market: for needes muste that hypocrisie of theirs be grieuously punished. VVherfore (as I sayde afore) although wee consent not to euill, but onely bee as it were tickled with it, and haue some liking of it, howbeit that wee withstand it: It is already a fault and oversight in vs. If wee do but conceyue suche euill liking, it already bewrayeth the corruptnesse of our nature. And surely if euill dwelled not in vs and that wee were not already turned away from the soundnesse and cleerenesse which God had put in the first man: out of all doubt wee should haue our eyesight much more pure and chaste than it is, and all our senses, as our hearing, our speaking and all the reste should bee so pure and cleane, as they shoulde haue no stayne in them. And for proufe hereof, let vs consider well how Moyse sayeth, that when Satan came too beguile Eue, and consequently hir husbande: after that they had giuen eare vnto him, and bene corrupted with desirousnesse to be like vnto God: they looked vpon the Tree of the knowledge of good and euill, and sawe it was to bee liked for the obtayning of knowledge. And howe looked they vpon it? had not Adam and Eue seene it already before? for God had sayd vnto them, eate not of the fruyte that I haue forbidden you. For in what houre soeuer you eate thereof, I tell you plainly you are separated frō me & condemned to death. So then yee see that Adam and Eue had looked vpon the Tree before: and why then doth Moses laye it nowe too their charge as a sinne? because they did beholde it with a liking of it, that is to say, with an vngracious and vntowarde luste, in that they thought it good to eate of. And whereof came that? euen of their heart, which being corrupted, did immediatly marre their eyesight. And like as when a man hath his eyesight marred with ouermuch drinking, there is some inwarde disease and some burning, or some other vncōme going before the losse of his eyes: or ilke as when a man becommeth blinde, there went cōmonly some rewme or some other like thing before, which in processe of time taketh away his sight: eue so is it with all the wicked lookes which are to bee condemned. For if the heart were not already infected and corrupted with some lewde liking: the eye (as I sayde) should be pure and cleane of himselfe, so as we might beholde Gods creatures and not bee tempted too any wickednesse. But forasmuch as wee cannot as now open our eyes, but wee shall conceyue some wicked luste: nor can say, this is fayre or that is good, but immediatly wee offende God: is it not a great vnwardnesse? So then let vs know that the cause thereof is the reygning of sinne in vs, which doubtlesse hath hilde such possession of vs euer since Adams fall, that our nature is so corrupted as we cannot loke vpon any thing that is termed fayre and bewtiful, but that in steade of being prouoked to loue God and to praise him for his goodnesse, and for bestowing of so many benefites vpon vs: we offend him. And so in steade of glorifying God, and of being prouoked to loue him: we cannot commend any thing to be fayre and good, good, but therewithall our cōceyte is tickled, yea and stirred vp, either to couetousnesse, or to whoredome, or to voluptuousnesse. To be short, looke whatsoever is fayre or good vnder heauē: the same turneth vs away frō our God, whereas it ought to leade vs vnto him. Is not God the wellspring of all beauty and goodnesse? yes: and surely the sayd wicked lust nother reigneth nor ought to reigne in the childre of God: but I speake of that which is naturally in mā, vntil such time as God haue wrought in him: true it is that the faythfull shall not be so peruered, nor haue their wittes so corrupted, as to draw alwayes vnto euill: but yet shal they alwayes haue some remnant of the sayd infection that they bring out of their mothers wōbe: which is, that they shall alwayes haue some inwarde prickings to moue them vnto euill, notwithstanding that they hate it & beate it downe at the first rising vp. And in good fayth (as I sayd) which of vs cōceyueth not this fancy, that God hath no care of him, so soone as we indure any aduersitie? and behold, it is a blasphemie, yea and a cursed blasphemie if we consent vnto it, and that our minde do rest neuer so litle vpon it, notwithstanding that our will do not fully purpose it. Now then we see that if a man be tempted to euill, although he cōsent not vnto it, but suppress it and fight against it: yet notwithstanding he sayleth not to offend God. And why? for it is a transgressing of his law, as I haue shewed you already. Also it cānot but proceede frō an euill fountayne: for the eye of it self shuld not be corrupted, nother doth sinne begin to come first frō thence. VVhence then? frō the minde and soule of man: for doubtlesse the euill must needes be conceyued first within, before the eye do tende so vnto euill, and be prouoked therevnto. And so ye see the cause why I sayd, that Iob in protesting that he absteyned from all euill and vnchast lookes, sheweth vs that such as are infected therewith, cannot cleere themselves before God, but that there hath bene some faultinesse in them. VVherfore let vs learne to stande vpon our garde, and not to flatter our selues as I haue touched already. I say let vs stād vpon our garde: for how harde a matter is it I pray you to rule our eyes in such wise, as they shall not be tempted with any euill concupiscence or disordered lust? or not be touched with couetousnesse, when wee see the goods of this world? or not be moued to long for those things which God giueth vs not, when wee see the ease, delights and pleasures that are euery where? or not be stayned with lecherousnesse, ambition, couetousnesse or any other tēptation, when we see them on all sides? It is impossible to be done at all, or at leastwise without great difficultie: for it surmounteth all our power: in somuch as it is in manner impossible for vs to opē our eyes, without cōceyuing some offence agaynst God. Seing it is so, let vs learne to keepe good watch: for we cannot rule our selues in such wise as to be vterly faultlesse, & to haue no neede to flee to the forgiuenesse of our sinnes: wherfore let vs cōclude, that it behoueth vs to fight valiantly, considering that we are so corrupted as we cānot by any means vse our senses or apply them to any thing, but there shal be some rēnant of our wicked corruptiō in it, which God misliketh. This then is a thing that ought to prouoke vs vnto heedfulness. And secondly let vs learne also to hūble our selues, seing that the Diuell laboreth to rocke vs a sleepe in hypocrisy, to the end we should not know our faultes, & so make them worse & worse. Therefore let vs enter into our selues, and after we haue examined our imperfections, let vs crie out before God: alas Lord, thou hast giuē me thy grace to go forward in thy seruice, I do my indeuour, I inforce my selfe, I resist all my passiōs, and I fight against my selfe, and yet am I not righteous before thee, but there is much amisse in me still. Lo how the faythfull after much paines taking and inforcing of themselves about all their strength, ought alwayes to be of this minde to condemne themselves when there shall be any faultinesse mingled with the good which God graūteth them to do, & learne to yeeld themselves guilty before him, and to hūble themselves, to the end they may obaine grace. These then are the points which wee haue to marke in this streyne. But howsoever the world go, although we haue many fancies running in our heads night and day, and therby perceyue that there is a maruellous corruption in our nature: yet must we not be out of hart, but marche on still forward, praying God that as he hath begonne to set vs forth, so he wil continue to make vs more forward, and increase in vs the strength of his holy spirit. And let vs beseech him, that if we haue but one loote already vpon our wicked affections, we may set both vpon the, that we may so treade them downe, as they may neuer rise againe: and that when the Diuell commeth to tempt and prouoke vs vnto euill, he may not bring it to passe, but that our wittes may alwayes ouer reach him: and (to be short) that Gods spirit may so reigne in our hearts, that although there be wicked affections there, yet they may be so bridled and fettered, as they may not lift vp themselves nor tosse vs hither and thither, but that wee may alwayes stand at a stay, and bee fully resolved to say: It is meete that our God shoulde gouerne vs, and that wee should folowe his holy will. Yee see then how that in the middest of our wicked thoughts, it behoueth vs to take corage to walke on still in goodnesse, assuring our selues that our good God will beare with vs, not that we should not confesse them to be sinne, but that he is contented to pardon them. And as touching this present matter, the point wherin we differ from the Papiſts is this. The Papiſts say that wicked lustes are no sinnes, so a man resiste them: but that is a cursed blasphemie. For were it so, God should be fayne to renounce himselfe and to repeale his whole law. And this is not a fleeting opinion conceyued onely by the simple and ignorant people, but it is a grounded determinatiō agreed vpon by the great doctours in their schooles, or rather in their diuelish Synagoges. But contrarywise wee say, they be atogither sinnes, howbeit they are not imputed vnto vs at Gods hand, bicause that of his owne free goodnesse & mercie, he wipeth them out for our Lord Iesus Christs sake, in whom wee beleue. And seing wee haue such a comforte, wee ought to inforce our selues so much the more, as I haue sayd already. Furthermore Iob sheweth well, that he knew he had offended, & bene blame worthy if he had had an vnchast loote. For he addeth, what is the porcion of God from aboue? what is the heritage of the Almighty of heauen. Iob sheweth here, that his speaking is not to vaūt himselfe afore mē, and to purchase himselfe reputatiō for his vertue & holinesse, as they do which seeke but the praise of this world: but that he hath his eyes fastned vpon god, & speaketh as in Gods presēce, desiring him to be his witnesse and iudge. And to that poynt also must we come. For as hath bene declared heretofore: so long as we couet to haue our life allowed of mē, we shal be ful of leazing, startingholes, & futtle shifts, inso much that it shal make vs to deface white and turne it into black, & contrarywise to make vertue of vice. Lo in what taking we be when we indeuour to cōmend our selues afore men. And therefore whosoever desireth to walke vprightly, & to haue this soundnesse wherof Iob speaketh: doubtlesse he must be fayne to gather in himselfe, and not be ledde away, to say: who is he that can speake euill of mee? No: such geere muste be cut of, and he muste summon himselfe before God, too say, go to, howe is it with mee?

It is God with whom I haue to deale. Though I had contented all the men in the world, I were neuer the better. It behoueth vs all to haue our mouthes shet: for God is not contented with goodly countenance and fayre disguyfings of outward shewes and other likelyhoodes: he loketh on the heart, he searcheth the thoughts and disco- uereth all that is hidden in darkenesse. Seing it is so, let vs brydle our selues to walke soundly and vprightly. But on the contrarie parte wee are drawne here and there, we are giuen to deuising of shifites and fayre deckings to colour our doings withall, and when we haue no better stuffe, it is ynough for vs to couer our selues with leaues as our father Adam did. VVherefore let vs marke well the lesson that is shewed here to al the faithfull: which is that when we intend to walke as it becommeth vs, we must not behaue our selues as it were before men, nother muste we rest our eyes vpon them: but we must beholde the heauenly iudge, and vnderstande that it is he to whom we must make our answere and yeelde our accompt. Marke that for one poynt. Furthermore (as I haue touched already) Iob acknowledgeth here, that God wil not suffer vnchast looks unpunished. And why? for they are all of them sinnes: And afterwarde he addeth, that the vnrighteous man shall be cut of. VVherein hee sheweth, that hee which hath giuen his eyes to vanitie, is condemned for a sinner and a wicked man before God, notwithstanding that he haue not consented fully vnto it. Let vs beare in minde what hath bene sayde concerning Iobs time. For although we know not whither he liued before the lawe, or no; yet notwithstanding he liued afore the Prophets times, as wee haue declared in that mencion is made of him as of a man of auncient time. And so ye see that Iob was in such time, as God had not yet giuen any large vterance of his doctrine: nor suche light as came afterwarde. For the Prophets did greatly inlighten the things that were darke in the law. Iob liued afore their time, and therefore had but as it were some litle sparke in respect of the doctrine that was afterwarde: and yet neuertheless he knewe he coulde not be tempted to any euill lust, but he should be blame worthy before God. And what shall we be then, who haue the sunne of rightuoufnesse shyning vpon vs in the highnoone day? For behold, Iesus Christe with his Gospell bringeth vs so great light, as we haue no excuse. If wee say, I vnderstande it not, it is to high and profounde a matter: what shall wee not doctrine large ynough, seing that Gods will is shewed vs to the full? How then should wee be excused if wee knewe no more than Iob knew? And herein it is to be seene, howe great and honorable Gods vengeance is in the Popedome, seing that those beasts durst denie that a man sinneth when he is so tempted vnto euill, and hadt suche provocation in him, and conceyueth so euill thoughts, sobeit that he consent not thoroughly to it. But Iob who (as I haue declared already) had no doctrine at all in comparison of that wee haue, did neuertheless know this well ynough. And therefore let vs looke more neerely to our selues: and seing that God hath graunted vs such grace and priuiledge, as to make his truth much more knowne vnto vs thā it was at that time: let vs be watchfull, and as soone as wee open our eyes and espie any vanitie or euill affection in vs, let vs thinke with our selues, o there is some euill hidde vnder this, wee haue offended our God, and therefore our eyes are attaynted already, seing that the euill sheweth it self alwaie. If there be sparkes, is it not by reason of fire? Therefore wee must learne to condemne our selues: and vndoubtedly if it were not for Gods mercy, we should be ouerwhelmed for it. For that is the portion of our heritage that is prepared for vs frō aboue. True it is that men cannot iustifie vs: but we muste be fayne to appeare before God, who will iudge of the matter farre otherwise. And Iob sayth expressly from aboue, from heauen. He repeating of this woorde here is no superfluous speache. And why? For he maketh a couert coparison betweene Gods iudgement, and the opinions that we can purchase afore men. Yee see then that men may iustifie vs in all points, and not knowe our filthinesse and pouertie: by reason whereof we shall be taken for litle Angels, and therevpon thinke that there is nothing amisse in vs: but what haue we gayned by it? Nothing at all: for behold how Iob calleth vs vp aboue. Very well: true it is that sinners may perchance cleare themselues and easily be allowed among men. (For there shall be nothing but vertue to outward appearance) but they muste come vp aloft and there will God ouerthrow all the vayne opinions that haue reigned for a time. And therefore let vs learne, that like as we are blameworthy in that wee haue bene tempted to wicked lustes: so also our hyre is prepared from heauen: that is to say, from aboue, except our good God spare vs and vse his fatherly goodnesse towardes vs. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in minde, to the end we may magnifie the goodnesse of our God in that he punisheth vs not with rigour, and also be prouoked to aske him forgiuenesse of our faultes from day to day. Nowe it is sayd immediatly, is there not a cutting off for the vnrighteous, and a punishment for such as commit crimes? doth not God looke vpon my wayes, and doth he not number all my steppes? Here Iob expresth plainly the porcion and heritage whereof he spake. And it serueth to wound vs the more to the quicke by the feeling of our sinnes. True it is that he standeth not vpon all the things that are spoken of in the law: nother vseth he so many woordes: but yet doth the holy ghost giue vs here a common lesson by his mouth. For when there is any talke of Gods iudgement, and of the punishment that he sendeth vpon sinners: we are so slow as the same moueth vs not a whit: & therefore our Lord is fayne to waken vs, and to make vs feeble better how terrible his wrath is, and that it is a horrible thing to haue it so agaynst vs. Thus ye see why Iob addeth the declaration that is contayned here, saying: is there not a cutting off for the vnrighteous: or shall not the wicked man be punished? what is ment by this cutting of? that the wicked deserue to be rooted out, and that God should vterly ouerwhelme them and destroy them, according as the woorde Cutting of importeth more than hyre and heritage. For (as I haue sayd) men beare themselues in hand, that they shal scape with some light punishment: and like as when an offender is kept in pryson and knoweth not that he hath deserued hanging, he beareth himself in hand that he shall scape with a whipping, or that he shall be banished: euen so (say I) men conceyue not Gods wrath as it is, neither knowe they the punishments which they are woorthy of, bicause they thinke not of the euerlasting death. VVe see then how Iob, after he had spoken of the portion which is prepared frō aboue for the wicked, doth (not without cause) adde, that there is a cutting of and confuzion to destroy them vterly. And hereby wee knowe, that Gods spirite reprobeth vs of rechefnesse. If we were attentiu at the first to know Gods iudgemēt, or at leastwise to vnderstad our owne faultes: we should not haue neede of the doubling of his woordes: it were ynough for vs to haue bene warned in one single woorde. But after that the holy Ghost had spoken of the porcion that God prepareth for all the despisers of his lawe: nowe he addeth, a cutting of, bicause we be as it were brutish, and when a man telleth vs a thing simply, we conceyue it not, but are possessed with suche duinesse, as we feele not the strokes of Gods hand, though he strike vs hard. And how then shall wee be wounded as wee ought to bee, by the thrcatnings that he giueth vs? surely if he do but speake, we will not be touched nor cast downe in our selues, seing that we cannot be sufficiently humbled by the blowes of his hand. And so let vs marke well, that our carelesnesse and dullnesse are reprovcd here. Wherefore let vs wake, seing that God calleth vpon vs so earnestly, and lette vs learne to thinke better vpon our selues. This is it that wee haue to marke in this verse. In conclusion whereas Iob addeth, doth not God looke vpon my wayes, and keepe a reckening of all my steppes? Let vs marke well that he applieth the doctrine to himselfe, which he had set downe in generall. For he had sayd, what is the hyre or portion of God from aboue? what is the heritage of God fro heauen? Iob had spoken so of all men: and now he applieth the same doctrine to his own vse, declaring to what purpose he had spoken so: therefore as often as Gods iudgements come to our remembrance, whether men do tell vs of thē, or we our selues reade thē: let vs haue the wisdome to enter into our selues, and to looke euery one vpon his owne person. For Gods iudgemēts must not lie as it were buried and neuer be spoken of: but euery man muste make them auayleable to himselfe, and put them to his owne particular vse. Ye see then how we haue to marke, that after Iob had set downe a generall doctrine, he came by and by to the beholding of his owne person, saying: God sercheth and knoweth my wayes: that is to say, forasmuch as God is iudge of all men, I cannot escape his hande. For doth not God (sayeth he) know all my wayes? and doth he not keepe a reckening of my steppes? Thus much concerning the first poynt. And as touching the second, lette vs marke also the stile that Iob vscth: which is that God marketh his wayes and steppes, and keepeth a reckening of them. For it serueth to expresse, that God beholdeth them not a loofe, nor onely looketh vpon the things that are apparant to the worlde: but also looketh neerely and narrowly too all our workes, and noteth and marketh euerychone of them, and that his sight is not dimme nor vieweth things at randon, but marketh, counteth, and nūbereth all things, so as nothing escapeth him, nother is any thing forgotten with him. Now then (I pray you) haue not we the better cause to consider our wayes and to reckon our owne steppes, when wee see that all is present before God? what is the cause that mé do scarcely know the hundredth part of their sinnes? yea and some man shall comit one faulte a hundred times in a day, and yet scarce thinke once vpon it: what is the cause hereof? It is for that wee thinke not that God watcheth ouer vs, nor that wee are so before his sight so as nothing may bee hidden from him, nor he forget any of all our workes and thoughtes. Therefore lette vs way well the woordes that are cotayned here: namely that God knoweth our wayes and reckeneth our steppes, that is to say, that the number of them is set downe before him, and that euery article thorough out to the last, muste come to account: yee see what they shall gayne which haue cloked their euill doings with lying and flattering: for all must come to light. What remayneth then? To looke more neerely to our selues than we haue bene wont to do, and to watch continually, to the end we be not taken vnwares by the stales that are layd for vs on all sides. And seing we be in daunger of falling into so many vices wherewith our nature is stuffed: let vs examine them well, that wee may be sorie for them, and pleade guiltie before God: and in mourning for them, lette vs still confesse with Dauid, that it is vnpossible for vs to know all our faults. And therefore let vs pray our good God that when he hath looked vpo the faults and sinnes which wee our selues cannot see: it may please him to blot them out, that by meanes thereof we may not repose the trust of our weifare and saluation in any other thing, than in his receyuing of vs to mercie for our Lord Iesus Christ sake, and also in our hauing of the washing wherewith he hath clenfed vs, that is to say, the blood which he hath shedde for our redemption.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, that being displeascd with our selues for them, we may learne to hate them and abhorre them more and more, and to followe that which he commaundeth and appoynteth with greater earnestnesse and affection, and therewithall that it may please him so to reforme vs by his holy spirite, as he may reigne quietly in vs, and we be ioyned to him in such perfection, as wee may seeke nothing but to be wholly conformable to his righteousnesse, which thing shall then be accomplished, when he shall haue taken vs out of this corruptible lyfe. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not &c.

The .cxij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the .xxxj. Chapter.

5. If I haue vwalked in leazing, or if my foote haue bene hasty to deceyte.
6. Let God vvey my vvorkes in the ballance of Iustice, and let him tric mine vprightnesse.
7. If my steppes haue turned out of the vvay: or if my heart haue vwalked after mine eyes: or if any spotte haue cleaued to my handes:
8. Then] let me sove and let an other man eate the frute, and let my plantes be rooted vp.

After that Iob hath protested that he had liued chastly, in suche sorte as his eyes were not defiled with one euill looke: now he addeth, that he had liued so vprightly among his neighbours, that his foote stepped not aside to deceyte or malice. We see then that as now he toucheth another kind of soundnesse besides that which he made mention of yesterday. And he will also lay forth the principall poyntes of mans lyfe by particulars: and not without cause. For it is not ynough for a man to haue absteyned from whoredome, except he be also cleere from theft, guyle, and extortion: for God will not haue the things sundred which he hath set together. He hath giuen his whole lawe to rule our life: and as he hath forbidden whoredome, so hath he also condemned stealing, lying, extortion and suche other things. Therefore if a man intend to serue God, it is not ynough for him to be cleere from one sinne, but he must frame his whole lyfe after the Lawe. For (as I sayd afore) it were otherwise a separating of the things which cannot by any meanes be put asunder, without impeachment of Gods rightuousnesse. Thus yee see why Iob, after he had made protestation of his chaste and cleane lyfe, addeth, that he had not beguyled any man, and that his foote had not stepped aside at any tyme vnto leasng or malice. And this is well woorthy to be noted. For one of the principall parties which God requireth in his lawe, is that wee should haue

the sayd vprightnesse, that we walke not into by wayes & fittleties, to drawe our neighbours goods vnto vs: and surely it is a very difficulte vertue, so to do, howbeit that euery man is desirous to be counted vpright. For the nature of mā is alwayes so giuen vnto hypocrisie, that there is not so much as one woorde to be heard, wherein there is not somewhat amisse: in somuch that when we buy & sell with our neighbours, wee are alwayes disguysing of things to drawe all to our owne profite. Seing then that we perceyue such a roote of deceitfulnesse in vs, we haue so much the more neede to giue our mindes to this vprightnesse & soundnesse, so as we may protest before God, that our life hath not swarued aside vnto leazing. Also there is another reason: that is to witte, that deceytes are worse than open violence: like as he that killeth a mā by poysoning, is more faultie than he that slayeth a man with his sword. And why? For this trayterousnesse of killing a man vnder the colour of making friendship to him, or of making him good cheere: is a very detestable thing, and the crime is vtterly vnardonable. Euen so when a man beguyleth his neighbour by craftinesse, and creepeth into his bosome by fitteltie, so as a man cannot beware of him: is it not a signe of a more treacherous nature? These two reasons therefore ought to teach vs so to follow vprightnesse and soundnesse, as our neighbours may not by any meanes be beguyled by vs. And that is the first thing which wee haue to marke here. Furthermore let vs vnderstand, that truth is a precious thing before God, in so much that he taketh that name vpon him when he intendeth to expresse what a one he is. Needes then must vntruth & guilefulnesse be so much the more detestable before him, bicause they be full contrary to his nature. Also when it is sayd that wee muste be fashioned like vnto the image of God, S. Paule setteth downe true holinesse: as if he should say, that whereas mā are giuen to hypocrisie, and there is nothing but coueterfetting in them: to the intent they should come neerer vnto God, & be brought to his obedience, he printeth his marke vpon them, that he may know them for his children. And then doth this true holinesse reigne in them. But if men be not governed by Gods spirit, there reigneth nothing but faynednesse and slinesse in their flesh, that is to say, in their corrupt nature. To be short, let vs learne that if a man walke not soundly, nor go not streight in his businesse when he dealeth with his neighbours: although he had al the other vertues that coulde bee named, they were nothing if he wanted this purenesse before God, would we then haue our life well liked of? let vs giue our mindes wholly to this vprightnesse and soundnesse, that we walke not in guilefulnesse and vntruth. Furthermore lette vs marke also how Iob sayeth, let God wey all in the ballaunce of iustice, and let him trie myne vprightnesse. This similitude of the ballance is very notable: for it sheweth vs what maner of iustice we shall haue, and what account we haue to yeelde, and how we may be liked of and allowed: that is to witte, by Gods weying of vs in the ballaunce of iustice. And how is that? his lawe and will (as he hath declared them vnto vs) are a ballaunce wherby to know whether our workes be good and receyueable. For like as wares are weyed when men sell them by the pounce: euen so also muste our workes be iudged. And how? By Gods ballaunce. I haue tolde you that this doctrine is very profitable for vs, bycause menne challenge more to themselues than is meete for them, and beare theselues in hand that their workes shall go for good, euen when they gouerne themselues after their owne lust, by reason whereof they woulde not that God should gaynestand any thing that they haue imagined, but they vtterly disanull all his authoritie. It is a wonder that a man should desire to be master of his owne life, and to be his owne guide, as who should say that God might commaunde him nothing. True it is that menne woulde bee ashamed to speake so: they will not say, it is in me to gouerne my self, I will follow mine own brayne, God shall not meddle with commaunding mee any thing.

Ye see a horrible blasphemie which men will not vtter with their mouth: but what for that? they that followe their owne opinion which they haue conceyued: I pray you do they not auance themselues aboute God? and do they not labour to thrust him downe by bereeuing him of all soueraintie, so as he might not commaunde them any more? if a man do whatsoeuer commeth in his owne head, and whatsoeuer he himselfe deemeth to be good, so as he would that God shoulde allow it and not bring him any more to obedience to say vnto him, this is euill bicause God hath forbidden it, or this is good bicause God hath commaunded it, but followeth his owne liking and imaginatiō: doth not such a man go about as it were to set himselfe in Gods roume? It is therefore a diuelish presumption, and yet notwithstanding it is as common as any thing.

VVherefore lette vs marke well, howe it is sayde in this streyne, that it behoueth vs too come to the ballaunce, and there to receyue iudgement either with vs, or against vs, according as God shall haue tried our workes: namely by the rule of his law, and not by our owne lustes. Men imagine another ballaunce that is very foolish and grosse: that is to witte, to recompence the faultes which they haue committed before God: and that is the meane whereby satisfactions were brought in into the papacie: and this ballaunce haue they allotted to S. Michaell. For they put mennes good workes into the one ballaunce, and their euill workes into the other: and if a mā haue done more good than euill, the Papists are of opinion that he is quite before God. See here an Apes toy which is ouer grosse. For it is written, he that doth these things shall liue in them. God promiseth not lyfe and saluation for accomplishing some one peece of the lawe, but for performing the whole in all respectes. Contrarywise it is sayde: cursed are they that perourne not all the things that are containyd here. And therefore if wee breake but one article of the lawe, wee are guiltie in the whole, as sayeth Sainct James. Thus then (as I haue touched before) it is an ouer doltishe and beastly imagination: to matche good and euill after that sorte one agaynst another, thinking that there may any exchange or recompence be made before God. But as I haue sayd already, this ballaunce is Gods lawe: and thither shall our workes come to be weyed, and looke what is founde conformable to Gods lawe, shall be taken and allowed for good: like as marchandize that are lawfull are put into the ballaunce, and men pay for them according to their weyght. Euen so also it behoueth vs to come to the lawe of God. It is to no purpose (as I haue sayde already) for men to bring their owne weights and measures, and to desire to haue them credited. For in Cities there is a common beame or ballaunce, and euery man shall not haue his owne weights and measures, nother were it reasonable and lawfull so to haue, for then would all go to hauock: And for the preferuation of good pollycie, order, and equitie, there had neede to be one certayne and euen ballaunce for all other to be ruled by. Therefore when men go aboute to make their woorkes good by their owne iudgement and opinion: it is as if they would forge a newe ballaunce: but wee knowe what a falshood that were. Hee that shall haue falsified the common weights shall shall be condemned, and that iustly: then if a man falsifie the rule of good lyfe, which is more precious before God than all the wayghts in the worlde, hath he not committed a greater cryme than if hee had forged some wares? seing that cace standeth so, lette vs learne too rule our selues as the Scripture sheweth: that is to witte, let vs in all our workes consider well what God hath appoynted, and lette vs without replying take that for good which he alloweth in his lawe, and reiect all that for euill which hee forbiddeth there. If wee deale after this sorte, there will be none of these foolishhe deuotions among vs which reigned in the papacie. For whereof commeth it that menne do so lifte vp themselues, and euery one deuise some meanes or other of seruing God, too say, this is good, and I will do such a thing? It is bicause all of them bring false wayghts and false ballaunces. For euery man woulde preferre his owne deuice, but God reiecteth and condemneth euery whit of it. Therefore lette vs haue the meekenesse to rule and gouerne our life by the commandements of God: and then all this desire of hauing sundry meanes to serue God withall, shall bee layd away, and wee shall haue one common certayne and vnfal-20 lible rule. And why? For there is but the onely one ballance of iustice, and there is but one onely lawe of God too gouerne vs: and although there bee a difference of estates, yet are wee all called backe to one generall way.

Exod. 20.

VWhen he sayth, thou shalt not committe adultrie, thou shalt not steale, thou shalt not lie, nor beare false witnessse, he sayeth it aswell to the greate as too the small.

Then seing our Lorde sendeth aswell Kings as handycraftes menne to this generall rule of lyfe, shewing vs a 30 broad way to the ende wee shoulde not go amisse: wee bee so much the lesse to be excused if wee couet not too holde vs to it, and also labour not to giue good example to our neyghbours, and ayde one another to frame our selues after suche sorte vnto Godwarde, as wee may all of vs obey him, and be fully subiect to him as it becommeth vs. Nowe if men shunne this ballaunce and measure: yet shall they not gayne by it. For it is sayde immediately, lette God trie myne vprightnesse. VWherein Iob 40 sheweth, that it belongeth onely vnto God to iudge whether wee bee good or euill. True it is that hee signifieth twoo things: the firste is that God will not iudge mennes liues at auenture, but only by his lawe: And the second is that there is no competent iudge but he alone, and that although men vsurpe that prerogatiue, yet notwithstanding their opinion shall be ouerthrowne, bicause it is but an ouerweening.

VWherefore wee ought to marke well this poynt, that God will iudge our workes by the triall of his lawe: and that serueth, firste too beate downe all the vayne 50 trust of hypocrites which bring their pelting trash before God, and will haue him to content himselfe with it. As howe? I haue done this, and I haue done that (say they:) according as wee see howe that when the Papists haue taken muche payne in their deuotions, they thinke that God is in their debte for it: or else that hee woulde neuer quite them, vnlesse they brought suche things with them. No no, lette them go aske their wages of him that did sette them a worke: For God disalloweth it euery whit. He affirmeth that he will iudge mens workes by putting them into the ballaunce, that is to say, by examining them after his lawe. Hee will not deuise a newe iudgement: But hee hath giuen vs his lawe. And that God is bothe the lawegiuer and also the iudge: are things that go ioynly together. Howe do wee thinke that God ought too iudge? According to that whereby 60 menne haue bene taught aforehand, that is to witte, by his lawe. Then is there an agreablenesse betweene the lawe which hee hath giuen vs to keepe, and the iudgement that he muste execture. Thus then, as concerning the firste poynt, yee see the hypocrites shall be confounded in their vayne presumption, in that they thinke their workes shall bee allowed, and yet yeeide no reuerence to Gods lawe, but beare themselues in hand that God shall owe them an ouerplus if their doings be compared together and layde into the ballaunce.

But wee bee warned, that if wee haue indeuered to followe Gods will, and to submitte our selues therevnto: then are our workes acceptable vnto God. The worlde will perchance condemne vs: according as wee see how the Papistes haue no liking of any thing that wee do. And why? Bycause there are not so many gaye pompes and goodly deckings among vs, as there are in their Synagoges. For if a man come into the Churches of the Papistes, hee shall finde them as full of gewgawes as they can be stuffed. And yet in the meane whyle they are but 20 Apes, and they make no reckening of our doings. For to their seeming it were a small matter to come thither to pray vnto God, without the gay ceremonies that glister among them. But what for that? It is ynough for vs that God alloweth vs. And howe? lette vs looke vpon his lawe and vpon the things that he requyreth of vs in the Scripture: for the thing which muste stirre vp the saythfull, and giue them courage to serue God according to his will: is that they know howe wee muste not followe any other thing, than that which is agreeable in all respects to the doctrine which wee haue receyued: as nowe in the Gospell. The woorde that I haue spoken (sayth he to the 30 Jewes) shall iudge you, and not I.

Iobn. 12. g. 47.

Furthermore lette vs alwayes consider, that it beho-40 ueth vs too come to account before the greate iudge, and that it will not boote vs to haue bene flattered and prayed of menne. For it is sayde, that God will trie. By these woordes he signifieth, that all the trialles that are made as now, haue no certayntie nor any stay to rest in, but that God will ouerthrowe all. VWherefore lette vs learne to walke in such wise, as wee may protest before God, that all our laboring and traueling hath bene towards him, that our desire hath bene to be subiect vnto him, and that 50 wee haue euer honored him as our guyde and gouernour: Lo what wee haue too marke in this streyne. And nowe Iob addeth consequently, if my foote or pace stepped out of the way, or if my heart haue walked after myne eyes, or if any spotte haue cleaued to my bandes. This is according to the talke which he had concerning his vprightnesse and soundnesse: howbeit hee expresth the thing yet more, which he had sayd afore. And firste of all hee protesteth that his foote stepped not out of the way. Verely we cannot liue so perfectly, but we must make many false steppes, and oftentimes swarue to and fro, though it be but through oversight and fraylie. But here Iob declar-60 eth that he steppeth not out of the way: and he vseth the similitude of way (as the Scripture is wont to do:) and it serueth to drawe vs the better to the obeying of God. VWhen as Gods lawe is called a way: I pray you ought it not to be as a spurre to pricke vs forward to walke as God hath ordeyned? and ought it not also to be a bridie to hold vs in subiection? if we haue occasion to go to any place, do we not desire to keepe the best way: yea and the shortest, easiest and certaynest? And if any man beguyle vs: are wee not very angry with him for it? And if wee stray, doth it not grieue vs? In somuch that euery step warieth vs, and wee thinke we haue a clogge of leade at our heeles, whē we know not whether we be right or whether we go out of our way? Seing then that men are so carefull to know the right way in their traauyling, that they may come wel to their journeyes end: is it not great pitie that in the way of our life, wee are willing to go astray, and seeme to be desirous of it? for we are not only negligent of inquiring to the intent wee might not starte aside nor steppe out of the way: but also when the way is before our eyes, so as God pointeth it out with his finger, & calleth vs thither, incouraging vs to follow him and warning vs to turne nother to the right hand nor to the left, but to keepe on the hie way as he sheweth it vs: we are not willing to take heede to it. And the cause why the Scripture vseth this similitude of a way, is to shewe vs that if wee misse of our way, our ignorace canot excuse vs. And why? For God hath shewed vs his will: and if we obey him, it is a good and infallible way, we cannot steppe aside nor run astray like wandring vacaboundes. Cōtrarywise, they that cannot conforme themselues to God and to his lawe and his woorde, may well runne and gad, and trudge vp and downe as the Prophet Esay sayth: But that shalbe to tyre their legges, and yet not further their way a whit. Then like as the woorde ballance which Iob hath vsed, ought to holde vs in awe so as wee presume not any thing of our owne head, but indeuour to frame our life to the will of God: so also the woorde may ought to teache vs, not to walke as wee thinke good, but to holde vs wholly to that which God ordeyneth. Thus ye see in effect what wee haue to remember in Iobs protestation: that is to wit, not that he neuer did amisse (for that were impossibill for a man though it were but in respect of frayltie & ignorace as I sayd): but his not turning out of the way, doth vs to wit, that he ran not astray, according as he addeth, saying: If my heart hath followed myne eyes. For hereby he meeneth that he was not so euill minded, as to consent to any of the vanities, which men cōceyue in beholding the things that they like of. For (as I sayd yesterday) all our lookes are as many sparkles to kindle the fire of our lust within vs. For our nature is so froward, as we cannot see any thing that is fayre or good, but wee drawe it to an occasion of offending God. For if a thing be fayre: strayghtwayes we be in loue with it. And how? with a wicked lust. And if it be good: our desire is kindled at it. And in what wise? vnto euill. For asmuch then as men are so lightminded in consenting to their wicked lustes, Iob sayeth that his hart folowed not his eyes: howbeit there might seeme to be some contrarietie betweene this maner of speache, and the talke that he had yesterday. VVhy so? I told you that all vnchast lookes that are attaynted with any vice: proceede from the hart, and are a token that the hart is corrupted. And therewith I alledged that which is spoken by Moyse of Adam and Eue: namely that they looked vpon the tree of the knowledge of good and euill, and saw that it was to be liked: and therefore that it could not be, but that there was already some lewde lust within the which perswaded them vnto euill: for the eye of it selfe would not sinne, vnlesse it were prouoked by an euill mind. How then doth Iob say here, that his hart folowed not his eyes? But I sayd therewithal yesterday, that when we open our eies, there come many lewde thoughts to our mind. Howbeit that oftentimes we be not tickled with thē: for God holdeth vs in awe by his holy spirit. Otherwise it is certayne that we should not only be tempted and prouoked to euill, but wee shoulde also fall and be ouercome out of hād. Then may we perchance cōceyue some euill thought at the first sight, and yet not be ledde away with it by any meanes. That was one poynt. Therewithal also I did sette downe three degrees of faultinesse: the first was when we haue but onely a conceyt: the second when the heart is somewhat moued with it: and the third is when the will

is fully resolued and determined vpon it. But now we haue to note, that for asmuch as men are conceyued and borne in sinne, and wholly giuen to corruption: that is the wellspring frō whence we haue our wicked thoughts. For as soone as we open our eyes, some temptation will step before vs, yea though we sticke not to it but vterly shake it of, so as we be not a whit moued with it. Though such a thing waue before mine eyes: yet notwithstanding no part of my hart inclineth therunto, but I do vterly abhorre it.

10 From whence then commeth this cōceyt? Euen of sinne which dwelleth in vs, & wherein we be as good as buried: for if Gods image were the same in vs that it was in our father Adam at the beginning: vndoubtedly al our sense (as was declared yesterday) should be pure & cleane without any infectiō, and all our lookes should tend to God. So soone as we should looke vpon any creature, the glory of God would vter it self in it, and we should be led by it to honor him: and to be wholly inflamed with his loue. There would be no vanitie nor disorder: and much lesse would there be any wicked rebelliousnesse: in somuch that we should not see any thing, but it would further vs to goodnesse. Then let vs marke, that all vnchast lookes and all other temptations which we cōceyue by meane of our eyes, do spring out of the sayd fountayne of originall sinne, that is to say, out of the sayd corruption which wee draw from our father Adam, and from the frowardnesse of our nature in asmuch as wee be alienated from God. Now then we see that these two things may wel stand together: namely that a man should be tempted to euill by the wickednesse of his heart, and yet notwithstanding that the conceite which cometh of the eyesight, should be before the affection of the hart. And howe is that? I haue told you already, that our eyesight is a tempting of vs to follow the wicked lustes of our hart, when the euill is already conceyued within. Ye see then that sinne goeth foremost: and so it must needs be concluded, that if the hart were not infected with corruption, our eyes should be cleane. It is true: but yet for all that, it is true also that we are sometimes tempted without any inward affectiō: like

40 as Iesus Christi himselfe was often tempted, and yet notwithstanding had not any vnclennesse in him: but was tempted after such manner, as a sound nature might be: he had outward sightes, but his will continued stedfast in goodnesse, for there was no corruptnesse at all in his senses. But it is otherwise with vs: for all our senses are corrupted by reason of sinne. Neuerthelesse there may be some corruptiō in our senses, and yet our will shall abide found still, according as was declared yesterday by the distinction that I did set downe then, and which I repeted euen now, If this be to darke, I will teate of it yet againe a litle playnelier: if we be tempted with hautinesse when we lift our eyes to heauen: or if we be tempted with couetousnesse when we looke vpon the goods of this world: so as we desire to haue this or that: saying, I would such a house were mine, I would I were owner of somuch medowe or of so many Vineyardes: or if wee see any other things, and be stricken with any couetousnesse: if our hart incline that way, so as we haue any inward desire, or feele any burning within vs: and that it be not lōg of vs that wee haue not the thing which our liking lusteth for: then doth our hart walke after our eyes: that is to say, our hart hauing cōceiued a misse thought by reaso of the eyesight thorough the corruption of originall sinne, hath folowed it: that is to say, hath yeilded to a motion which was cōtrarie to Gods lawe: and we haue not brided our affections in such wise, but that somewhat hath stirred vs vp vnto euill. But if wee haue the conceyte to say, this is fayre: and yet notwithstanding do stoppe there: or else or else do say this thing is to be liked, and yet therewithall haue such stay of ourselues, as to say also, It is meete for me to be contented with that which God hath giuen me: I say if our heart abyde settled there, and be not shaken, nor tossed, nor pricked and prouoked, but stand steadfast in our contentation and pouertie: then doo our bodily senses make vs to conceyue some euill thought, and yet notwithstanding, the hart is settled without mouing. To be short, our eies may perchance wander, and be excelsiue in gasings about, which are to bee condemned because they proceed of originall sin. But God imputeth it not vnto vs as I haue sayd. Furthermore, wheras Iob saith here, that his hart walked not after his eyes: we haue to marke thereypon, that oure eyes which were created to looke vpon Gods workes, to the end we might be taught to loue, reuerence and feare him: are become as it were the baudes of Satan, and are as it were inticers, whiche come to beguile vs and worke our destruction. God I say hath created our eyes. To what ende? To the ende that whiles we be in this worlde, we should haue abilitie to discern betweene things, and that the same might lead vs vnto him. Whether we looke vppward or downward, do we not see that our lord calleth vs to himself? Are not all the creatures both in heauen and earth, meanes to allure vs to come vnto God? Then doth he not onely say come vnto mee: but also hee draweth vs thither by his goodnesse, according as we see how he sheweth himselfe liberall towards vs and therein also ministrerth occasion to vs to walke in his feare. Thus ye see to what end our eies were made. For if we had no eies, we shuld not haue such meanes to behold Gods glory in all poyntes as we haue. But we are so froward, that we vse our eyes cleane contrary to the will of God. For (as I haue said) our eies dazel vs, and deceyue vs: and as oft as they open, it is to hale vs away and to make vs run astray, to the end we should become like brute beasts, full of wilde and vnruely lusts. And besides that, they are as two firebrondes to set vs on fire. Whereas they ought to receiue gods glorie to transform vs therunto, they receyue Satans firebronds too kinde all our affections, to the intent our whole desire might be to offend our God, and to aduance our selues against him. Thus ye see a poynt which we ought to marke wel, to the end that euery one of vs might beware. And furthermore forasmuch as wee cannot be vterly discharged of our frailtie and corruption, but that our eies will be wandring and drawe vs away, and there will euer be some sodaine conceytes to allure vs vnto euill: let vs at leastwise bridle our heartes, and let not our affections bee gadding wyth our eyes, to make vs stray from the way aforesayde, but let vs learne to holde our selues vnder the obedience of God in all subiection and feare. In the ende he addeth, that if he had any spotte cleauing too his handes. This is yet one other similitude, whereby hee meeneth too declare yet better the vprightnesse of his life. For like as wee handle things with our handes: so also when wee haue to deale wyth men, all things that we deale wyth, doo as it were passe through our handes, and are handled by vs. Iob then meeneth that in his affayres and dealings with men, hee was neuer stayned with anye craftinesse, violence, corruption or such other things. And surely that was a great vprightnesse. Neuerthelesse wee muste alwayes marke, that Iob speaketh nor of himself in way of boasting, but rather the holy Ghost intendeth heere to giue vs a myrrour of perfection, too the ende that when we knowe there is any spotte in vs, we shoulde assure our selues that God calleth and summoneth vs too oure account, and that we cannot escape vnpunished. For by and by there is a curse added: let me see (sayth Iob) and let an other man eate, and let my plants be plucked vp, as if he should say, If I haue laboured to inriche my selfe by vnlawfull gaine, let God plucke away all my substance, and let all perishe and go too hauocke. Yee see in effect what is shewed vs heere. Nowe therefore let vs take heede too walke more carefully than we haue done. For men dispatche themselues thereof too lightly. If they haue any meane trade of liuing, and content themselues with it howsoever they fare: Straight wayes they are righteous (so thinke they themselues) and there is nothing amisse in them. But yet for all that, we must bee faine to come to the ballance, as I haue touched before. And bycause the lawe of God moueth vs not, the holy ghost addeth one other helpe: which is, that in the example of Iob, hee sheweth vs howe oure lyfe ought too bee ruled.

Thus ye see howe by the way we haue to marke, that Iob ment not too magnifie himselfe, but to shewe in hys owne example howe we ought to liue. Besides this also, although wee haue indeuered to walke in suche perfection as we haue bryded our affections, as our wandring lusts haue haried vs away, as we haue alwayes preserved euery mans right, and as wee haue not vsed anie craft or malice agaynst any man: yet muste wee alwayes hang downe oure heades before God, as wee haue scene heretofore. And if God scourge vs, although it be not for our sinnes, but for some other purpose, as namely to humble vs, or to trie our pacience: yet must we cast down our heades still, and furthermore acknowledge that wee are alwayes guiltie howsoever the world go, and that God shall alwayes finde some fault in vs, so as he might iustly reiect our whole life. Thus ye see how we ought to practise this sentence. Neuerthelesse (to be short) it behoueth vs to haue our eyes alwayes fastned to our handes: that is to say, too deale so purely in all things that we take in hande, as our doings may not in any wise be stayned: but it is hard for vs to haue such a purenesse: for looke howe many dealings wee haue to doo with, so many peeces of pitch do passe through our handes. And howe is it possible that we shoulde scape without catching some spot? God therefore must bee faine to worke in that case, and to preferue vs euen after a woonderfull fashon. And it ought to prouoke vs greatly too prayer, when wee see there is such an vncorruptnesse required at our handes, and we drawe cleane backwardes, insomuche that wee are so farre off from beeing cleane, as we perceyue not the spottes and blottes that are in vs. Then remayneth there none other shiftes, but to flie to God for refuge, not only to craue forgienesse of the fautes that are past, but also to desire him to guide vs by his holy spirite, and too keepe our handes cleane, so as we may be restrayned fro all craftinesse and malicious dealing in all things that we haue to do with men, whatsoeuer they be. Moreouer let vs marke well the curse that Iob setteth downe here. For although hee applie it but to his owne person: yet notwithstanding he pronounceth generally what payment is prepared for all those, which defile their handes after that sort, with the wickednesse that they haue deuised against their neighbors. Do the couetous men indeuer too inrich themselues at other mens costs? Is a man so giuen too himself as he passeth for nothing in this worlde, but to grow riche? Let vs not thinke that the same shall indure long: but that at length God will execute the thing which he pronounceth here: that is to wit, that such as haue planted shall not eate of the frute. And in very deede wee see that suche as haue heaped moste goodes together: inioy them not, but God berecueth them of them. And oftentimes a man needes not too forbid them the eating and drinking of the things that they haue gotten. For they themselues are so niggardly, as they dare not cherishe themselues, but pine away, and become their owne tormentours. And afterwarde, looke what they had gathered together in long time with great labour: that doth God plucke and sweepe away: their children make a fayre dispatch of it: and the goodes that were referued still to bee the last, shall oftentimes make a rope for their children to draw them to the gallowes. VVee see these iudgements of God before our eyes: and therefore let vs learne to walke vprightly, and not thinke that those which haue gathered most in this world, are happiest. And why? For Gods curse is alwayes at their tayle, and cannot misse those which haue pilled and polled other men of their goodes. VVherefore let vs bethinke vs to be contented with the little that God shall giue vs, assuring oure selues that if wee walke continually in hys feare, he wil be a good fosterfather to vs, and neuer fayle vs, if we deale like children towards him, & vse true loue and brotherly vprightnesse towards all our neighbours.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good god, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him so to open our eyes, as we may walk before him, and as it were in his presence, and that seeing he hath shewed himself so familiarly vnto vs by his worde, we also may behold him as he hath declared himselfe there: and that therewithall we may make such a triall of our whole life, as wee may perceyue the wretchednesse that is in vs, and the miseries wherunto we be subiect, and flie vnto the remedie which he hath set forth vnto vs by his goodnesse, which is too haue recourse vnto his mercie, and to pray him to guide vs in such wise by his holy spirit, that we renouncing all oure wicked affections, may seeke to frame oure selues wholly to his holy wil, and to walke vnder his obeyfance, vntill we be come to the full perfection wherunto it behoueth vs to tende all our life long, and which appeareth already in his Angels. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also, &c.

9. If my heart haue bene deceyued in any vvoman, or if I haue laid vvaight at the doore of my neighbour.
10. Let my vvife grinde vnto another man: and let straungers bovv dovvne vpon hir:
11. For that is a loocensse and an iniquitie to be condemned.
12. It is a fire that deuoureth al to destructiō: yea & which shuld pluck vp the root of my reuene.
13. If I haue refused the iudgement of my seruaut, or of my mayd vvhe they striued agaynst me:
14. VVhat shal I do vvhen god standeth vp? And vvhat shal I ansvere vvhen he doth visit me?
15. Hath not he that hath made him made me [also] in the vvombe? And hath not he fashioned vs in the wombe.

W e haue here twoo protestations of Iobs making, which are worthie to be marked. The one is that he had liued so chastly, as he was clere before God frō seeking to abuse any mans wife. And the other is, that he had not bin proud nor cruel to wards such as were his vnderlings: & therewithal had bin so far off frō vaūting himselfe against his equals, that loke where he had most power, there he shewed himself most gentle and milde. But it behoueth vs to beare in minde, what hath bin said heretofore: that is to wit, that Iobs protesting to haue walked rightly before God & men, without doing any mā wrong: was not in any one kind alone, but in the whole law of god, according as he layeth forth the things that are conteyned therein, which doing of his ought also to be a speciall warning vnto vs. For (as I haue shewed before) it is not ynough for vs to indeuer to discharge our dutie in some one point only, & leaue the rest vndone. For God will not haue the things separated and dismembred, which he hath ioyned together in his lawe. VVherefore let vs beare in mind what hath bin set downe heretofore. Now let vs folow the order which Iob kepeth here, & marke how the residue is added. As touching that which he speaketh of aduoutrie: the mening is, that he offereth himself to suffer the shame of hauing his own wife abaqdoned to whordome, if hee had sought to abuse any mans wife. Let other men (sayth he) bow downe vpon my wife, 60 and let hir suffer that reproch, yea and let me indure it as well as she. If I haue bin led away, or if I haue layde wayte at my neighbors doore, that is to say, if I haue watched to do him any harme. And afterward he declareth why he abhorred whordome so much. (For saith he) it is a wickednesse, yea & an iniquitie that belongeth vnto Iudges: that is to say, which is worthie to be condēned. For it is a deuouring fire, and a thing that would pluck vp my welth by the roote. Thus ye see howe Iob continued in chastitie, and gaue not himself to the filthinesse of whordome, bicause he knew it was a cursed thing, & such an offence as God could not beare with. Now as touching the punishmēt which he setteth downe here, it is the iust reward of whoremasters and aduouterers: that is to wit, that the like shuld be done vnto them, as they haue done vnto others. And not only in this text is mention made of it: but we haue a notable example of it aboue all others in the person of Dauid. For although he were a holy prophete and a king chosen out among all mankind, hauing record that God had founde him according to his owne hat: yet notwithstanding we see what punishmēt fel vpon him for stepping once aside, and for rauishing another mans wife. For the Prophete Nathan declared Gods curse vnto him, saying: thou hast done this in secrete: but it shal be payde thee openly, and the sunne shall beare witnessse of it. Dauid had wrought so wilily (as he thought) that his sinne should neuer haue bene knowne to the world, but he should haue gone clere away, forasmuch as no man did reproche him with it, or mutter of it. But god reuenged his hypocrisie, & told him that although he had done the wickednesse in secret, yet it should come to opē light, & he should be shamed, and his sinnes be knowne to al mē. And how? It was a hideous thing that his own son should cause a trūper to be blown to assemble the people, and there in the open sight of the worlde, put the kings concubines to all villanie. Beholde here an incest agaynst nature: and yet God declareth that this happened not by casualtie. I is It (sayth he) that haue done it. As if he shuld say, let not mē loke only at the person of Absolon without going any further. True it is, that men ought to abhorre him for breaking the order of nature in that wife, for ouerthrowing al honesty, & for working suche villanie towards his father: neuertheless I also (sayeth the Lorde) haue wrought in this case, and men muste not thinke it to haue happened by casualtie or or aduerture, but it is I that haue done it, sayth the Lord. Seeing that God spared not such a Prophete, and a man indued with such excellencie, as he had led his whole life in sound vprightnesse, sauing in his fall with the wife of Vrias: If God I say, vsed such a rigour towards Daid whom he had chosen: how shall he spare the whorehunters that make a continuall trade and ordinarie art of abusing other mens wiues, and lie alwayes in way to bring their wicked purposes aboute? Muste they not needes feele that there is a Iudge in heauen, which will not suffer suche a wickednesse vnpunished? God therefore maketh such reprochfulnesse to return vpon themselues: but yet let them vnderstande, that they receyue a iust payment, and such a one as they haue deserued: and let them learne to humble themselues before God. Furthermore, when they heare it threatned, that if they abuse other mens wiues, their owne wiues also shall be rauished & defiled, & God wil raise vp whoremongers to execute his iustice: it ought to abate the réptatiōs of such as haue any feare of god at all. If a man haue any tast of the feare of god, or any reason: surely he wil be hild in awe at the hearing of such a threatning, wherby God warneth him. And therefore let every man make his profit of this text. And seing that god cānot abide any such locenesse. let vs pray him to gouern vs in such wise, as our wicked affections may be tamed, and this wicked lust may not raigne in vs, no nor haue any place in vs, nor accessē vnto vs. Marke that for one point. Furthermore, let vs marke also what is added concerning the crime: to the end we think it not straūge that god should punish so roughly. For in as much as we alwayes would measure our sins by our own meetyarde, and wee bring a false balance as was sayde yesterday: wee woulde (if it were possible) finde faulte with God, and accuse him of ouer great rigour in punishing our faultes. And that is the cause why I sayd, that we must mark wel how Iob addeth. that it is an ouer great loocenesse, yea and an outrage worthie to be condemned: it is a burning fire to deuour all things euen to destruction. This doth vs to vnderstand, that we must not iudge of whoredome after the cōmon opinion of men which make but a sport of it: according as we see how the scoffers iest at it, and many dispisers of God, & heathnisch folk make but a game of it. Men shall heare this diuelish blasphemie, it is but a venial sin: It is to be forgiuen, and such other things: and these things haue not begon of late dayes. And that is the cause also why S. Paule hauing spoken expressly of whordome, sayth: My freends, beware ye be not tempted with vain wordes. For by reason of such things the wrath of God cōmeth vpon the vnbeleuers. Sathan had at that time imbrued the world with such mockeries, that whordome was not counted so horrible a thing as it ought too be. S. Paule sayth it shall be to no purpose for men to bable and flatter theselues with such toyes. And why? For gods wrath shall neuerthelesse haue his course: and he hath shewed from time to time, that he cannot beare with whordome. And truly we ought to mark first of all, what it is to defile our bodies, which ought too bee the temples of the holy ghost. And other sinnes sayth S. Paule ar cōmitted in such wise, as the soyle and staine of them abideth not so much in the body of man, as the soyle and stain of whoredome doth. For it seemeth that whores & whoremongers would as it were wither their owne bodies, to beare their shame and dishonestie in them before God. If we considered well that by whoredome men do vnhalow the temple of God, and of his holy spirit, and dismember the bodie of our Lorde Iesus Christ: surely we woulde abhorre that sin more than we do. Againe, when aduoutrie and whoredome are matched together, it is a peruercting of all right and equitie among men. If a man rob another man of his goods, he shall be punished: a theefe shall be rebuked at all mens hands: he shall bee cried out on, and men will spit in his face: and yet aduoutrie is more than a simple robberie. For therein men rob not other men of their goods and substance only: but also of their honor, honestie, and all: and they rob not onely those that are borne, but also those that are yet vnfashioned in their mothers wombes. Againe, is not marriage a holy league or couenant, as our Lord nameth it in the scripture? If a man falsifie a couenant that is made in any bargayning, and selling, by conueying some secrete title or interest to himselfe, or by suborning some falsie witnesses: it is & ought to be punished. But beholde, the cheefe couenant that can bee in the worlde is broken and falsified: Solemne declaration is made of the fayth that the husband oweth to his wife, and the wife to hir husbāde: they come into the Church as it were in the presence of God: and they call vpon him to be their iudge, if either of them keepe not the promise that he hath made: and yet notwithstanding, al this commeth to nothing. So then if we considered these things aright: surely whordomes & aduoutries should not be suffered as they are, but euery man woulde abhorre them, yea and there would be none, but he would bridle himself, and become his owne iudge, and holde that determination for a law and rule: and if anie were so wicked as they could not be hild in the feare of God, and in religion: yet notwithstanding they should feare the threatning: and (to be short) it is certaine that men would be more zelous to cutte off such euill from amongst vs. Hereby we see that many which make profession of the Gospel, thinke not a whit of that which is told them. And although they do thinke that it is God that speaketh: yet notwithstanding they are not moued with it. And why? For Sathan hath doted them, they are so straught as they haue no reason nor vnderstanding in them. And therefore let vs remember this lesson whiche is conteyned heere. Then wherea. it is sayd, that whoredome is a great loocenesse, and a wickednesse to be condemned: let euery of vs cite himselfe before Gods iudgement, and take heede to keepe our selues vndefiled. And by cause it is aboue the strength of man so to do: and that it behoueth God to worke in vs, for the subduing of all our wicked lusts: let vs pray him too gouerne vs so by his holy spirite, as wee may abhorre that sinne, and haue alwayes before our eyes the vengeance that is spoken of heere. And although god punish not whormongers & aduoutries after that sort which is set down here: yet let vs assure our selues that he hath diu. rse meanes to do so, so as we cannot escape his hande. If a man haue inueigled an other mans wife, and God cause not his owne wife too fall into the like dishonestie (as it may come to passe, that a wicked mā shall haue a vertuous wife, and God shall pitie hir so, as shee shall be preferued, and not giue ouer hirselfe vnto euill, though hir husbāde be wicked: ) yet notwithstanding, let not hir husband therefore thinke he hath made the better market: for God shall well ynough find some other meanes. Let vs vnderstande then, that he hath chasticements inough in his coffers: according as it is sayde in the song of Moyses, that he hath terrible roddes which are vnknowne vnto vs, and which he can bring forth whē soeuer he thinketh good. Therefore let vs preuent his iudgement, and feare him, and stand in awe of him seeing he sheweth vs the fauour to warne vs afore hand. Againe if we bee yet so retchlesse as not to consider the warning that is giuen vs heere: let vs marke well that the holie Ghost doubleth the sayd threatning, in that he saith that it is a fire which deuoureth all to destruction, and plucketh vs his wealt by the roote. Needes must men bee worse than brutish: if this at leastwise do not waken them. For it is not only said, it is a loocenesse, or it is a sin that deserueth to be condemned: but it is a fire that consumeth all things, and goeth euen to the roote: it is an vtter destruction, that suffereth no substance to tarie vnwiped away. Seeing then that we heare that God manaceth vs in suche wise, to the ende we shoulde be afrayd of his wrath: Is it not high time to bethinke our selues nowe or neuer? Furthermore, let vs practise this doctrine after two sortes: that is too witte, let euery of vs profite himselfe by it after the sayde manner, and moreouer also let vs indeuer (as much as in vs lyeth, and euerie man according to his state and calling) to amende the euill amongest the people, and keepe oure selues pure. As touching the fyrst poynt, let euerie of vs looke to himselfe, and keepe good watch ouer all his affectiōs, for feare least he be deceyued. I haue shewed you heretofore, that it is not inough for a man to keepe himselfe from the deede doing: vnlesse he set such a watch ouer his eyes, as he haue not a ny vnchaite looks. For hee that looketh vpon an other mans wife with a wicked desire, is alreadye condemned of whoredome and aduoutrie before God. And what shall become of vs then, if we go to the hart? And what shall become of vs, if we proceed to lying in wayt and to watching to deceyue other mens wiues? So much the more then behoueth it vs to be vigilant in watching ouer our lusts: and forasmuch as they be stubborne, let euery of vs bethinke himselfe, and holde himselfe in awe vnder the fear of god. Also let vs haue an eie to the horrible threatening which God maketh against whordome, and be zealous to correct it, when we see it raigne amongs vs. For if we beare with it, & nourish it by our negligence: we shall be hild for bawdes and ruffians before God. It is not for any man to excuse himself: for he that is purblind or beetleblinde in that behalfe, and suffereth whoredome to bee committed, cannot cleare himselfe, but that hee is a bawde before God (as I haue sayde alreadye) and as much as in vs lyeth, wee do but heape vp the fyrewood of Gods wrath. Seeing that the house of a whoremaster must be consumed, and that there is a fire to deuoure all: If we indeuer not on oure behalfe too quench it, and too stoppe whoredomes from hauing their full scope among vs, that they may not bee commonly suffered: The fyre must needes spread through the whole town, & through the whole Countrey: and wee must needes feele Gods curse vndermining vs till we bee vterly consumed. And forasmuch as here is expresse mention made of Iudges: let all such as haue charge and office of punishing sinne, looke wel to themselves. For they shall be double bawdes, and double ruffians before God, if they suffer whoredome to slip before their eyes, and they themselves couer it, and make no reckening of it, but rather are contented that it shoulde continually haue more scope. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in this text. Furthermore, let vs beware, that we be not onely restrayned by some forced feare, for committing the outwarde act of whordome: But forso much as God is so gracious vnto vs, as to choose vs to be the temples of his holie spirite, and hath drawne vs to himselfe: let vs pray him to graunt vs the grace to serue him in all purenesse, not only of bodie, but also of minde. And forasmuch as we bee grafted into the bodie of oure Iesus Christ, and that he hath knitte vs into himselfe as his members: let vs beware that we do him not the dishonor, to defile our selues with such filthinesse. Ye see then after what sort the faithfull ought to induce themselves to chastitie, not through a forced feare, but by knowing the grace & honor that god hath done vnto the,

in that it hath pleased him to come vnto them after that sort. Therefore let the desire nothing somuch as to come vnto him by the meanes of our Lorde Iesus Christ. Thus much concerning the protestation that Iob maketh here of whordome. And now let vs come to the secōd protestation which he addeth: which is, that he was so farre off frō taking away of other mens goodes, that he vsed not anie pride or crueltie euen towards those that were his vnderlings. Men seruants & maid seruants in those dayes were not as they be now adayes: mē had them not for wadges, so as they were bouēd to do no more thā couenāt: but they were bondlaues euen to liue and die with them, & men possessed them as their Asses and Oxen. And this is well worthy to be noted: for although by mans law the master had power of life and death ouer his bondlaue: yet notwithstanding we see how Iob delt in that cace: that is to say, he restrayned and brided himself, because he knew that according to Gods law, those that haue such superiority must not abuse it, nor play the tyrants to tread reasonable creatures vnder their feete. Therefore wee ought to marke well what the state and condition of seruantes was in that time. For it will make vs knowe the better how great Iobs gentlenesse and vpright dealing was, in not taking libertie to do that whiche the worlde gaue him leaue to do. For he sawe it was not lawfull for him to do it before God. Nowe let vs marke the woordes that hee vseth heere. If I (sayeth hee) haue refused the iudgement of my seruauant, or of my mayde when they strided agaynst mee. For the worde stryue whiche he vseth here, signifieth to quarell or debate, and to be at some variance or pleading. Heere Iob meeneth, that although hee might haue stopped the mouthes of his men, & his maydes, & haue loden them with strypes when he had listid, so as none of them shoulde haue durst to quetch agaynst him: yet notwithstanding hee had giuen them leaue to pleade their good cace, so that although hee were neuer so angrie, yet if his seruantes had any reasonable excuse, they might freely debate the matter with him, and shew their right, so as he did not oppresse them by force. VVe see then that there was no pride nor crueltie in him. And he sheweth therewithall, how he was able to master his affectiōs in such wise, as he coulde be gentle in bearing with his inferiours. For (sayeth hee) hee that made them, made mee also, wee were fashioned all of one. This maye be taken, that we were fashioned all in one wombe, that is too say, wee come all of Adam, and are all of one nature: Howebeit, muste yet extende further. Iob then considered two things when he bare so gently with his seruantes. The first is, that wee haue one common creator, & are come all of one God: & also that we are of one nature, insomuche as it is too bee concluded, that all men though they be of neuer so base degree, (and dispyssed in the worlde) are neuertheless our brothers. For he that disdeyneth too acknowledge any man for his brother, must make himselfe an Oxe, or a Lion, or a Beare, or some other wilde beast, and disclaime the Image of God which is imprinted in vs all. Lo here the two reasons that Iob alledgeth, and therevpon hee concludeth, what shall I do when God commeth to visit me? should hee not lift vp himselfe agaynst me? Might I bee able to stande before his face? If hee shoulde call all my life to account, howe coulde I answer, if I haue beene churlishe too my seruantes? Lo heere a text which importeth a very great and profitable doctrine, if so bee that wee can vse it well. For if we ought to be so gentle towards our inferiours, that when it lieth in our hand to oppresse them, we must of our owne accorde bee a lawe, measure, and rule to our selues: how gentle ought we to bee towards our equals?

equalles? For it seemeth that if any man be subiect vnto me, I may vse such authoritie ouer him: as hee shall not speake, but I may do what I list to him: according as we see how men beare themselves in hand, that they may do much more than they may, and if god giue them an inch of authority, they take an ell; so as ther is no ho, nor measure with them. But surely it behoueth vs to spare those that are our inferiors, & aboue whom god hath aduanced vs. And what then must we do, when we haue to deale with our equals or superiors? A maister shalbe condemned before God, if he oppresse his seruant by violence, or if he be so presumptuous and stately, as he cannot abyde that his seruant should defend himselfe in a good quarel.
 And what shall become of the seruant if he be stubborne against his maister? What shall become of the child that setteth himselfe against his father? or of the subiect that riseth against his Souerain? Surely these things are lesse to bee borne withall. Then see we heere a generall doctrine comon to all men: which is, first that such as are aduanced to any authoritie, must knowe that Gods setting of them in that state, is not to giue them the bridle to vex others, and to trample them vnder their feet: but it beho-ueth them to refraine themselves alwayes in lowlinesse and mildnesse. Marke that for one point. For the authorities which is amongst men, ought not to haue such pre-heminence, that he which serueth, and is of low degree, should therefore be despised. True it is that a man should be maister of his owne house, and there is no soueraintie so noble as that. And therefore a man woulde looke too haue himself onely heard and obeyed in his owne house.
 Neuerthelessse, we see that a maister hath no such power ouer his men and maydes: but that hee ought too heere the patiently whe any wrong is done them. Then if a ma-ought to vse such gentlenesse towards his vnderlings in his own house: what ought such to do which haue authorities of iustice? For they haue no such power as masters haue ouer their seruants. They haue an honorable authorities & preheminence: but that is not to lord it ouer men, so as others should be in bondage to them. Nay rather let not kings and princes flatter themselves, neither let them beare themselves in hand that the world is made for the, but rather that they are made for the multitude. Hath not God stablished principalities and kingdoms for the common welfare? It was not to aduance two or three only aboue the rest: no, but it was to the ende there shoulde be some order and state of government among men. And therefore kings and princes ought to beware, that they liue in suche wise ouer their Subiectes, as they misuse them not, nor execute any tyrannie ouer them. For they shall be much lesse excusable, than are the maysters that deale cruelly with their seruants. And much lesse liber-tie haue they which are called to the state of iustice, and set as Gods officers to yeeld euerie man his right. If such forget themselves, or bee caryed away with pryde, God must needs punish them more roughly than the maysters that haue done any outrage or wrong to their brethren that serued them. Furthermore, is it so that suche as haue any authoritie ouer others must not exalt themselves? What shall they doo then which are of equall state? Howe ought euerie one of vs to liue with his neighbour? If a man exalt himselfe, whereas he ought to acknowledge himselfe equall and fellowe like, so as hee playeth the Bull: I pray you muste not such pryde bee ramed? And when a man that hath nothing in him but headie rashnesse, woulde take vpon him such authorities ouer his neighbours, as hee will not vouchsafe too looke vpon them but askew, and beare himself in hand, that all the worlde ought too quake at his looke: shoulde not God set his harde to suche braueries? So then let vs marke well this streyne. For it serueth not onely too teach mildnesse and gentlenesse vnto maysters, but also and of much more dutie to all men in generall. And therfore as we see that god will haue all inferiors to suffer and indure such as haue authoritie ouer them: It behoueth euerie of vs to looke to his owne state and calling, and to learne to frame oure selues vnto such mildnesse, as neither the maister do oppresse the seruant, nor the seruant striue agaynst his maister, but euerie man so discharge his owne ductie, as God may be serued aboue all.

 Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. And for too conuict vs the more, if perchance wee were so farre out of our wittes, that euerie of vs woulde take vpon him more than belongeth vnto him: let vs marke that when we fall to bee so proude, and become so cruel towards those that are vnder vs, wee shall not onely bee condemned by the mouth of God, and his Prophetes, but also the verie heathen men muste bee our iudges at the last day. I sayde euen nowe, that by the lawes of man, a maister in those dayes had power of life and death ouer his seruantes. And what sayde the heathen men thereof? It becommerh vs too vse our seruants as hyre-lings, that is to say, as folke that we haue taken for wages, and not as though they were our vnderlings. These are their owne wordes. If the vnbeleeuers that were at that time had such a regarde of humanitie, as it seemed to them that euerie man ought to bridle himselfe: euen although he had free libertie giuen to do what he list with his seruants: I pray you what excuse is there for vs, which are inlightned by Gods woorde: if wee haue not suche a consideration at the least? So then let vs marke, that if God aduance vs to anie authoritie, it is to trie our modestie. And if hee giue vs men seruantes and mayde seruantes, to bee vnder vs: it is to the ende too inure vs with the humanitie and vpright dealing whiche is spoken of heere: and to the ende wee shoulde shewe, that if God haue shewed vs anie speciall fauour: wee ought to thinke our selues beholden to him for it, and by meanes thereof bee prouoked to vse it soberly. And seeing that hee whiche hath all power ouer vs, doth ne-uerthelessse spare vs: It behoueth vs to followe him willingly as his children, and to resemble him in gentlenesse towards others.

Furthermore, when a man will vnder the colour of his authoritie, vaunte himselfe cruelly agaynst others: let vs assure our selues that that power of his is vterly peruerse. Yea (I saye) it is a signe of an ouer malicious nature, when a man aduanceth himselfe after that sort, by reason of his credite. Contrarywise, it is certaine that suche as are of a milde and louing nature, will alwayes spare their inferiours. And the more authoritie that God giuerh them: the more are they restreyned, yea euen of their owne accorde. For heere is no speaking of the constraynt that commeth by other men, like those which play the Lyamboundes, and vse all kinde of flatterie, while they are able to doo nothing, and afterwardes overpasse their boundes when they bee aduanced, shewing themselves to haue no mildnesse in them, but to bee of a slavillie nature whiche is counted a villeynous and detestable thing. And this ought to induce vs the more too the mildnesse whiche the holie Ghost commaundeth vs in this streyne. But the cheefe thing is, the well bearing away of the two reasons that we haue touched heerebefore: that is to witte, that wee haue one maker of whom all of vs do come, and that we are all of one like nature.

Thus ye see what we haue to consider to beat downe all pride and crueltie in vs when wee bee tempted therevnto.

Then if a man haue a householde, and God hath giuen him menseruants and maydservants, and he is tempted to vse vnmeasurable rigour agaynst them: let him seeke the remedie that is shewed vs here. As howe? If I handle my seruants cruelly, so as I plucke the bread out of their mouthes, and they dare not eat one morsell, for feare least I shoulde grudge at it: or if I holde them too hard to their labour, and (to be short) if I shew my selfe vnmerciful and churlishe towards them: agaynst whom doo I set my selfe? True it is that they bee mine: but therewithall, hath not God created and fashioned them? Haue not both they, and wee, one common mayster in heauen? And that is the reason which Saint Paule alledgeth, when he exhorteth maysters to beare with seruants. My freendes (sayth hee) although ye haue superioritie ouer them, yet haue you also a mayster in heauen. And suche as are exalted: ceasse not therefore to be subiectes. For God is aboue them. Therefore let them beare in minde, that they must render account to him that gaue them their seruants. Must they not needes bee restrayned when they haue this consideration with them? For haue wee it of oure selues? By what right come we to the superioritie which euerie of vs hath in his owne behalfe? Is it not a pawne that God hath put intoo our handes to keepe? Then ought wee not to be well aduised, that we may vse it according to his will? The heathen men themselves when they (intended to frame kings and princes too conformitie) had skill ynough too say: true it is that kings make themselves feared and redoubted, but yet can they not escape the hande of the heauenly Iudge: there is a God aboue them. If this be verified of princes which are in highest superioritie: what shall become of those whiche are in meane authoritie? As of maysters and mistresses? And furthermore, as (I sayde) let vs consider that wee haue all of vs but one maker. And if we can consider that we are all discended of one God: we must needes conclude that whiche is true: namely, that wee cannot oppresse our neighbours, but God must bee offended. Therefore let no man exalt himselfe in vanitie: for (as Salomon sayeth) hee that mocketh the blinde or the poore, dispyseth his maker.

Nowe there is a poore man, and I despise him, or I put him to some shame: true it is that the wrong is first offered to a mortall man, but yet dooth God steppe in betwixt vs, and taketh the iniurie as done to himselfe. Thus ye see what Iob, (or rather the holy Ghost) ment to be token in this story, i.e. when he sayeth that he which created the mayster, created the seruant also. So then when we be touched with any vaine presumption, to set more by our selues than by other men, and too couet such superioritie as euerie man shoulde stoupe before vs, and cast himselfe at our feete, and wee our selues haue our full scope: let vs come to this consideration: saying, yea although I be a mayster, God hath made my seruant, and hath fashioned him as well as mee. VVhen wee thinke after that sort, it will quaille our ouerweening, so as our hautineffe shall be repressed. And herewithall also let vs haue the seconde regarde that is spoken heere: namely, that we bee of one selfesame nature. For it is true that God hath also shaped the brute beastes, trees, and all other things: but hee hath not shaped men after the fashion of brute beastes: For hee hath giuen men vnderstanding, and printed his Image in them. On the other part, I cannot looke vppon another, but I must needes see my selfe as in a looking glasse.

Then seeing that God hath knit such a knot betwixt vs: I pray you dooth not he that goeth about to breake it, cutte off himselfe from mankinde? Dooth not hee deserue to be cast vp among Dogges: seing he acknowledgeth not the nature, which God hath put intoo vs all? Yes, but what for that? There are verie fewe that thinke on these things. For contrarywise, yee shall see that if a man bee exalted but one finger heigh: hee beareth himselfe in hande that hee is no more of the state of all other men. And therefore so muche the more neede haue wee too marke well this doctrine. For if in those dayes whé there was not yet such a light as there is now: Iob vnderstoode, that seeing God is the maker of vs all, and hath set vs all in one ranke: the same ought to correct the pryde of men, and to pull downe all their highe lookes and highe stomackes: I praye you what excuse shall wee haue at this day, when God sheweth himselfe to bee our father? Hee not onely sayeth that hee is the Creator of all men, as well of the poore as of the riche, and of the seruantes as well as of the maysters, but also he nameth himselfe their father: and therefore it beho- Mala. 1. b. 6.
ueth vs to haue a brotherhoode amongest vs, vnlesse we will renounce the name of our God, and cutte our selues off from his house, in steade of beeing of his householde. VVee see howe Iesus Christ the Lorde of glorie abaced himselfe so lowe, as too become the seruant of seruants. Also we haue one common heritage wherevnto we bee called as Saint Paule sayeth. Then seeing it is so: let vs learne to humble our selues, and therewithall too knowe that pride and crueltie do shutte vs out of the gate of Paradise. VVherefore let vs bee gentle and curteous towards those ouer whome wee haue superioritie, seeing our Lorde auoucheth them to bee his children: and that wee may bee garhered altogether in suche sort, as God may be glorified of all of vs, both great and small, and wee followe such order, as euerye of vs may discharge his dutie according to his calling, and all of vs yeeld honour too the great Lorde and mayster whiche is the common iudge of vs all. Phil. 2. a. 7.
Epb. 4. a. 4.

And so let vs fal down before the face of our good god with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to receyue vs to mercie, and therewithall to plucke vs back in such wise to himselfe, as we may desire nothing but to submit our selues wholly vnto him, and that notwithstanding any authoritie which he giueth as well to one of vs as to another ouer men, yet we may consider that there is one mutuall bond among vs, and one of vs is subiect to another, to the ende to discharge our selues of our dutie, and to walke after such a sort in brotherly vnitie, as we may all of vs with one common accorde and (as it were with one mouth) clayme him to bee our father. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly father, &c.

The. Cxiiij. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the. xxxj. Chapter.

16. If I haue disappoynted the poore of his desyre, or if I haue weryed the eyes of the VVy-dovve.
17. If I haue caten my morsels alone, and that the fatherlesse hath not had his part thereof.

18. (For

18. (For from my youth he hath bene brought vp vwith me as if I were his father, and she had bene vwith me from the wombe of my mother )
 19. If I haue seene a man perish for vwant of a coate, or the poore for vwant of a garment.
 20. If hys loynes haue not blisshed mee, if he haue not bene vwarmed vwith the fleece of my lambes.
 21. If I haue lift vp my hande agaynst the fatherlesse, seeing my helpe at the gate.
 22. Let mine arme fall from my shoulder, and let mine arme be broken from the bones.
 23. For I haue feared the punishment of God, and could not beare his burthen.

Ere Iob sheweth what manner of louingnesse he had to succour the poore and needie. He had protested here tofore, that he had not done any man wrong: but here he passeth yet further, namely that pitying the necessitie of suche as came to him for succour, hee releued them of his owne goodes and substance, yea euen without making them to linger for it. VVherein he sheweth himselfe to haue had a willing forwardnesse, that is to say, that hee was no sooner requested, but he employed himself, and delayed not from day to day, as those do that loue to be lugged by the eare. And this is the cause why he sayth, If I haue disappointed the poore of his desire: that is to say, if I succoured not the poore when I sawe him want and needie: or if I haue wearyed the eye of the widow. For if we wayte for any thing with a longing, our eye is alwayes vpon it, and when we looke ouer earnestly vpon any thing, oure eyes faynte and dazle. VVee see then howe Iobs meening is, that hee hung not downe his groyne in his bosome (as they say) when poore folkes came to desire his helpe, but succoured them out of hand. Also he addeth that he sawe not men sterus for colde which wanted rayment, but rather delt so with them as their loynes and sides blisshed him: that is to say, they felt the fauour whiche hee shewed them, They were warmed with the fleece of my lambes: to be short, hee sayeth, that he had not eaten his morselles alone, nor deuoured by himselfe the goodes that God had giuen him, but had giuen the widowes and fatherlesse part with him, whom (sayth he) I haue brought vp with me as their father. VVherein he doth vs to wit, that hee had bene a father too the fatherlesse. From my mothers wombe (sayeth hee) I haue had the widowe with mee, I haue taken vnto mee the poore that needed succour, and I haue neuer fayled them. And if it be not so, let my shoulders fall out of the socket: that is to say, let me bee dismembred, and let mee fall in peeces like a rotten carren. Let mine arme (sayeth hee) bee thrust out of ioynt, and let the bones of it be broken: Let the worlde see Gods great and horrible curse vpon mee and my bodie, (sayeth hee) if I haue done wrong too those that were feeble, and not able to reuenge themselues: like as if I haue lifted vp my hande agaynst the fatherlesse, and although I were able to do them wrong, for any helpe they shoulde haue at mans hande, and that iustice might vpholde mee in my wrong: yet notwithstanding, if I haue attempted any suche thing, let mee bee torne in peeces, and rot alieue. And that it is so, I was alwayes afraid of Gods scourge, for I was not able to beare his burthen. Herein he declareth as he hath done heretofore, that it was not the respect of men, or the shame of the worlde, or any other consideration that lifted him from doing euill: but that forasmuch as he saw that God was his iudge, therefore hee walked vprightly. And although he might haue gone unpunished to the worldward, without feare of being pursued by way of iustice or otherwise, and might haue taken libertie too do harme to the meaner sort, by reason of his credite: yet notwithstanding hee alwayes had a consideration too saye: verely, my God I knowe that thy wrath woulde bee terrible vntoo mee. and howe shoulde I be able to indure it? To be short, Iob sheweth heere, that his absteyning from sinne, was not for feare of punishment, (for he sawe none before his eyes) but for conscience sake, which compelled him to obey God, and to feare hys iudgement to come. This is the effect of that which is conteyned heere. And first of all we haue heere one lesson to shewe that wee bee Gods children: which is, that wee must bee pitifull to helpe our neighbors at their need. Almes deedes therefore are commended to vs here. It hath bene tolde you often heretofore, that this worde Almes importeth as much as mercy. Now we see that among other tytes, God chalengeeth this vnto himselfe, that hee is gentle and mercifull. Then can we not bee his children, neither will hee acknowledge vs for such, except wee labour too followe his example in this behalfe: namely, too bee moued to pitie when wee see any poore folke in aduersitie, and to go about to provide for them, euerie of vs according to his abilitie. True it is, that we may giue all our substance, and yet our doing shall not bee counted a vertue. For before the hand bee opened to giue, it behoueth the hart too bee touched with compasfion: But if we haue pitie of those which are in aduersitie: it behoueth vs also to succour them to our power. For (as S. James sayth) if I say to a poore man, my frend God helpe thee: therby I shew that I haue no loue in me. If I say, it is great pitie of this man, and yet in the meane while labour not too succour him whome I ought to relieue: it is a mockerie, and I am but an hypocrite. That is to say, I see there how God sheweth mee a pitifull face, and it is as much as if God gaue mee occasion too imploy my seife: and thereby I see that hee calleth mee: and yet in the meane while I make no countenance of it at all. If there were but one deoppe of kinde in mee, woulde I not indeuer to helpe such a necessitie for my part?

So then we haue to beare in minde in this text, that the holy ghost exhorteth vs to almes deedes, and that the same consisteth in twoo poyntes: that is to say, in beeing pitifull towards our neighbours, when wee see them in aduersitie, and also when wee haue such a pitifull affection as wee seeke the meanes too succour them, and euerie man streyneth himselfe too his power. True it is, that wee cannot steade all the necessities that we see, and therefore a Christian man may well mourne in his heart, without putting his hande to his purse. For it is impossible (euen for them that bee best minded) to helpe at all tymes. And therefore this pitifulnesse shall suffice them, and God accepteth it for an almes deed, as if the poore were nourished and fed by them: And when they haue thys compasfion vpon a poore man, it is as great a sacrifice vntoo God, as if hee had giuen and delt dole oute of a full purse. Neuerthelesse, it behoueth vs alwayes too looke that wee deale according too our habilitie. knowing that our Lorde hath made vs Stewardes of hys goodes which hee hath put into our handes, not too the ende that euerie of vs shoulde deuoure them by himfelfe alone : but that we ſhould communicate them too ſuch as haue neede of them. True it is alſo that no man can ſet any certaine ſtint in this caſe : and ſurely when Saint Paule ſpeaketh of it : hee ſayeth that God conſtreyneth vs not as it were of neceſſitie, but wyll haue vs do it of free deuotion. By the way, let vs beare well in mind, that if the poore do paſſe before vs, and we ſee their neede, and keepe oure purſes ſhette, ſo as we vouchſafe not to ſuccour them : It is a ſure ſigne that we bee as wilde beaſtes, and that there is not one mite of pitie in vs : and that wee our ſelues ſhall one day feele the lyke vnmercifulneſſe, if God ſende vs anye afflictions : and that although wee bee miſerable, yet ſhall no man bee moued at it, but men ſhall looke vpon vs with diſdaine, ſo as we ſhall bee ſhaken off, and left vtterly deſtitute. For it is the meature and wages which God is woonte to giue vnto all ſuche as are hardharted towards their neighbours : according as it is ſayde, that hee which is mercileſſe, ſhall haue iudgement withoute mercie. Yea and beſides that, men ſhall bee cruell to-wardes vs, according to our deſertes : wee muſt alſo in the ende appeare before God, who will handle vs wyth all rigour, bycauſe we haue not followed the goodneſſe which is in him, and which he woulde haue to bee oure rule and example. So much the more then behoueth it vs too bee mindefull of this doctrine which is ſhewed vs heere : namely that God thinketh it not ynough that we ſhould not only abſteyne from euil doing, and from hurting our neighbours, and from taking away other mens goodes, and ſubſtance. True it is, that it is alreadie a kinde of vertue when we can iuſtly proteſt that we haue cleane handes, and are not giuen too the euerie, deceyte, and extortion. But yet for all that, let vs not thinke wee are cleare quitte. For if God haue giuen vs wherewith to helpe ſuch as haue neede : if wee doo it not, wee bee blamewoorthie. And why ? For wee haue taken away Gods goodes, and put them too another uſe than hee ment. If a ſeruant bee put in truſt too receiue his mayſters goodes, and his maytter hath appoynted him too giue thus muche to ſuch a one, and to pay ſuche an other a ſumme of money that hee oweth : or if hee haue ſet him an ordinarie after what ſort hee will haue his goodes ſpent : if the ſeruant play the niggarde, ſo as one man commeth crying after him, pay mee : and yet hee will not part wyth a penie, and another commeth, ſaying, your mayſter willeth you too giue mee ſuche a thing, and yet hee will not let any thing go, and the houſeholde cryeth oute vpon him for breade, and hee letteth them ſterue for hunger, which labour in his maſters ſeruice : I pray you is it tollerable that the ſeruant ſhall an-ſwere, beholde ſir, I haue not touched one mite of your goodes, beholde ſir, I haue reſerued vnto you all that euer I had ? For the mayſter maye ſay too his ſhame : I haue not put my goodes intoo thy hande too that ende, For thou haſt done me ſhame, in that thou haſt not beſtowed my goodes where I appoynted thee, and nowe muſt I beare the ſlaunder of thy niggardſhip in pinching that which was none of thine. Nowe when the mayſter ſhall commen with ſuche a ſeruant : ſhall hee not condemne him for wicked ? Likewiſe God giueth vs hys goodes, to the intent wee ſhoulde relieue oure brothers with them. Nowe if on the contrary part wee bee ſo ſtrayght laced as there goeth no penie out of our purſes, nor one morſell of breade from our table : what ſhall become of vs ? Is it not a defrauding of them, whom God hath ordeyned to haue part of our ſubſtance, and a robbing of God in the thing that hee hath put intoo oure handes ? Then as I ſayde afore, let vs learne to be more mercifull. And although no man can taſke vs, too ſay, thou ſhalt giue thus much : yet neuertheleſſe, let euerie man ſtreyne himſelfe, and conſider his owne abilitie, knowing well that when wee haue done all that wee can doo : yet are wee not diſcharged. Thus then ye ſee, that the particular law which euerie man ought to haue : is, that his charitie ought too ſtretch it ſelfe farre and wyde, euen ſo farre, as wee may ſtill confeſſe our ſelues not too bee ſufficiently diſcharged towards the poore.

 And if wee do all that is poſſible ( although we come not too full perfection, ) ſo it bee not with niggard-lynneſſe or grudging, but of a free heart too ſuccour ſuch as haue neede : let vs assure our ſelues that our Lorde accepteth our almeſſe, as a ſacrifice of ſweete ſauour : yea euen though there be ſome faultineſſe in it, and that we do not the tenth part of that which we are bounde to do.
 Herewithall it behoueth vs to marke the circumſtance which is ſet downe heere, that wee cauſe not ſuche too linger as haue neede, ( for when we uſe ſuch delay, it is a token that wee haue not a free hart to do our neighbors good ) and that wee put them not off to another tyme, except it bee vpon good conſideration. For it may well bee, that a man maye bee pitifull, and yet notwithstanding inquire of the neceſſitie of the partie : but that is not the lingring whiche Iob meeneth, when hee ſayeth, that hee diſappoynted not the poore man of his deſire.
 For heere hee intendeth to expreſſe the lothneſſe that is in niggardes : namely that when a man deſireth any re-liefe of them, and woulde faine drawe a penie oute of their purſes, it is too their ſeeming, as if a man woulde plucke the guttes oute of theyr bellies : And therefore they woulde alwayes faine haue ſome releafe. They are lyke vnto an yll paymayſter : when men come too demaunde their dette, he knoweth well that hee muſt paye it, yea and that hee is well able to do it : But it doth him good too bragge with the money in his purſe a daye or twaine. Or elſe they are like a man that is led too hanging : hee delayeth as long as hee can, and when hee commeth to the mounting vp of the Ladder, hee falleth too preaching at euerie ſteppe : Euen ſo play theſe holdfaſtes when a man commeth to demaunde his dette : it maketh them alwayes to ſhrinke backe : and much more if a man come too aſke them almes. But if wee were charitable, ſurely wee ſhoulde not haue that lothneſſe in vs : wee ſhoulde not ſeeke ſuch reſpites : the poore ſhoulde not linger afore vs in ſuche wiſe, as wee ſhoulde haue oure eares beaten euer after with their cries : But we woulde indeuer to helpe them preſently as much as lay in vs. Ye ſee then what wee haue too remember in this ſtreyne : namely, that if wee will do almes that is acceptable vnto God, wee muſt not tarie till we bee imporrunately called and cried vpon. But when we ſee there is neede, we muſt hie vs to take order preſently : like as when wee our ſelues indure any aduerſitie, it ſeemeth to vs that men ſhall neuer come time enough to ſuccour vs. And why then deale not we likewiſe with others ? VVee neede to take none other meature, but that. For it is a true naturall rule, to do vnto others as we woulde bee done vnto. But we are haſtie to deſire ſuccour, and piteouſly ſlow to giue it. Ye ſee then what the cauſe is, why wee ought the better to mark this ſaying, that Iob made not the widow to linger, nor diſappoynted the poore of his deſire. And nowe he addeth, that he had not eaten his morſels alone, but had giuen the fatherleſſe, and the widowe part with him. VVhy ſo ? For ( ſayth he ) I haue brought vp the widowe with me from my mothers wombe, and I haue nourished the fatherleſſe as a father. Heere wee ſee a wonderfull example of bountifullneſſe and liberalitie.

For heere is no dooing of some little almes deede for a weeke, three, or foure: but Iob declareth heere: that hee had becne a father to the fatherlesse, and a defender too the wydowes, not onely in helping them, but also in finding them with his goodes and substance. VVhen wee heare this, I pray you ought we not too bee greatly alhamed? VVee can hardly and scarcely finde in our hearts too succour one among an hundred: so as if wee misse a whole score of tymes, yet we thinke our selues well discharged with some lighte almes to some one man: not that we prouide for him as were requisite, but by giuing him some little peece of coyne as we passe by them, as if wee woulde say, go and shift for thy selfe some otherwhere. Is it not a great shame for vs that Iob should be giuen vs here for a myrrour, and that in his persone our Lorde should shewe vs our duetie, and yet notwithstanding, we do nothing? But yet that which is conteyned heere, ought too serue to oure learning and instruction. And contrariwise, it serueth to condemne vs, inso much that there shall neede none other recorde before God, to reprove vs of our beastly crueltie, at leastwise if we folowe not that which is shewed vs heere of Iob. True it is, that although we haue not this perfection, yet will not God sayle to accept vs as I haue sayde. Inso much that although our almes deedes bee not such as they ought too bee: yet will God take them in good woorth, so we haue the sayde compasfion towards suche as are in distresse, that we indeuer to do them good, and that our doing of it be with a cheerefull minde. But in the meane while, if we cannot matche Iob to the full, shall wee not therefore followe him? Shall we not at leastwise labour aloofe, to fashon our selues after his example? Shall we not go towards the same marke? VVell then, we be not able to bring vp the fatherlesse, yea and though we haue wherewith, yet our infirmitie holdeth vs backe from employing our selues to the vttermost. But yet at the least wee ought to haue some compasfion: let vs doo somewhat, though we do not all. And againe, although we cannot attaine to the marke that Iob came vnto: at leastwise let vs trauell towards it, seeing that God calleth vs. But is it not a greate shame that wee doo nothing at all? or else if we remoue but one legge, we grinde our teeth at it, as these loyterers do, who when they set forwarde one foote, do thinke that they drawe a whole mountaine after them. And againe, if they lift vp one arme, they frowne at it, and grinde their teeth: and in stead of putting forwarde, pull backwarde. VVhen we go to worke after that fashon, is it not a token that there is no willingnesse in vs? Therefore if we cannot come to such perfection as Iob declareth himselfe to haue had, which thing he declareth not in way of bragging, but to the intent that we should be the more moued: let vs at leastwise follow his example. For God knowing that we become neuer the better for single reaching, setteth vs forth lookingglaffes, to the ende we shoulde haue the lesse excuse. If a man aske, how then, must we giue to all men without difference? The answere heretoo is, that the holy ghost intendeth not too take awaye discretion from almes giuing, so as men shoulde not looke to the well bestowing of it: for if we should go to it without discretion: euery man should beas it were drawne drie, and in the ende the poore should be left succourlesse: for the boldest would beare all away. And what maner of men are the boldest? Such as are least to be pitied: For they will counterfeyte themselves to bee poore, onely to rake all to themselves: Their onely seeking is too haue double and treble, and they care not though other men suffer hunger and thirst. Therefore it is good that men shoulde vse discretion, and looke narrowly too whome they giue: specially considering the lewdnesse that is now a dayes in the worlde: For there are so many hypocrites, as it is pitie too see. Hardly shall a man finde one amongst a hundred, that is woorthie to be succoured. For although they bee poore in deede: yet notwithstanding, men are loth to do them good, bicause as soone as they get any thing, by and by they fal to gluttonie & drunkennesse, and so God maketh them to walk it all away. To be shorr, we be come to the full measure of all iniquitie: inso much as we ought too vse great discretion, and narrowe search when wee giue. But in the meane while let vs beware that we seeke not couert for our niggardynesse vnder the shadowe of this discretion. For God misliketh not that men shoulde haue regarde to whom they giue, to the ende their benefite may be well bestowed. No, but it behoueth vs first to be fully resolved after this maner in our selues. As for me I minde not to spare according to the measure that I haue: I will doo good according to my abilitie: I desire no more but to finde where I may succour. VVhen a man is so resolved, let him inquire whether his almes maye be well bestowed on this man or that man: for he maye freely do it. But if a man say to himselfe, I were best to be well aduised where I giue, and alwayes take occasion of excuse: to say, I finde no pouertie there, so as hee is glad to haue some occasion to stay him from giuing: It appeareth manifestly, that such a man seeketh nothing, but too exempt himselfe from releeuing those that haue neede of his helpe. Then if wee intende to inquire, it behoueth a good will to go before: that is too say, that our seeking be but to do good: and then let vs boldly inquire. For we may well do it, so we be first and formest well minded, and seeke not couert for our niggardinesse. Thus yee see to what poynt we must come. Yet notwithstanding, our searching also must not be too narrowly. For it is impossibill that we should not be deceiued in well doing: and although we do our best to trie things, yet notwithstanding wee must needes bee overseene in giuing some almes to suche as are vnwoorthie. And that is the cause why Saint Paule exhorteth vs to do good without ceasing. For wee shall haue many lettes to hinder vs. First we shall see some malicious persons that will misreport vs, and therevpon will followe vnthankfulnesse, which dealing is able to thrust vs out of the way. But yet must we alwayes be of good courage, and holde on still, whatsoeuer come of it. To bee shorr, according to that which I haue sayde alreadye, we cannot set downe particular rules for all thynge, but the generall rule which God giueth vs, ought to suffice vs: which is, that wee must haue a kinde harte, inclined too pitie and compasfion, and a desire to benefite and succour such as haue neede of our helpe, and we must not make them to linger in wayting vpon vs: but rather haue a plaine meaning heart, to the ende our hande may be open, whensoever need requireth. Thus yee see in effect what we haue too beare away heere. And further let vs marke well, howe Iob addeth immediately, that he had not seene him perishe which wanted clothes: nor suffered him: too sterue for colde, that had no rayment to couer him: but their sides and loynes (sayth he) hath blessed mee, and bene warmed with the feeses of my sheepe. Here Iob sheweth that he had laboured all kinde of wayes to do almes deedes, not onely in giuing meate and drinke to such as were a hungred, and athirst, but also in clothing the naked. And truly if wee intende to be mercifull, it behoueth vs to succour the necessities of our neighbours, in such sort, as we see them: for it is not inough too succour them in part. True it is that all men cannot doo as Iob did: for wee haue not so many thousandes of cattell as hee had, who might haue bin accounted amongst the great Princes of these dayes in respect of his reuenue: according as we see he had not onely yokes or hundreds of Oxen, but whole droues, yea as many as could be kept in fiue or fixe Villages, or rather in a whole Countrey, which was much more. For we haue seene well ynough, that his substance was onely Cattell, as the Cattell of a whole Countrey. Euerie man therfore cannot attaine to that. But howsoeuer the world go, let vs consider our own abilitie: for according 10 therunto it behoueth vs to indeuer to do good, like as we know it is said that the widow which gaue but two mites, was more praised & commended of Christ, than such as had cast in great summes of money. The reason is, bicause she had giuen hir whole substance, whereas the others had giuen but a small portion in respect of their riches. So then let euery one of vs consider his owne state: and whē we see our neighbors want either meate, or drink, or clothes, at leastwise if we be not able to succor thē otherwise, let vs pray god to haue pitie vpon them, & to help them: 20 but therewithal, in any wise let there be no fault in vs, that they were not ayded and succored. Ye see then what wee haue to beare in mind, in that after Job had spoken of his meat, and that he had delt part of it to the hungry: he addeth also, that he had clothed such as should haue sterued for colde, if it had not bin for his helpe. Yea and he sayth, that his loynes blessed him. VVherein hee declareth that they had occasion to cun him thanke for that he had releued them after that sort. And therewithal he sheweth vs, that he looked not for his rewarde at mens handes, nor 30 sought to be discharged to Godward for doing good, but was glad of the good that he had done, bicause he knewe it was acceptable to God. And this is a lesson which wee ought to beare well in minde. For although men bee vnthankfull towardes vs, and such as wee haue done good vnto, do grudge agaynst vs, and render vs euill for good: yet notwithstanding we haue not lost any thing by doing them good. And why? For (spite of their teeth) their bellies will blisse vs before God, if we haue fed them: and if we haue succored them any otherwise, the very thing it 40 selfe will answer for vs. True it is, that sometime they will be so malicious, as to say: yea may it is to much purpose. And wherefore am I beholding to him? According as we see nowadayes that the poorest are proudest, and such as a man hath induced to do good vnto, will fonest speake euill of him. This we shall see, but let vs not therefore be wery. But if we cannot away with such vnthankfulness, let vs marke the saying that is set downe heere: which is that the thing which we haue done shall blisse vs before God. Is there any man that playeth the verlet, 50 and grudgeth and murmureth when another man hath helped him? Very well: yet doth he carie his sides still: and if a man haue clothed him, his bodie must needs blisse him before God. True it is that he hath no such intent with him: but howsoeuer he fare, God loketh vpon the body that was clothed: and that blissednesse shall come in account before him. If a man haue bin fed (as I saide,) his belly must needs speake: and although his mouth bee churlish, so as it turne good into euill, & nothing cometh out of it but payson: yet notwithstanding our Lord will 60 accept the blissednesse of the almes deed that the mā shall haue don. Thus ye see, that to the end we may be prouoked to succor such as haue need of vs, we haue to marke that we must not respect whether they be able to recompence vs, or to counteruail the good that shall be don thē, or whether they be such as will be thankfull: but put the case they be cleane contrary, yet shall we not haue lost our labor, bicause God accepteth the sacrifice that is don. Ye see then what is imported in this saying, that the fydes or loynes of a man that is nipped with colde, do blisse such as haue clothed him. And on the contrary part let vs marke, that although the poore aske not vengeance against vs, nor complain of vs: yet notwithstanding their sides will curse vs in suffering smart, when we shet our eyes and haue no pitie of them, but say, I am at mine ease, and I care not how othermen fare. Now if we haue bene so cruell harted: it is certaine that when wee vouchsafe not to succour the poore and needie that sterue for want of reliefe, God will make their sides and loynes to speake, and although the parties themselues open not their mouthes to cōplain of our vnmercifulnesse: yet notwithstanding the anguish that they suffer, crieth and complayneth before God, & vengeance ensueth according to the complaint: and it shall come so too passe, although men speake not a woorde, as I haue said afore. Now after that Job hath spoken so: he addeth, that he lifted not vp his bande against the fatherlesse, no sthough he saw his helpe at the gate: that is to say, although he could haue done it without punishment of men. For in those times men fate in iustice at the gates of townes, as places of most resort. Job then saith, truly I could haue made one mā quake, and another to run away, & I could haue bin as thunder amongst them, and no man shoulde haue opened his lips against me. Why so? For a man of credit shall bee borne with, and folke shall not dare complain of him: and if they do, the Iudges shall not dare to redresse it. Then although I had my full sway, and that iustice would haue suffered all that I had attempted: yet notwithstanding I abused not my credite, neither did I trample poore folke vnder my feete. If there were a fatherlesse child, I sought not to profit my selfe by him. For we know that fatherlesse children are oftentimes put to the spoyle. Job then sheweth, that he was of such an vpright minde, that when he could haue taken away other mens goodes, he neuer went about it, nor neuer ment to make his owne aduantage of other mens cost: no not though he had libertie to do it on mans behalfe. Howbeit, he addeth a reason why. For (sayth he) Gods punishing and casting downe of men made me afrayde. As if he shoulde say, I did not respect whether men would speake euill of me or no: but onely I hid mine eyes fast vpon god who is my heauenly iudge. And here we see, first of all that there hath bin great corruption in all times, and that such men as haue bene ordeined to yeeld euery man his right, haue not discharged their dutie therein. Then is it no new thing, if Iudges do nowadayes reach out their hand to the wicked sort, bolting and bearing thcm in their wickednesse. For it hath always bene an ordinarie custome. And therefore such as are in state of iustice, ought to looke the better to themselues for the discharge of their dutie before God. But what? This corruption hath reigned a long time, and at this day it hath full scope more than euer it had. If a man say: it maketh no matter, seeing the mischeef hath bin of so great antiquitie: truely it is not to be excused for al that. Also there was nor such knowledge of God at that time, neither were men so wel acquainted with the doctrine as they bee nowadayes. VVherefore if they that do nowe sit in the seate of iustice, and haue the mace in their hande: do suffer extortions, or see a poore man troden vnder foote, and make no account of it: or winke at men in authoritie, when they take more vpon them than becōmeth thē: what excuse is there for them, seeing their eares are dayly beaten with admonitions and warnings, and they are told their dutie both toward god, and toward the people that is cōmitted to them? VVherefore let vs marke vpon this doctrine, that if there were then such corruption ordinarily in the worde, that the Iudges

Iudges supported the wicked: it behoueth vs to cōfort e-uery mā himself, whē we see the like cōfufion at this day.
 And it must not greue vs ouermuch, though we can get neither right nor reason against such as do vs wrong, nor be able to bring our matters about. Then standeth it vs on hande to be armed with pacience: For we see it hath beene Gods will to exercise his seruantes after that sort at all tymes. He could well haue stablished iustice in the time of Iob: but it was his will that many poore folkes should smart. VVhereas we be in the like case at this day, he intendeth by that meanes too teach vs what it is to suffer. Marke that for one poynt. Yet neuer-thelesse it behoueth those that are in the seate of iustice, too looke well too themselues. For inasmuch as men are inclined to that vice, they shall soone be thrust from their duty if they take not good heed, according as we see by to many exāples. There is also a second lesson, which it behoueth vs to remember: whiche is, that wee respect not what is lawfull for vs too the worldwarde, but settle our sight vpon God after the example of Iob, so as hys feare may withhold vs from hurting or wronging any of our neighbours: and this lesson is very needfull. For I pray you what is it that men regard nowadays but how they may scape the reproof of men? It is enough if a man can bring his matters to passe: and in the meane season, what is the order of iustice? Euē such as it was in the time of Iob. There was ayd at the gate for such as did extortio, for such as deuoured the widowes, and for such as troubled poore folkes. Alas, nowadays we be come to the same extremitie, and muche worse: insomuch that if a poore man be troden downe, he shall haue no redresse at all. And why? For they that take away other mens goods, that beguile, beate and trouble poore folkes, and that ouerhoote themselues into all wickednesse, are lawlesse persons and growne to such a boldnesse, as they thinke there is not any law to restreine them. Againe, the Magistrates on their side, are fearefuller than women, there is no stoutnesse of Gods spirite in them: or else they be contented too dissemble and too pleasure men, yea and more and halfe to agree with the wicked. And although they knowe that things go amisse: yet notwithstanding they haue no zeale to repress them. The other are yet worse: for they seeke nothing, but that all shoulde be oute of square, and that the worlde shoulde come too such extremitie of euill, as there shoulde be no feare of God nor honestie, nor any thing else but confusion. Lo at what poynt we bee. Now then the most part of men, thinke of nothing but howe they may scape when they haue done amisse. Looke vpon a Royster that lyeth in wayte for other mens goods: I warrant you if there be any meanes to trappe them, hee espieth it. Yea but hee must come to account. Tush, what for that? If I may but bribe such a man (sayth he) the matter is by and by dispatched. If I can carie him a present of such a thing, I winne his hart: and he shall win me two or three mo: and againe if I do such a thing, I shall be sure of the fourth: and if I may make vp halfe a dosen on my side, my matter is out of criē. See how they that haue the sworde of iustice in their hand are set to sale like brothels, so as they haue no more shame nor regard of their honour, nor of any thing else. For nowadays the shiftes that they will pretend, shall be so villaynous, as there shall be no colour of honestie in them. VVe see it, and so euery man taketh leaue to rob, to poll, to oppresse, and to commit all maner of extortion. And why? For if the matter be brought before a iustice, all is marred. And therefore it is a sentence well worthie to be noted, when Iob protesteth that notwithstanding his credit & authority, & that men stood in such awe of him, that euen the iudges themselues durst not to haue delt with him: although there had bin no cōplaints made of him, yet for all that he absteyned of his own accorde frō doing euil, & concluded not with himself that he might therefore do a thing bicause me permitted it: but had always this saying for a bridle, that is to wit, that gods punishments made him afrayde. Therefore let vs learne too walke in soundnesse, & in a good cōscience: and when we intend to do any thing, let vs examin whether god permit it or no: and if we see that it displeaseth God, so as he hath forbidden and disallowed it: let vs let it alone: & although men sooth vs, yea and giue vs libertie to do what we list, yet let vs kepe our selues from doing it. And why? For it behoueth vs to come before the heavenly iudge. And what shall it auaille vs then to haue escaped the handes of men: For it shall be but a doubling of the vengeance. And why? Bicause we shew well by our deedes, that we feare men more than God. And do you not see how wee offer him too heynous iniury in preferring mortal creatures & wretched carions before his Maiestie? I shall be afrayde of men, and in the meane while mocke God, and hys Maiestie shall bee nothing with mee. Againe when wee haue corrupted iustice either by hatred or by fauour, or by some other crooked meanes, so as we haue wron the Iudges: see ye not yet a second outrage which we offer vnto god. Is it not a defiling of that which he hath halowed?
 But iustice is a holy thing: and we vniallow it when we turne those vnto euill which are set in that seate, and whome God hath appoynded of purpose, that the autho-ritie of his name shoulde shine in them. If we (I say) doo go about too thrust them aside: is it not a poynt of highe treason to God? And for that cause I sayde that we doo but double Gods wrath vpon vs, by shifting oure selues from mens handes after that sort. Yee see then that wee muste fasten oure eyes vpon God, and looke vnto hys iudgement, to the intent we may of our own free accord refraine from doing euill when wee may do it, although the same be permitted vs on mens behalfe. And therewithall also let vs marke, that this our fearing of Gods punishment, must not be onely when we feele it, but before it come at vs. For it is too late for a man to feele that God is his iudge, when he is striken with his hande: and therefore let vs be afrayde when God threatneth vs, and before the strokes light vpon our heads. Ye see then how euery man may retrayn from euill doing, if by the eye of fayth they foresee the punishments a farre off, which are prepared for all euill doers, and for such as trouble their neighbours. And God sheweth vs great fauour when he warneth vs aforehande, to the end we might preuent his vengeance. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in mind.
 And the conclusion which Iob addeth is this: bow shall I beare bis burthen? It is too shewe vs that thing whiche is spoken too vs by the Apostle: namely, that it is a right dreadfull thing to fall into the handes of the liuing God. Heb. 10. f. 31 VVe are afrayde of mens punishments which touch but the bodie: and what is done for the fire of Gods wrath which consumeth all things, and yet neuer goeth out, but burneth in such wise as we must be forced to continue in it, yea and to indure it without end? VVhy regard we not that? So then let vs not bee moued with this punishment of Gods, and let vs only looke to kepe our selues frō euil doing for shame or punishment of the world: but let vs consider well in our mindes and in our vnder-standing, and let vs assure our selues that when men shall haue determined to execute the cruellst tormentes vpon vs, that can be deuised: yet notwithstanding all of it is nothing in comparifon of Gods heaue vengeance.
 Though a man bee layde vpon the wheele, or nipped with with pinsons, or burned aliue, notwithstanding that these be verie greuous torments: yet do they passe away, and continue not for euer: and againe they do, but grieue the bodie. But beholde, the wrath of God which consumeth all things, as a flaming fire that burneth without end, and a worme that gnaweth and biteth the hart within. VVhen the scripture vseth such similitudes, it is not to expresse what is in it to the full: but onely to giue vs some little inckling of it. Therefore let vs marke well, that the vengeance of God which is prepared for the wicked, is an intollerable burthen: and let the same prouoke vs to walke in feare and pacience, assuring our selues that if men vse crueltie and violence against vs: there is a iudge in heauen to reuenge it: wherefore let the same restreyn vs from euill doing, though wee may safely do it for any worldly respect. And let vs take heede that our conscience bee pure, & that the knowledge of god be our very rule to guide vs: & let vs alwayes loke vpward to behold him that hath set vs in this worlde, declaring vnto vs that we must one day come to an account: before his iudgement seate.

Deu. 32. d. 22

Now let vs faldowne before the face of our good god, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs fele them in such wise, as we may craue forgiveness, and be so sorie for them, as we may indeuer our selues wholly to amend them, and to profit from day to day in his obedience, vntil we be fully reformed. And that we pitying such as are in necessitie, may indeuer to succour them, and be like minded vnto them: praying our good God to haue pitie vpon them, and to succour vs also: and that although we bee vnworthie of it: yet notwithstanding, seeing he hath already made vs to feele his goodness and mercie, we may not doubt but he will bestowe more and more vpon vs, and increase his grace from day to day in vs, if wee flee too him for helpe with true humilitie, according as he calleth & allureth vs daily vnto him by his worde. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also, &c.

The Cxx. Sermon, which is the fift vpon the xxxj. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the. 21. 22. and. 23. verses, and then vpon the text which is added beere.

24. If I haue set my hart vpon golde, or if I haue sayd to the vvedge of golde, thou art my hope.
25. If I reioyced of being rich, or bicause my hande had founde abundance.
26. If I haue looked vp to the shining Sunne, or to the Moone vvalking in hir brightnesse.
27. That my hart hath bene deceyued in secret, and my hand hath come to my mouth.
28. That vvere damnable vvickednesse, and I had denyed the God aboute.

Esterday we saue the protestation that Iob made concerning his vp-right walking, not for feare of men: but bicause hee had hys eye alwayes vpon God: knowing that he is the iudge of all men, and that it behoueth vs too come before him to make our account. Hee sayde expressly, that hee trusted not in his owne credite, nor had any such foolish imagination with him, as too make himselfe feared, as riche men doo which haue wherewith, so as the greater fort are alwayes puffed vp with pride, and we see that the poorer fort and such as cannot reuenge themselues, are troden vnder foote and turmoyled, and men doo them wrong, iniurie, and shame. Iob then sayeth that hee had absteyned from all iniurie: towards men, and not gone about to do them any euill. And why? Bicause he knewe he could not escape the hand of God. VVherevpon we haue to shewe, that if euill be bolstered heere bilowe: It behoueth vs to vse pacience, seeing it hath alwayes been Gods will to exercise his seruantes after that sort: that is to wit, that they shoulde suffer many outrages, and not bee mainteyned in their good right, and that iustice should be blinded, or rather turned vpside downe. Let vs mark then, that we must not thinke we haue gayned any thing, by scaping the hands of men: for we do but kindle the fyre of Gods wrath vpon vs, by cause that hee that hath defaced iustice, is guiltie of treason agaynst God. And moreouer men abuse themselues, when they thinke a thing to bee lawfull because it shall not be punished at mennes handes, and therevpon take more boldnesse, wherewith God is the more greuously offended. Therefore his curse muste needs increase and kindle more and more vpon vs. Nowe after that Iob hath protested that hee had not abused the fatherlesse, nor done anie outrage to the weak: hee addeth, That hee had not put his trust in golde, nor sayde vnto his riches, I rest my selfe in you, nor reioyced when his goodes increased. VVe haue alwayes to beare in minde what hath bene shewed heere tofore: that is to witte, that Iob toucheth not some one vertue alone, but comprehendeth generally the whole rule of good life which God hath giuen vs. And in very deede it is not ynough for vs to haue performed a peece of the lawe (if at leatwise we were able to do it: ) But it behoueth vs to indeuer to rule & franne our life through out according too all things which God commaundeth. In like maner then as Iob hath protested that he had not shewed himselfe cruell towards the fatherlesse and pore: so nowe he sayth, that he was not puffed vp with pryde and presumption in himselfe, nor did set the more store by himselfe, bicause he was rich. Surely this was a singular vertue. For we see commonly, that if a man haue som little thing to brag of, men shal scarce beare his foolish ouerueining. VVe need not to be kings nor princes to puff our selues vp, or to vaunt our selues, for as sone as a man hath but a little goods, by & by he is vpon his tiptoes, and spreadeth out his wings. And his vaingloriousnesse is not only in men, but also in women. And surely we see that as sone as womē haue wherewith, they flow in pompe & exceede their degrees. And againe a man doth so change his countenance, as he vouchsafeth not to loke vpon his neighbors but at one side, & he wil not scarce open his mouth: or if he do, it shalbe so scornfully and proudly, as men wil be afraid to speak any more to him. Thus ye see the pride that appeareth euery where. But what would come of it, if they had great heapes of golde and siluer, or if they had all things at will as Iob had, when he sheweth that his riches were multiplied? Is it not a hard thing then that a man should alwayes be so milde and lowly when he hath his coffers full of gold and siluer, as he should set nothing by them? VVe see therefore that God wrought marueylously in Iob, when hee suffered him not too bee blinded blinded with vaine presumption for all he was so riche, but caused him to possesse his riches in such wise, as hee was alwayes readie to leaue them, and did not set his hart vpon them.

Nowe looke what Iob protesteth of himselfe, the same is commaunded to vs all, according as we see it is sayd in the Psalme, If ryches increase, set not your hearts thereon: that is to say, make them not Idolles too put your trust in them: neyther bee you puffed vp with haughtinesse. And in this respect doth Saint Paule also say, that Couetousnesse is Idolatrie. For it is vnpossible that a man should be couetous to gather muche, and not therewithall bee possessed with this pride, that he would be had in estimation in respect of his goodes. Nowe when this pride reigneth in mē: vndoubtedly there is a double Idolatrie. The one is that he beareth himselfe in hande, that God would saye him if hee had not wherewith to helpe himselfe: and againe, if hee bee riche, he dispyseth God, and thinketh himselfe to be so well fenced, as he needeth no other thing. To be short, it is a very drunkennesse. For like as when a man is drunken, he maketh himselfe to beleue wonders: so when a man is rich, he presumeth vpon his riches, and remembreth no more that he is a mortall man, but forgetteth himselfe in such wise, as he sticketh not to aduance himselfe against God. And so let vs marke that Iob protesteth not here any thing of himselfe, which God commaundeth not to all the faithfull: which is, that they shoulde not set their mindes vpon riches: though they flowe vnto them. Secondly, let vs marke, that it is a rare vertue among men, and therefore that wee haue the more neede to imploy our whole indeuer therevnto, seeing wee cannot restrayne oure selues without greate difficultie, and withoute bringing of oure selues vtterly vnder foote. Therefore let vs indeuer to holde our selues at suche a stay, as ryches may not carie vs away, nor blinde vs so farre, as too make vs sette our hearte and minde vpon them.

And further, let vs marke that it is an intollerable vice, for a man to trust in his goodes. And why? For is it not an exceeding heynous offence for a man to robbe God of his due honour, and too giue it to a deade and senselesse creature? But dooth not hee make a God of his ryches (as I sayde afore) which presumeth so much vpon them? Ye see then that God is bereft of his honour, and golde and siluer which are but deade creatures haue it: And is not that a monstrous thing? VVherefore let vs learne, that we cannot presume of our selues vnder the colour of the goodes whiche God giueth vs: but wee must become rancke traytors too God, and foule Idolaters as S. Paule termeth the couetous folke. And that is it which Iob also ment to expresse in saying, If I haue set my heart vpon golde: or if I haue sayde too the wedge of golde, thou art my trust. Here Iob bringeth in a talke betwene himselfe and his money. Verely a man will not talke vnto his ryches when hee openeth his chest and coffer: hee will not enter communication with them, as though he had some bodie to talke with him: but in this maner of speeche, Iob doth verie well set forth the follie and ouerweening of riche men in trusting too their ryches. And why? They haue there as it were a secret cōference and conspiracie with their golde and siluer. True it is that they speake not, but yet without speaking they cease not to haue the thing which Iob sheweth here. VVherefore as often as wee bee tempted to put our trust in creatures and earthly things: let vs call too minde that it is a robbing of God of his honour, and a purloyning of it from him, to giue it to a thing of nothing: and therefore let vs abhorre such dealing. Therewithall also let vs remember the condemnation that Iob layeth here vpon vs: and let vs compare oure selues with him. Yea what a shame is it that a man should aduance himselfe, and giue vpon his fethers, and thinke himselfe to be a ioue fellowe, bicause hee is worth I wote not what? Beholde, Iob possessed great treasures, and had gathered golde and siluer in heapes: and yet notwithstanding he alwayes hild himselfe in such lowlinesse, as if he had beene a poore man. VVhat a shame then is it for vs to bee lifted vp wyth a little, seeing that Iob was not blinded with all the great abundance that God had giuen him? Marke that for one poynt. And furthermore let vs marke, that it is a great tryall of a man, when he is rich, and yet notwithstanding becommeth not proud, but continueth alwayes milde, and without presuming of himselfe, walketh as if he were no better than another man. Ye see here a good tryall.

And therefore let vs not thinke we haue atteyned any great vertue, if we be not cometo that poynt. For there is not a man to be found in this Citie of Geneua, no nor in this whole Countrey, that is lyke vnto Iob. And truly if a man shoulde gather all the rycheest men together, they were (as you woulde say) nothing at all in comparison of that which Iob possessed. They that boast themselues nowadayes of their ryches, are as if they shoulde thinke themselues to bee great men, bicause they be but mounted vpon a blade of an Onyon, if a man shoulde compare their wealth with Iobs. But when our Lorde doth so holde men at so lowe an ebbe: let them assure themselues that it is for their profite, and that if they were in greater wealth, they woulde burst: and it woulde bee a cause of their decay, and they woulde mounthe so hie, as they shoulde breake their necke. So then let vs marke, that oure Lorde procureth oure benefite and welfare, when hee suffereth vs not to mounthe so hie. For wee coulde not weelde our good fortune (as they terme it:) we see that although we haue no occasion too aduance our selues, and that oure state bee as simple as may bee: yet notwithstanding wee are alwayes desirous to growe great, yea euen as it were in despite of God and nature. And what a thing were it then if wee had all things at will?

Lo heere the thing which ought to make vs too beare our estate with the better pacience, euen though it bee neuer so base and small. Yea and let them that are of the poorest sort vnderstande, that God intendeth to humble them, and subdue them, to the ende they shoulde not bee gyuen vnto pryde, as by all likelyhoode they woulde bee, if hee did not brydle them, and holde them short by suche tryall. Howsoeuer the worlde go with vs, let it content vs, that our Lorde knoweth what is meete for vs, and hath it in his hande, so as hee cannot bee letted too giue it vs, when hee knoweth it too bee good and expedient for vs. And thus yee see what wee haue to marke in effecte concerning that is sayde heere, that Iob did not putte his truste in Golde, nor vaunted himselfe though hee sawe hee was riche. But yet is that well worthie too bee noted which he addeth: that is too wit, that hee reioyced not when his hande coulde beape vp muche, nor when goodes came to him from al places: nor reioyced at al in that behalfe.

It shoulde seeme at the first blishe that Iob spake more by himselfe, than is possible to bee founde in a mortall man. For it can not bee that a manne shoulde not bee gladd when hee hath the goodes: It is impossible that hee shoulde bee as a blocke of woodde. VVhat doothe Iob meene then, by saying that hee reioyced not? Let vs marke for an aunswere, that hee speaketh

Eph. 6.2.11

Eph. 5.5.

Eph. 5.5.

Deut. 12.4.7
 speaketh not heere of all maner of gladnesse. For it is a naturall thing for a man to be sadde when he is poore, and too bee glad when hee is riche, and this gladnesse is not euill of it selfe. For it is written thou shalt eate and drinke, and bee merie before the Lorde thy God. Therefore if oure Lorde giue vs goods, so as wee haue wherewith to cherishe our selues, it is too the ende we shoulde bee merrie. And as I haue tolde you alreadie, so little doth this mirth or gladnesse displease God, or is too bee condemned in it selfe: as it is rather a token of the fayth and feare whiche wee haue towards him, for somuch as wee learne thereby too prayse his goodnesse, and to yeeld him thanks for the benefites which he dealeth vnto vs. But Iob speaketh here of a blinde reioycing, such as is among worldlings, which are caried away with their goods: so that they forget God, and remember no more their owne frailtie: but are exalted in themselues. This then is a frantike ioy, an inordinate ioy, a ioy that turneth vs away from God, and maketh vs so drunken, as we know not any more what we be. And this is it that Job ment heere. To be short, he doth vs to vnderstande, that he hilde his minde so bridled, that when riches came to him, he did indeed receyue them at Gods hande, and was glad of them, yeelding God thanks for increasing them after that sort: but yet notwithstanding he did not therewithall repose his felicitie in his riches. And this is the principall poynt that we haue to note. For wherin do men abuse themselues, but in that they rest vpon these transitorie things, whereas they ought too bee led further? VVhen there is any speaking of the welfare and felicitie of men: It behoueth vs all too tende vnto God, and to assure oure selues that if we bee separated from him, wee bee vnhappy, and that all the goodes, pleasures, and honours whiche wee can possesse, are as many condemnations vpon vs. Thus ye see how it would behoue vs to seeke God, when there riseth any question concerning oure welfare and happinesse. And on the contrarie part wee see howe men busie their heades about corruptible things, insomuche as they make their God of them, one of his golde and siluer, another of his honour and credite, and a thirde of his pleasures. VVhen a man desyret to bee riche, beholde the marke that hee shooteth at. He setteth before him, that to bee riche is a happie case: and in the meane while hee letteth God alone, and giueth him quite ouer. The man that seeketh to bee exalted to dignitie and credite, is so rauished with it, that he careth not to be separated from God: for that is all one to him.

A whoremonger, or he that is giuen to any other wicked lust, beleueth that all goeth well with him, and hee is glad of it so as hee may inioy his desyre. VVe see that whereas men ought to tend and trauel to Godward, they rest themselues vpon corruptible things. And so let vs marke heere that Iob reioyced not in his riches, but in the goodnesse of God that made him riche. But yet coulde not this bee sufficiently vnderstoode, if it were not declared more familiarly. Not that the wordes are ouerdarke of themselues, but bicause wee woulde alwayes vse some hypocrisie with God, as though wee were wilie ynoughe too beguile him. Men then hope euer too scape by theyr startingholes, when they do but halfe knowe themselues: and therefore if a man say at one woorde, that wee muste not reioyce in riches, but in God that giueth them: the veryest niggardes and the veryest pinchpeanyes in the worlde will alledge this excuse, and make protestation with full mouth. Oh, I? I reioyce not in my riches: but for somuch as God hath giuen mee them: I glorie onely in him that gi-deth and gouerneth mee. Lo howe men beeing full of hypocrisie, seeke also some fayre colours too vernishe their filthe withall: and therefore I sayde, that it was needfull too expounde better this sentence, of reioycing in God and not in riches. VVhat then dooth that import? That hauing an eye too God, who hath giuen vs the goodes that wee possesse, wee shoulde vnderstande that therein hee meeneth too shewe himselfe a fathertowards vs: and that seeing hee is our father, it is a good reason also that wee shoulde bee children on our fydestowards him. But Gods children wee cannot bee but wee muste vse brotherly loue towards men, bearing in minde that the goodes which wee haue, are layde as a pledge in oure hande by God for the releuing of our neighbours that haue neede.

And further let vs vnderstande, that God will not haue vs tyed too these earthly things. If wee regarde God, wee will immediately haue an eye too the endlesse life that hee hath prepared for vs in heauen: and then shall wee not bee wedded too these corruptible things, neyther shall wee make riches too bee as dyrt and myre too wallowe oure selues in. Suche as gyue their heartes ouer vnto riches, are as it were in a quamyre, as men saye heere. For like as these, after they haue plucked oute one legge, sinke deeper in wyth the other, so as they cannot get oute: So those that putte theyr trust in this worlde, are so farre vnable too rayse vp themselues to Godwarde, that they stagger, stumble, and reele: and too bee short, cannot get out of the gulfe wherein they bee plunged. On the contrarye, beholde heere howe our Lorde offereth himselfe to vs, and calleth vs to the heauenly life, as if he shoulde say, hie you apace too mee, marche yee ouer the worlde, and be not wedded to it.

Therefore if we followe this encouragement whiche God giueth vs. It is certaine that we shall haue none other desire but to go forwarde to the heauenly lyfe, and wee shall not bee hilde backe by the goods of the world. Heerewithall also let vs marke, that it is no reioycing in God, except we be contented with him alone, according as it is sayde in the sixtenth Psalme, The Lorde is mine heritage, my portion, and my longing. Nowe then if wee haue this contentation, it is certaine that wee will not passe for all worldly goodes whensoever it shall please God to bring vs therevntoo, sobeit that wee possesse him alone, who can neuer bee taken away from vs. VVe heare also howe it is sayde vnto Abraham, I am thine exceeding great reward. By that saying, God intendeth to driue vs vnto him, and to holde our hearts and mindes fast settled in him without raunging heere and there. So then wee see nowe what it is too reioyce in God, and not in riches. For (as I haue declared alreadie) if a man reioyce in God, it behoueth him too shewe as well in wealth, as in pouertie, that his heart is not wedded to worldly goodes: in wealth, by not beeing letted to follow the way that God setteth afore him, and too discharge himselfe of his dutie towards his neighbours: and in pouertie, by beeing pacient when it shall please God to bereeue him of all the goodes that hee had, so as hee commeth too this conclusion, yet am I not separated from my God, it is not ynoughe for mee that I am in his fauour, and therefore nowe it behoueth me to bee quiet, for he is the thing in whome I ought to take all my rest. This is the effect of that which Iob ment, and of that whiche hee intendeth too teache vs by hys example, when hee sayeth, that hee reioyced not in his riches. It is also too bee noted that this reioycing caryeth a thankesgiuing with it. That is too saye, when wee haue haue wherewith to reioyce in God, it behoueth vs also to glorifie him: acknowledging that wee haue not anie thing but of his meere goodnesse. Furthermore, pryde also is condemned in this saying. For whereas we be forbidden to reioyce in riches: it is to the end we should not vaunt our selues in them, too thinke our selues better than other men. And this is it that Sainct Paule sayeth to Timothee: warnethe riche men of this world that they be not proude and hie minded, but that they trust in the lyuing God. There Sainct Paule sheweth that which wee haue touched already: namely that it is a rare vertue and not verie rife to bee founde, that a riche man should be lowly and haue no pryde in him to prayse himselfe aboute others. And yet for all that it is not possible for vs to reioyce in God, but this pryde muste bee thrust vnder foote, and our hartes bee wholly ouermaystered. Forasmuche then, as men cannot attayne therevntoo without great hardnesse and greate streyning of themselves aboute all theyr power: Sainct Paule sheweth the conuenient remedie, which is to trust in the liuing God. For if we wist what it is to trust in God: it is certaine that ryches should not carie vs away. Then muste it needes followe, that suche as are wedded too their riches, know not what it is to trust in God, neyther passe at all for him or his grace, according also as I haue sayde already, howe it is not for naught that Sainct Paule in another place termeth couetousnesse, Idolatrie. After that Iob had protested so, hee addeth: If I haue looked vp too the Sunne when he shyned, or to the Moone walking in hir light, or if I haue layde my hande vpon my mouth: for surely that were a beynous thing, it were a renouncing of God aboue. Some haue expounded this sentence, as though Iob should protest that hee had not worshipped the Sunne, and the Moone, bycause that in olde tyme the same was a verie common superstition, specially in the East Countreyes, and Iob was of those partes, as wee haue seene heerebefore: and so it should seeme that Iob ment to declare here, that hee had not done as moste men did among whome hee liued, that is too saye, hee had not woondered and gazed at the Sunne and the Moone, nor attributed any godly Maiestie vnto them, nor made Idolles of them. And surely GOD telleth hys people expressly by Moyse, that they muste not bee so blinde as to worshippe the Sunne and the Moone. For what is the Sunne? True it is that hee hath a woonderfull light in him, and that wee see there some markes of Gods glorie. In like case is it with the Moone. And that also is the cause why it is sayde, that they preach vntoo vs, and that God speaketh vntoo vs, as it were by their mouth, to the ende wee should be allured too come vntoo him. But therewithall God sayeth vntoo them: if you worshippinge the Sunne and Moone, you are vnthankful. For too what ende haue I created and fashioned them? It is to the ende yee should knowe mee, even mee that am the Creator of them. If yee do the contrarie, your vnthankfulnesse will be doubled. For what is the Sunne? your seruant. What is the Moone? your handmayd. VVherfore doth the Sunne shine, but to giue you light, and to make the earth frutefull, according as God giueth him that vse?

Sothen, seeing that the creatures (howe noble soeuer they be) are subiect vnto vs, and God hath ordeyned them to do vs seruice: Is it not a soule vnthankfulnesse for vs to make Idolles of them? This exposition is verie true: but yet it agreeth not too the present place. For heere Iob ment to vse another similitude, of purpose to go forwarde with the matter that wee haue treated of already: namely that hee had no presumption or pryde in him. For wee see howe the proude sort do cast vp theyr nozes intoo the winde (as they saye) and take not themselves to bee of the common rate of men, but make I wote not what a stately countenance, as though they would separate themselves from this mortall life. And their pryde extendeth not onely too their neighbours, but they also looke so loftie euerie where, that they preace before God with suche a statelynesse, as the Sunne and Moone (though they be farre aboute vs) are notwithstanding not highe ynough for them, but they ouerlooke them, saying: where are wee nowe? VVhich of vs is the greater? VVhich of vs is the higher? Iob then ment to expresse mennes foolishneesse in aduancing and setting out themselves out of measure, and (to bee short) in that they vouchesafe not too holde themselves in the common traine, but would be greater than God graunteth them to bee.

Thus ye see what it is to looke vp to the Sunne when he shineth, and vnto the Moone when shee walketh in hir brightnesse. And yet neuertheless, we see that our Lorde giueth vs there a token of our feeblenesse. For we cannot looke vpon the Sunne, but our eyes are dimmed out of hande. True it is that God would haue vs to reioyce in the light of the Sunne, and hee maketh him to walke in the Skie to do vs seruice. VVe see howe hee iourneyed to giue vs light: and besides that, we knowe also that the Sunne giueth liuelinesse to our bodies, and wee see that the earth is made frutefull by his warmth. For from thence do wee drawe our substance and nourishment: but yet therewithall oure Lorde putteth vs in minde of oure frailtie, to meeken vs in that wee cannot looke vp, but our eyes shall be dimmed. Those then which looke vp after that sort vntoo the shining Sunne, and to the Moone in hir light, would faine shew themselves valiaunt fellows, as it were in spite of nature, and that there is more in them than in all the worlde beside. But Iob protesteth that he was none suche, and therewithall he addeth also, that his heart was not beguiled in secreete, so as his hande should be layde to his mouth. VVhen hee sayeth that hee was not beguiled in secreete by hys heart: It serueth to expresse the better, that hee had not onely bene curteous and lowly towards men, but also had bene continually as a little one before God, notwithstanding that men prayed him: and that though euerie man did him reuerence, so as hee was dreaded of the whole worlde: yet for all that, hee gloried not in anie of all those things, infomuch that if an Anatomie had bene made of his heart, and that all that euer was within it had bene sounded and gaged too the bottome: a man should not haue found any haughtinesse. This is the saying which hee vseth: and afterwarde he sayeth, that hee kissed not his hande, or that his hande came not too his mouth to be kissed. Some expound this saying, that he comended not his vertues to make them meritorious, or to settle the trust of His welfare vpon the goodnesse and holinesse of his life. This doctrine is good, and that exposition is of it selfe notable: For it was vttered by a man that liued in a verie corrupt time. For Sainct Gregorie (as men call him) who liued in a time of ignorance and corruption, and was afterwarde Bishoppe of Rome, declareth that it is a beastly wickednesse, yea and an vnter renouncing of God, for a man too trust in his owne desertes. And yet nowe adayes it is the cheefe article that is in controuersie betwixte vs and the Papistes. For wee say, that our saluation is grounded vpon the free goodnesse of God, and vpon the death and passion of our Lorde Iesus Christ, and that we be saued by faith onely only: and contrarywise the Pope will haue euerie man to be his owne sauour. But yet here is one that was Pope of Rome, which neuerthelesse can skil to say, that it is a renouncing of god, & an outrageous wickednesse for me to kisse their handes, that is to say, to trust to theyr owne works to make them meritorious vertues. This doctrine then is good and profitable: but yet notwithstanding this text must be taken more simplie, than too concerne Jobs vertues. True it is that they are comprehended in it: how becit as wee haue seene afore, hee speaketh generally of all the occasions that men take too trust in creatures and themselfes. Therefore he sayth, if my mouth haue kissed my hande, that is too say, if I haue leaned to mine owne credite or to any thing else, or if I haue beene so beastly as to make Idolles of my goodes, and to honour them: (for this woorde kisse betokeneth to do homage, or honour.) Then if my mouth haue kissed my hande: that is to say, if I had that vaine selfe trust that I did any homage or honour to my selfe: If I haue done so (sayth he) let God curse mee. For out of doubt, that were a renouncing of the liuing God, or the Soueraine God. Heere wee haue too marke, that the sayde highmindednesse is an intollerable thing before God. And this manner of speeche of looking vp to the Sunne whiche Job vseth, is to be marked well.

True it is that naturally our countenance looketh vpwarde, and that God woulde there should bee a difference betweene vs and the brute beastes in that behalfe. For he hath giuen the beastes as it were hanging lookes: bycause they looke but downwarde too the grounde: but man hath his countenance lifte vpwarde, bycause hee looketh for a better and excellenter state in heauen: And in verie deede it is to the intent wee should alwayes looke vp aloft, to seeke God and his heauenly kingdom: but in the meane while this is no let, that wee should not humble our selues. And this also is the cause why Dauid protesteth, that hee medled not with great matters, nor with wonderfull things that were to high for him. This maner of speaking is partly like vnto the similitude that Job vseth. Dauid sayeth, Lord thou knowest I haue not walked in great things. Howe so? Is it not lawfull for men to deale with great matters? The state of iustice is honourable, and the carying about of Gods worde is a great thing also: and to bee short, there is not that man which findeth not some let in his vocation. If a man instruct others, or if he take vpon him but too teach children in a schole: eyther of them both are creatures fashioned after the Image of God, and he ought too refourme them: And is not that a great matter? If a man haue a whole Countrey too guide, is it not an excellent matter? Yes, but Dauid speaketh of the puffing vp of the heart when wee woulde aduance our selues. For wee knowe that he had to deale with matters of great waight: and therefore hee addeth, nor in wonderfull things that are about me: that is to say, I had no desire to deale with the things that passed my capacitie. And Job sayth here, I looked not vp to the Sunne: that is to say, I did not cast vp my noze, nor play the royster too aduance my selfe agaynst God, of all the time that I was in reputation of the worlde. Heereby then wee see (as I touched afore) that this foolish lust of men to make themselfes esteemed is an intollerable thing before God. What is to be done then? It behoueth vs to come too the remedie, which is lowlinesse. Seeing that God forbiddeth vs to lift vp our countenances on high, let vs cast them downe with our owne good will: For we haue sufficient cause so to do. If wee looked well vpon our selues, we woulde continually practize this prouerbe, namely, that hee that knoweth himselfe best, will set least store by himselfe. But forasmuch as we are loth to knowe our selues, and what our state is: It is no wonder though we be so caried away with this foolish pryde, as we coulde finde in oure heartes too stie about the Clowdes. Wherefore let vs marke, that it standeth vs in hande to examine well oure owne wantes, to the ende we may be restrayned too all modestie, and be able to protest that we haue not cast vp our heades, but that we haue alwayes looked downward in acknowledging that we haue not whereof too make anie boast. Marke that for one poynt. Secondly, when it is sayde, that Jobs heart was not led away in couet. Let vs beare in minde, that humilitie or lowlinesse consisteth not onely in the outward apparence towardes men: for we shall see many which are meeke and gentle to all outwardlihood, and yet in the meane while ceasse not to foster a foolish selfe weening in their heartes, and too haue an estimation of themselfes. VVee see howe all these hypocrites are outwardly framed vnto lowlinesse: when notwithstanding they are inwardly so proude, as they are readie too burst with poyson agaynst God. And what a thing is that? They bee humble outwardely amongst men, and seeme as simple as sheepe: and in the meane while, they play the Bulles in iustling agaynst God. As for example, all suche as glorie in their owne vertues, and thinke to earne Paradise (as all the religious rabbie doo in the Popedome) do certainly lift vp themselfes agaynst God, insomuche as they make account of theyr owne merites: and that is much worse than to pretende a statelynesse towardes men. If there be a man that is puffed vp with vaine pride, that setteth out hymselfe in a brauerie, and that thinketh the ground beareth him not: Euerie man will mocke at him: It is a stinking folly, and cannot bee borne withall. Now if such a presumption sette it selfe agaynst God, although it be hidden inwardely, I pray you, is it not muche more villeynous?

Then let vs marke well, that it is not inough for vs to beare a sweete and amiable countenance, and too pretende a milde behauiour towardes men: but wee muste looke that our heart be not led away in secrete, and that we haue no pride hidden within. For although it appere not to men: yet shall it not fayle to be condemned of God. And therewithall let vs marke, that if couert pride bee too bee condemned: then shall they not scape whiche spreade oute theyr winges, and vaunte themselfes openly. And let vs vnderstande, that our Lorde setterh them heere as it were vpon a Scaffold, to the ende we shoulde knowe the vice wherevnto wee are all inclined, and whiche reigneth in vs till God correct it. Furthermore, as touching the kissing of his handes: I haue tolde you alreadie, that that manner of speech importeth a doing of homage, or honor: and it is not without cause that the holy Ghost hath vsed such speech: for there is not any thing wherein men do more falsely beguile themselfes, than in taking vpon them the honour that belongeth vnto God: and that is a plaine spyting of him (as Sainct Paule declareth). Therefore it is to bee concluded, that vntill such time as men do vtterly distruste themselfes and mislike their owne vertues, they shall neuer be throughly humbled as they ought to be, neither shall they honour God as becommeth them, and as hee deserueth.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue heretofore done: & that seeing we be so miserable, we may throughly consider our owne wantes, and learne too shake off all pride:

pryde: and that forasmuch as our Lord sheweth vs so often that all our welfare, felicitie and glory consist in him, wee may learne to seeke them there, and so to mortifie all our fleshly lustes, as Iesus Christ may reygne there peaceably, as vnto whom all souerayne dominion is giuen, to the intent that all knees should bow before him: and that in asmuch as it behoueth vs to passe thorough this world: and the things that may holde vs backe there, are all conuenient for the necessities of our lyfe, he suffer vs not to be still intangled in them, but that wee may trauallye to-warde the heauenly kingdome, and so vse the creatures which he hath ordayned to our vse, as wee may not make them Idolles, and that wee may nother thorough misgouernment nor thorough any other outrage be wedded to this worlde, but so passe thorough it, as wee may alwayes still go forward to be gathered vp into the euerlasting rest which is purchased for vs by our Lord Iesus Christe. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all &c.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the 26.27.28. verses, and then vpon the text which is added here.

29. If I reioyced at the aduersitie of mine enemy: or vvere glad vwhen euill befell him:
 30. Or if I haue suffered my mouth to speake euill of him, or to vtter curses agaynst him:
 31. If my household folke haue not sayd, vwho shall giue vs his flesh to eate? vve are not satisfied:
 32. If the straunger did lodge in the streate, or that my gate vvere not open for them that trauallye by the vway:

Haue begon already to expounde the sentence where Iob protesteth that he looked not vp to the sunne and the moone. And the effect of my saying was, that hee declareth thereby that he was not puffed vp with pryde as those are which presume vpon themselves and thinke they are of great value, trusting either in their owne richesse or in their credite, and therevpon despising other men, yea and thinking themselves to be no more subiect vnto God. Iob then protesteth, that he was not puffed vp with such pryde as to challenge any worthinesse at all to himself: and he addeth, that that were a renouncing of God on bygh. For he had sayde afore, that it was a heynous offence and woorthy of death. And here wee see, howe God abhorreth that highmindednesse of men, when they would aduance themselves aboue measure. And thereof we may gather, that lowlynesse is a sacrilize most acceptable to him of all others. Also of our owne nature wee do not easely abace our selues: in this behalfe it behoueth a man to be as it were brought to nothing, that he may not esteeme of himself, if he intend to be taken and reputed for humble before God. For humilitie or lowlinesse is not an imbaicing of our selues when we haue wherewith to magnifie our selues: but it is an acknowledging that there is nothing but wretchednesse in vs, and that if we would open our mouth to alledge any thing for our selues, we shal find nothing but vtter confusion in vs, so as if our heart conceyue any vaine presumptiō, the same is but wind, which may well burst vs, but neuer feede vs. Thus ye see what the true and right humilitie or lowlinesse importeth: namely that a man should not esteeme of himself, according also as in very truth wee haue no reason so to do: and whosoever setteth by himself, must needs be ouerblinde and brutish. For he that entreth into himself, and examineth all his vertues thoroughly: shall finde that he hath none of them, but of Gods mere grace, and that he is bounde vnto him for them, yea and that all the vertues which God giueth vs, are matched with as many infirmities, so as wee cannot but cast downe our eyes. And therefore as for those that flatter themselves nowadays through ouerweening: they not only beguyle themselves, but also robbe God of his honour, and by that meanes become ranke traytours to him, and moreouer vtterly renounce the liuing God as it is sayde here. Truly this is right harde at the first sight: howbeit when al is well considered, it is easie to iudge, that Iob exceedeth not measure and reason, in saying that he which flattereth himselfe renounceth God. Why so? For it is not ynough to confesse that there is but one God: but it behoueth vs also to knowe him as he is, and to reserue him his due honour and all that belongeth vnto him. For if I bereeue God of any parte of his glory to decke my selfe withall: what am I? shall a wretched worme of the earth and a rotten carrion set so much by himselfe, that God should be abaced, to the intent that he should be exalted? Is not this a mingling of heauen and earth together, and a peruerting of the whole order of nature? And againe when God is so robbed, & his glory as it were put to the spoyle: is it not a renouncing of him? For men acknowledge him nomore to be such a one as he is, but rather do vtterly disclayme him. Therefore let vs marke well, that it is impossible for men to aduance and preferre themselves, but it must needs be as a kinde of renouncing of God. And here yee see also why it is sayd in the Psalm that we haue song, that the proude which stande vpon their owne vertue and strength, trusting therevnto, and challenging so much vnto themselves as they thinke no harme may touche them: do conclude in their heart that there is no God, and to the vttermost of their power reiect all religion. True it is that they speake it not with their mouth: but yet for all that it is so in deede. For the holy Ghost which searcheth our priuities declareth that it is so. And therefore lette vs learne to honour God and to put away this false imagination, that all pryde may be beaten downe in vs. For it is impossible that a man should offer seruice vnto God without humilitie. And (as I haue sayde) wee cannot be humble except wee acknowledge our selues to be nothing, nor nothing woorth, and that all glory ought to be reserued vnto God. Furthermore lette men esteeme as much of themselves as they list: and yet for ail that they shall feele God agaynst them as their mortall enemy to their vtter confusion. For he that exalteth himself, rusheth agaynst God: but he that humbleth himselfe, leaneth vnder his hande. If wee knowe our owne wretchednesse, it will as it were beate vs downe: and then will God reach vs his hande to lift vs vp and to set vs in his lappe. But will we needes go about to truce to our owne strength? it will be to harde an incounter for vs : which shall serue to breake our heads be wee neuer so prowde. For God must shew himself our aduersary when there is such presumptuousnesse in vs. Yee see then what wee haue to remember in this streyne. But let vs marke that this looking vp to the Sunne and the Moone, (that is to say, mens losfinesse in presuming vpon themselves) may be of twoo sortes : the one is, when vnder colour of their richesse, or of some honour wherein they be placed, they forget themselves and thinke not any more that they be mortall creatures. VVhen they are come to that point, God may wel punish such blinde pryde, according as it is a sonde thing and woorthie to be scorned of the whole worlde. For what is our life ? or what are all the appurtenaunces of it ? But there is an other maner of pryde : which is, that men so flatter themselves, as they thinke they haue both wisdom and power to gouerne themselves, and that they can deserue much to godward. Now when men presume so farre of themselves, as to challenge the prayse of their owne saluation, they must needs stumble with a deadly fall : bicause the principall poynt which God reserueth to himselfe, is that wee should know our selues to be in state of damnation, and vtterly forlorne and past recouerie, and that we should recouer no hope but only in his free goodnesse. VVhen this doctrine is defaced : it is as much as to exalt men to the ende that God should bee brought to nought, and it is all one as if men would put Gods honor to the spoyle. VVherefore let vs learne to cast downe our heades, assuring our selues that if wee could glory in God alone, being beaten downe in our selues and hauing corrected this foolish self weening wherewith we be puffed vp : God would releue vs and make vs partakers of his glory, and we might beleue that all the goodes which he hath, do belong vnto vs. Haue wee nothing on our side ? God is rich ynough to supply our wats, & we may assure our selues, that he will not fayle vs in any thing, according as the Scripture sayeth, that although men be poore and wretched, so as there is nothing in them wherof they may boast : yet notwithstanding God is their glory and will couer al their vncléanesse, so as they shal not be ashamed to go cheeke by cheeke with the Angels of heauē, as Gods children and members of our Lord Iesus Christe. Thus much concerning the humilitie or lowlinesse that I spake of. And when Iob hath spoken so, he addeth another protestation : which is, that he reioyced not when any inconuenience happened to his enimies, nor was glad when he saw thē fall, nor bad giuen his mouth leaue to cast forth curses vpon them : yea and that he had so persisted in that minde, that he had not giuen eue to his bousholde seruants to prouoke him to reuenge : but did neuerthelesse restreine himselfe, notwithstanding that there came fyrebrands to moue him therevnto. Yee see then what this protestation of Iobs containeth : that is to wit, that although menne did beare him ill will & indeuered to hurt him & to put him to losse, yet notwithstanding he rendred not like for like, nor (which more is) nourished any secrete hatred in his heart. And this protestation is well woorthie to be noted, bicause it is one of the hardest things that God commaundeth vs. And that is the cause why the hypocrites in the papacie haue not bene ashamed to falsifie the holy Scripture, in saying, that our Lorde Iesus Christs willing of vs to loue our enimies, is but a counsell and not a commaundement. VVhat moued them to vse such blasphemy ? It was bicause they measured Gods commaundements by our strength : they had an eye to mans abilitie : and when they saw any thing surmount our power, they concluded that God did not then commaund it : for (to their seeming) God requireth nothing of vs which wee are not able to

performe. Verely they ouershot themselves to far in that poynt, and their hypocritie was tootoo grosse. For let vs examine all the rest of Gods commaundements, and see whether we can fulfill any of them : and we shall find that we cannot haue so much as one good thought to begin withall, and much lesse be able to stirre one finger. And how then can we apply al our strength to it ? But these hypocrites abuse themselves with a false imagination that a man is able to performe the lawe of God. And when the Diuel so besotteth them, therupon they surmize that it is impossible for men to loue their enimies. And therefore they shake off Gods yoke, and say it is no expresse commaundement that ought to be obserued of necessitie, but only a counsell that Iesus Christ giueth : and furthermore that the sayd counsell cōcerneth the perfectiō of the gospel, but was not so vnder the law : and that is an other blasphemy. But here ye see that Iob protesteth it, & wee know not whither he liued before the law of Moyse was published. Howbeit : (as I haue shewed heretofore) he was afore the time of the Prophets (for they make mention of him as of a man of former time) : & yet neuerthelesse he declareth that he loued his enimies. And whence came this vnto him ? Came it not of the lawe which hath euer bene written in the harts of the faythfull ? hath God set downe any thing in the two tables which he hath not alwayes written by his holy spirit in the harts of his childrē ? And what els doth he at this day through the whole holy scripture : but set those things before our eyes which he graueth in vs by his holy spirit ? in somuch that there is a cōformitie betweene the doctrine that is preached, & the inward grace that God giueth vs by his holy spirit : and they agree in all poynts and all respects. Then we see here, that before our Lord Iesus Christ came downe into the world, Iob protested that he loued his enimies in such wise as he reioyced not at their fall. I told you that it behoued vs to marke well this poynt. For what a shame shall it be to vs, if being admonished by our Lord Iesus Christs exhortation, we go about to seeke startingholes, and will not follow at leastwise those that liued in such time as the doctrine was yet very darke ? shal we not be double faultie ? Yes surely shal wee : so then let vs marke first of all, that it hath alwayes bene Gods will, that the louing of their enimies should be the marke of his childrē. And for proufe hereof, let vs hearken what is sayd in the lawe of Moyse : If thine enimies ox or asse be fallē into a ditch, thou shalt lift him out. God cōmaūdeth vs to do good to our enimies brute beafts : & shall we not then do the best we cā to succour their owne persons ? I am bound to procure mine enimies welfare, and to shew it euen in his cattell : & what shall I then do to his person which is much more precious ? So then we haue to conclude against the horrible blasphemie of the Papiests, that Gods will hath at all times bene, that the faythfull shoulde loue those that hate them, and indeuer to do those good which hurte them. Marke that for one poynt. And herevpon wee haue also to marke, that it is not a counsell that may freely be left vndonne : but a streyght commaundement, agaynst the which wee cannot striue without offending God deadly. Nowe seing it is so that God woulde binde the faythfull to loue their enimies, euen in time of the lawe : much more reason is it that wee shoulde haue the sayde rule now. For wee haue a more large declaration of it by the holy mouth of our Lorde Iesus Christe. The doctrine of the lawe is darke of it selfe : yea and it was wrested awry by the Scribes and the Phariseys : but nowe hath Iesus Christe brought it agayne to his purenesse, and tolde vs, that if wee loue not those which hate vs, and indeuer not to helpe those that would hurte vs, wee shall not be acknowledged for Gods children. Surely it is a horrible threate that wee shall be disherited of Gods kingdome, and that he wil shake vs off and bannilhe vs from the felowship of his children. Seing then that our Lord Iesus Christe hath with such threatening tolde vs, that we must heare good will to our enemies: let vs learne to frame our selues to that doctrine, and therein acknowledge, that the shamelesse boldnesse of the Papiſts hath bene to villeynous, yea and to diuelish, in saying that Iesus Christes woordes are but a simple admonition, seing it is matched with such a sentence of damnation that God will renounce vs, and bannilhe vs out of his kingdome, if wee ouermaster not our heartes so farre, as to loue those that hate vs. Moreouer wee haue also a mirror hereof in our Lorde Iesus Christe: for he offered himselfe for such as were his deadly enemies. VVherefore indured hee so bitter death: but to reconcytle vs? Now if there behoued a reconciliation to be made: then was there a hatred, and God and wee were at oddes. Behold then, our Lord Iesus Christ yeelded himselfe to death, yea and to all curses to recouer vs vnto God his father, at such time as wee were his enemies: and ought not such a pledge to breake our hartes though they were harder than stone? And this is it also wherevnto Sainct Paule bringeth vs backe in the Epistle to the Ephesians, when he goeth about to subdue all the hatred which wee haue conceyued agaynst our enemies. Thus then the order which we haue to note, is that those which liued vnder the lawe offended God when they intended too reuenge themselues: and therefore what shall become of vs which haue such a declaration as I haue tolde you already? Howbeit, it is not ynough for vs to beare our enemies no euill will: but wee muste also haue a minde to seeke their benefite and welfare. And this is well woorthie to be nored. For diuers haue thought they shoulde be discharged before God, so they ranne not with naked swoorde agaynst those that haue offended them or done them any wrong. As for mee (say they) I will seeke no reuenge: but I pray God auenge me of them, & it would do mee good at the heart if I might see a mischiefe light vpon them. Yea? nay, here is another maner of practising of this doctrine, when Iesus Christ declareth vnto vs that we must pray for them that curse vs, speake well of them that backebite vs, and do good to them that seeke to hurt vs. But contrarywise wee are so full of poyson, that wee desire nothing but that God shoulde ouerwhelme them. And on what side soeuer any mishap befalleth them: we are glad of it. Can this be done without the ouerthrow of all that is contayned in the doctrine of our Lord Iesus Christ? There are others also to be found which haue not so maliciouse a heart as to suffer their wicked lustes to haue open liberrie: but they will say, as for mee I am ready to forgiue him, and I wishe him no more harme than to my self: and yet in the meane season they cannot wish the welfare and profite of such as haue displeas'd them, or with whome they be offended. But let vs marke that it is not ynough for vs too absteyne from all reuenging with our handes and our tongues, nother is it ynough for vs to put away euillwill, so as wee would not wiſe any harme or aduersitie to such as are our enemies: but it behoueth vs to go one degree further. And how is that? It is that wee muste loue them. For if Iob had not loued his enemies, surely he would haue reioyced at their misfortune. So then lette vs learne, not onely to keepe our hearts locked vp, that they be not prouoked agaynst such as offende vs: but lette vs learne to beare them such an affection of freendship, as wee may bee sorie when any euill happeneth vnto them, and also haue pitie and compassion of them: and if this seeme too harde for vs to do: was not Iob a man subiect to affections as wee bee? and yet did God get the vpper hande of them. Then behoueth it vs to fight. That cannot be done without great inforcement. It is true: but wee muste strayne our selues, howbeit not vpon truste of our owne strength, but with praying vnto God to giue vs the spirite of meekenesse to bring vs thither as wee see his woorde leadeth vs. VVhat is to be done then? if I looke vnto the thing that is commaunded: it is certayne that my nature draweth quyte backward. For I shall be angry when a man hurteth me or hath praſtized any euill agaynst mee. And although I loue vprightnesse and good dealing: yet shall I not fayle to be inflamed with hartburning, and to haue some desire of reuenge agaynst such as haue gone about to do me harme. Yet notwithstanding I see here that Iesus Christ condēneth mee, and pronounceth this dreadfull sentence, that God will shake mee of, and that I shall be razed out of the number of his children, if I loue not mine enimies. And therefore seyng I know, not onely the infirmitie, but also the frowardnesse of my nature: it behoueth mee to pray God to correct these vices in mee. I knowe that I haue nothing but bitternesse in mee: wel then, God hath the spirite of sweetenesse: therefore it behoueth mee to seeke it at his hande. Go to, there is in mee a certayne frowardnesse that vexeth mee, and God hath the spirite of meekenesse and gentlenesse: then behoueth it mee to desire him to make me partaker of it. If wee haue our recourse after this sort, vnto God: surely we shall not want any thing. Furthermore let vs enter into our selues and inforce ourselues: for what shall wee gayne by soothing of our selues? It is true in deede that God commaundeth mee such a thing: but I am a man, I feele mine owne infirmitie, yea and I am diseased. Behold, the Phisition offereth himselfe, and commeth with the Medicine in his hand: and yet had I leuer to continue still in my disease, than to suffer any medicyne to bee ministred vnto mee: nowe then I pray you, am I therefore too bee excused? VVherefore, in asmuch as wee know the vices that are in vs, lette vs go to the remedy: wee neede not seeke farre for it: and although wee be very loth, yet behoueth it vs to fight agaynst our lustes: assuring our selues that they be as madde beastes, and therefore great force and violence must be vsed to oppresse them. And here yee see why I sayde, that it behoued vs to streyne and inforce our selues: for wee shall haue much ado to bring it to passe. Neuerthelesse if wee go to it after this sorte: God will turne the bitternesse of our nature into louing kindnesse and sweetenesse, and he will not suffer vs to hate our enimies. And for this consideration, as oft as we be tempted to hate our enemies, we must call to minde the request that wee make when wee desire God to forgiue vs our faults as we forgiue them that offend vs. For there it behoueth vs to bee cited before God, according as in very deede we come to present our selues before Gods iudgement seate. How? VVhen I protest vnto my God, that I forgiue myne enemies, and that I desire none other pardon than I graunt them, and yet in the meane whyle there is nothing but dissimulation in mee: VVhar? Shall not my prayer bee turned into cursing? if we thought well vpon this: surely wee might breake the wicked stomacke that is in vs, and at length God shoulde haue the victorie, so as it should be easie for vs euen to loue them that hate vs. But that wee may the better knowe the euill that is in vs: lette vs go to it by degrees as the Scripture leadeth vs. It is not possible but wee shall bee stirred vp when a man dothe vs any wrong? VVell, there is one sinne already if we do but grudge agaynst him in our

heart: according as our Lord Iesus Christe sayeth, wee haue already gayned the euerlasting fire. And his expressing hereof is by a similitude which he borroweth of the maner of the iudgements that were in his time. Therefore to make comparison of the three degrees of offending in this behalfe: he sayeth that the first is woorthie to be punished by iudgement. But when we open our mouth to vtter any wordes of spite or disdayne agaynst him that hath offended vs: then is there a condemnation yet grieuoufer and more to be feared: as if we were condemned by a councell or cōsistorie somewhat more solemnely assembled: according as Iesus Christe alledgeth that similitude. The third degree is when we come to open raging in wordes thorough choler: and this offence deserueth to be punished as it were by the chiefe court of iustice. But Iesus Christe leuing the similitude, sayeth playnely that such a one is worthy of hell fire. He meeneth that al three are worthy of it, but yet notwithstanding he sheweth the degrees of the euill. Then if a man haue any suddayne choler: although the same settle not in his heart: yet ye see hee hath already deserued euerlasting death before God. How shall wee do then if wee foster deadly hatred in our hearts and be full of venemous rancour to be reuenged of them that haue done vs any wrong? wherefore let vs learne to correct this vice in vs, and vnderstand, that if any euill worde haue scaped our mouth, it behoueth vs to be sorie for it, and to fall to that which Sainct Paule sayeth, namely that the sunne go not downe vpon your wrath, least ye giue possession vnto Sathan. Hereby wee be warned, that if wee haue bene moued to any displeasure, the same must passe away and the sunne must not go downe vpon it, so as our anger should multiply in it selfe. And why? The punishment that Sainct Paule addeth, ought to touche vs neere. For sayeth he, it is to giue Satan possession of vs. If a man shoulde demaunde of any of vs, whether wee would that the Diuell should haue the matter of vs, and reygne ouer vs, and be our Prince: wee would vtterly abhorre it. And yet notwithstanding wee do it as oft as wee beare any euill will agaynst our enemies. VVe cannot make God a lye, nor his holy spirite whiche speaketh by the mouth of S. Paule. But when wee knowe this: lette vs passe further, and thinke thus with our selues: yonder same is a creature of God, and I see he is a wretched damned soule: what ought wee to do then, but onely pray God for such as are in the way to destruction. And agayne, hath not our Lorde Iesus Christe redeemed mennes soules? true it is that the effect of his death cometh not to the whole worlde: Neuerthelesse for asmuch as it is not in vs too discerned betweene the righteous and the sinners that go to destruction, but that Iesus Christe hath [to our knowledge] suffered his death and passion aswell for them as for vs: therefore it behoueth vs to labour to bring euery man too saluation, that the grace of our Lorde Iesus Christe may be auayleable to them. And furthermore if this bee to heauie for vs, lette vs consider what comparison there is betweene God and vs. For who is he that offendeth not God dayly? and yet neuerthelesse as soone as wee returne vnto him, he giueth vs libertie to come familiarly thither without doubting that wee shall be receyued. And yet in the meane whyle if any man offende vs, there is no meanes to be founde to make vs freendes agayne.

Thus ye see what wee haue to gather of this sentence, where we heare Iob protest that he not onely forbare all reuenge, but also was sory when any euill happened to his enemies, and his heart reioyced not when he hearde speaking of it. Neuerthelesse the holy Scripture tell:th vs, that the righteous shall reioyce at the confuzion of the wicked: and that is true. Howbeit to the intent to haue such a gladnesse as God alloweth, it behoueth vs to bee scoured and clenzed from all priuie malice and all regard of our owne persons. VVhen Gods children reioyce at the aduersitie of the wicked, it must be to the ende to acknowledge that God is iust and righteous: and yet therewithall they must also take warning to walke in feare, seeing that God sheweth himselfe a iudge, and giueth them example and instruction at other mennes coste. VVhen wee do it after that sort: it is a beholding of the vpright iustice of our God, and a learning to walke in feare and carefulnesse. By the examples that he giueth vs, so as we haue no respect of our owne persones to reuenge our selues when wee be prouoked to any wrath by meanes of any euill that is done vnto vs: but rather do vtterly forgiue it, and moreouer haue pitie and compassion on the wretched soules that perish.

Thus ye see after what maner wee may lawfully reioyce at the fall of the wicked. True it is then that it behoueth vs to glorifie God in all the iudgements which he executeth in the worlde: but lette vs beware wee mingle not our fleshy affections with it. For it behoueth our zeale to bee pure when wee will reioyce at the aduersitie which God sendeth vpon the wicked. Furthermore Iob addeth this circumstance which I haue touched, that is to say, that his housebold seruants had bene as fyrebrandes to prouoke him, and would fayne haue had him reuenge himselfe: and yet for all that hee had not bene moued a whit as he sayeth. Some vnderstand this sentence very rudely: as though Iobs seruants should be greued with him for entertayning straungers to curteously, and therefore wished him dead for the paynes wherevnto he did put them. But that is quyte from the matter. For Iob meeneth to declare nomore here, but that although his seruants prouoked him to reuenge when they saw men do him harme and wrong: yet notwithstanding he refrayned himselfe, and yeilded not to such temptations. And this is well woorthy to be noted: for it was an excellent vertue in him, to be lesse moued with the wrongs that were done to him, than his household seruants were. There is noman but he taketh his own wrongs so to hart, as other men cannot pacifie him. It may perchance be sayd to a man that hath a displeasure done him, stay your selfe, I will take the wrong as done to my owne person, let me alone with it, I will reuenge you well ynough: but yet cannot that content his minde, his affections are so farre out of order.

But wee see contrarywise that Iobs seruants were greued when menne did wrong to their matter, and not he himselfe: and therefore it muste needes bee sayde, that the spirite of God wrought in him after a singuler and wonderfull fashion. Howbeit wee muste marke by the way, that hee doth not vaunte himselfe here to purchase estimation: but is set forth as a mirror and patterne for vs, as if God had set him vpon a scaffold too the ende wee shoulde labour to fashion our selues like vnto him, and be out of all doubt that there is no excuse for vs, if we follow not such an example. VVhat is to be done then? Although we haue tētations to prouoke vs to reuenge our selues of our enemies, yea and that men also do picke vs forward & inflame vs, and other some also do flatter vs in our finnes: yet must we not therefore belecue such flatteries, but wee muste settle our eyes and mindes vpon God. For what is the cause that menne doo so easely pardon and iustifie themselues when God condemneth them, but for that they giue eare too suche as come too picke thanks by tale bearings? And why?

is not that lawfull for vs to do? Specially, if I haue done you wrong: why should you not seeke your reuenge and requyte like for like? there needeth no retoricke to persuaide vs to do harme to our enimies: for there is not that vayne nor sinewe in vs, which is not forwarde ynough that way: yea, wee are rather to furious in that cace. And yet in the meane whyle beholde what aduocates do come to cloke our vices by soothing vs vp in our sinne. So much the more then behoueth it vs too minde diligently what our Lord Iesus Christ commandeth vs: namely to loue our enemies in such wyse as our eares be stopped agaynst all things that may be alledged to vs by menne. So that if there be any folke that flatter vs, and seeme maynteyners of our honour and profite, and that they coule finde in their hearts to imploy themselves wholly for vs: let vs suspect such kinde of folke. It were much better that a man shoulde rebuke vs when he seeth vs to farre moued and out of pacience, and that he should labour to assuage our rage: than that he should come to set it forwarde after that sorte, notwithstanding that hee do it of a good will, according as some men will be so affectioned towards vs, that if they see another do vs wrong, they will come to declare it vnto vs: saying, I take such a harme to be as myne own, and I will reuenge it, I will not suffer such an outrage to be done to you.

Therefore it may well come to passe that a man shall haue some good zeale when he seeth vs disquieted: but in the meane whyle what shall wee gayne by it, but to be thrust headlong into greater ruine? So then the beste freendes that we can haue, are those that labour to bridle vs when wee haue any iniurie done vs. Furthermore when wee be tempted by such makebates as come to increace the mischief: lette vs recouer all our wittes vnto God, and say: notwithstanding that menne iustifie mee, yet shall I not therefore bee quite before the heauenly iudge, and therefore it behoueth mee too brydle my selfe to suffer this wrong. For seing it pleaseth God to take mee for one of his children: it becommeth mee to followe him, and to fashion my selfe like vnto him. And sith he causeth the Sunne to shine both vpon good and euill: I must indeuer to do good to such as woulde hurte mee, and by that meanes heape coles of fyre vpon their heads. After this maner must wee practize this sentence. And moreouer lette vs marke also what Iob addeth, and that shall serue vs for an ende. Namely, that the straunger was not lodged in the streetes, but that his gate was alwayes open to him. Here Iob declareth that he was freudly to such as had no meanes to recompence him: and that also is the very effect, whereby wee shewe that we haue a right charitie towards menne. For if wee do good to suche as are able to requite it, and to such as are alied vnto vs, eyther by kinred or by some other bond: it is no true and perfect prooffe of our charitie. True it is, that that freendlinesse is good, if it bee ruled according to godlinesse: but yet it is possible that in so doing wee shall haue more regard of our selues than otherwise, like as wee oftentimes see that a man seeketh his owne peculiar profite in doing good to his kinsfolke and freends. But when wee do good to such as are not able to requyte it, yea and to such as are vnknowne to vs: therein wee shewe that wee serue God, and holde the right rule of charitie. Thus yee see what Iob protesteth here: and specially he speaketh of straungers, as of those whom God commendeth vnto vs thorough all the holy Scripture, and not without cause. For suche as are at home in their owne countrey shall haue reliefe ynough, they shall haue kinred and many other helpes and succours, and a man cannot lightly hurte them. But contrarywise poore straungers are destitute of all helpe, they haue nother freends nor kinsfolke, nother haue they any ayde or fauour towards the worlde.

Yee see then that the right triall of our louing kinnesse, is when wee intende to shewe that wee serue God truly without seeking our owne peculiar profite. And surely our Lorde doth more rigorously condemne the outrages that are done to straungers, than those that are done to a mans owne neyghbours. True it is that both twayne of them are woorthy to be condemned, and nothing shall scape vnpunished: howbeit let vs marke therewithall, that God receyue those into his protection and saufe keeping, which are not maynteyned by men. And verely wee see howe God sheweth that wee set not our selues agaynst a mortall man when wee do any wrong or violence to such as he hath taken into his custodie: but that it is an offending of his Maiestie. And so much the better ought this thing to be printed in our hearts: for so much as wee see the very Heathen men do shame vs in that behalfe. For when they intended to shew that some man was of a flauish and wicked nature, they were wont to say, auant, thou art a churle towards straungers. It was more with them, than if they had called a mā whore-mayster, theefe, drunkard, periured, or murderer. VVhen it was sayde, go, thou art an enemy of straungers, it was as much to say, as thou art worse than a brute beast. The Paynims spake after that maner, and made a common Prouerbe of it: and what shall become of vs then which professe our selues to be Gods children, when wee fight so directly agaynst the order of nature? Is it not a token that wee mocke God to the full: and that wee woulde spitefully prouoke his maiestie agaynst vs? Therefore let vs marke well the protestation that Iob maketh here: that is to witte, that hee not onely was liberall towards those whom he knewe to be of abilitie to requite it: but also that he employed himself vpon such as were not able to make any recompence. Lette vs consider with Iob (I say) that God hath set one common and generall bonde among all mankind, and that it behoueth vs to bestowe our charitie vpon such as resemble vs, and to haue pitie vpon them in succoring them, euery of vs according to his abilitie. And if wee be Gods children, let vs labour to exercise true brotherlinesse towards all menne: but specially towards those that are more neerely knitte vnto vs by the bond of fayth: lette vs bend our selues aboute all to do them good.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may be forie for the vices that haue reigned ouermuch in vs, and do yet still reygne: and that wee may flee for refuge to his mercie: and that therewithall it may please him to tame and mortifie all our wicked affections, and to beare with our infirmities, guying vs to himselfe, and drawing vs neerer and neerer vnto him, vntill wee become to the ende of the race wherevnto wee trauell all the tyme of our lyfe. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly father wee acknowledge and confesse according to the truth, that we be not worthie to lifte vp our eyes to Heauen, to present our selues before &c.

Leuit. 19. g. 33.

33. If I haue hid my sinne as euery man doth, or put mine iniquitie in my secrete:
 34. Though I were able to breake a great throng: yet the despyzed of houses astonished mee, I kept silence, and I went not out of my dore.

Ere wee haue a protestation well worthie to be noted. For Iob sheweth vs by his owne example, that when we haue done amisse, the remedie is not to hide our faultes as the comon custome of all men is to do: but to confesse the misdeede willingly, and not to be ashamed to be acknowne of the sinne which we haue comitted, to the end it may be wiped out before God. Surely this is a very rare vertue, & therefore so much the more standeth it vs in hande to marke what is shewed vs here. For Iob speaketh not for himself only: but he giueth an instruction that may serue for all of vs. Therefore he declareth, that he had not hid his sinne, nor layed it vp in secrete. That is to say, he had not laboured to cleere himselfe afore men, but had yeluded himselfe guiltie, and acknowledged his offences. Marke that for one poynt. Therewithall he sheweth how men are attainted with the vice of hypocrisie, & that it is their fashiō to denie things, and to vse startingholes, so as their faultes be put vnder foote. In this place he hath vsed the worde Adam which signifieth a man, and is sometimes taken for euery man. In this text Iob ment to say, that there shall neuer be any found so well touched, as to acknowledge their faults, but rather will finde vayne backshrinkings to hyde them. Although then that this vice do reygne in the world: yet doth Iob protest that he is cleare from it. True it is that Adam began first that trade, and shewed the same to all such as came of his race. For we see that when he was conuicted, streightwayes he labored to hyde himself with leaues. And afterwarde when God summoned him to appeare before him, still he found a trifling excuse, and woulde fayne haue scaped by some meanes or other. Ye see then that Adam was the first beginner to shew hypocrisie to his posteritie. For he learned that lesſon, not only to himselfe, but also to wrappe all men in. It is not two or three of vs onely: but all of vs haue it of nature. Surely the Diuell winneth much at our hands, when he maketh vs to cloke our faultes: for if wee acknowledge them, wee must needs be ashamed of them. But if wee haue once couered the Cuill: wee thinke all is safe, and therevpon take leaue to fall a sleepe: euery of vs findeth this in himselfe by experience. I pray you if we were prouoked to mourne before God & to craue pardō of him, should we not by & by haue remorse of our sinnes, to be sorie for them, and to seeke remedie? Yes: but the Deuil blindeth vs, or else tieth kerchers before our eyes, or else disguiseth things in such wise vnto vs, as we cannot discern the euill to be as it is. Lo in what case wee bee. And therefore it behoueth vs so much the more to studie this lesſon of not putting vp our wickednesse as it were into our bosome, that is to say, not to hyde it: but to lay it open. True it is that when a man knoweth his sinne, it is possible that he shall become desperate, as it happened both to Cain and Iudas. Neuerthelesse we cannot come to repentaunce, nor desire forgiueneſſe at Gods hand, nor finally be deliuered of our offences, vntill they be layed open, and all hypocrisie be set aside. Furthermore he that is come to the knowledge of his sinne, and is at defiāce with it in himselfe, will desire nomore to hide himselfe to the worldward, according as we see that we haue alwayes vn-truthes in our mouths to iustifie our selues withal. There will be no such thing in vs: for repentance bringeth true humilitie. Therefore as for him that is conuicted before God to haue done amisse, and willingly acknowledgeth his fault without shrinking backe, no doubt but he is also ready to condemne his offences before men, and to shew that he is sorie for them. But let vs nowe see if the thing that was in Iobs time, be not increased now adayes, in so much that there is nothing more rise, than hypocrisie. Truely we see by this text, that it is no new thing for men to seeke to disguise themselves, and to take couert when they haue done amisse: It hath bene so at all times (as I sayd afore) it began at Adā, and hath continued vnto this day. Howbeit we see such shamelesnesse in the worlde at this present, that those dayes were nothing in cōparison of these we see now. For if one go about to warne a man of his sinne, he shall finde a brazen face to denie it, when the thing is altogether manifest. The partie shal know wel ynough that his euill doing is knowne: and yet notwithstanding he will not haue it spoken of, but would stoppe euery mans mouth with his outfacing of it. Yea and many times, he contenteth not himselfe with such shamefull deniall: but also falleth to quarrelling and threatning of them that speake of it. Then if men did hide their faults in Iobs time: they do it much more in these dayes. But yet for all that, it is no sufficient defense, nother shall it be receyued before God, according as wee see in this text. Although all men be hardharted and wilfull, so as no man will come to reason, but when folke labour to draw sinners to repentaunce, they kicke agaynst them lyke restie iades: lette vs assure our selues that Iobs example is set forth for our learning, and that wee must not follow the common trade, nor say, euery man doth so, it is the common custome. No: but let vs looke vpo God who draweth vs the contrarie way. VVould men iustifie mee? And God will haue euery of vs to condēne himselfe. Do men conceale their faults to the end they might be vnknowne? God will haue vs discouer them, yea euen with all lowliness. Then behoueth it vs to come to that poynt, and not to say, I see all men do so, and it is euery mans custome. VVhat though? Men did so in the time of Iob: but they were condemned by the holy ghost. Therefore, when we see men do the like now adayes, that is to say, that no man confesseth his faultes: yet neuerthelesse lette the faythfull learne to frame themselves to that which is shewed here: that is to wit, not only to mourne before God, but also to shewe before menne, that they be sorie in their hartes, and condemne themselves in such wise, as they may become their own iudges, and obteyne mercy of the heavenly iudge by returning vnto him. To be short, we see that hypocrisie is condemned by this texte. The beste for vs were to abstayne vterly from sinne, and to keepe our selues from it. But for asmuch as wee be so frayle as wee cannot liue in this worlde without taking many falles: the remedie is to stoupe and mourne before God, and moreouer not to go aboute to saue our honestie in such wise afore men, as wee should not yeelde our selues guilty as often as neede shall requyre. True it is that God comāndeth not a man to proclayme it in the streates whē he hath done amisse, & say I haue comitted such a fault: for that were rather to cast a stūbling block. But yet it stādeth

deth vs vpon, to marke what is sayde in the holy Scripture: namely, first of all that wee muste belowly towards our neighbours, assuring our selues that wee be infected with many vices. What is the cause that a man despiseth al other men and can beare nothing at their hand, but thundereth at them when they haue done amisse? What is the cause of it (I say) but this Hypocrisie? For if wee knew our owne infirmitie, surely they would as it were brydle vs, that wee should not condemne other folkes at auenture, but begin at our selues. Thus yee see the first thing that we haue to do, and which is commaunded vs by the holy Scripture. So then are wee meide and gentle in bearing one with an other? It is a kind of confesing our owne finnes. The second thing is, that when we haue offended any man, it behoueth vs to come to reason: For we see that otherwise we haue no accessse vnto God, according also as our Lord Iesus Christ sheweth vs that our Sacrifices and offerings shall not be accepted, vlesse we be reconcyled to our neighbours when wee haue offended them. Therefore we must learne to be sory in their behalf if we know our finnes. And thirdly, when we haue giuen any cause of stumbling let vs come humbly to amend it, yea and so to amend it, as the euil may not be borne with all, nor we kick against the spurre. Thus yee see the three confessions with the scripture requireth of vs as in respect of men. Herewithall let vs marke, that all this cometh and proceedeth of the sayd ryght meening which we haue in sorowing before God. For vntill wee be fully sory at the hart that wee haue offended: we shall neuer make a pure and ryght confession before men, for whatsoever wee doo: it shall bee but saynednesse. And so it is certaine that those which shall haue confessed themselves before God to be such as they be, will also haue the modestie of not iustifying themselves afore men. For it is a mockerie when any man shall say, On I, I know myself a sinner before God: and yet notwithstanding shall bee so wilfull towards men, as no reason nor truth can be wrung from him. Such an one sheweth that the diuell hath bewitched him and that he hideth his faults and layeth them vp in his bosome, as much as he possibly can. Wherefore let vs marke well, that if wee be come to the point of feeling our finnes, and of being ashamed too haue transgressed Gods lawe, and too haue done against his rightuousnesse: wee shall haue no more pryde to hinder vs from making a pure confession, and such as we ought to make before him. Furthermore it behoueth vs also to marke, how it is sayd here that Iob did not put his sin into his secret. This importeth very much: For men cannot beguile God, but they beguile themselves, and there vpon it seemeth too them that they haue gayned much, when they can put their finnes out of their mynd too thinke no more vpon them. If a man can forget himself and cast his faults behynd his back, or thrust them vnder his foote without thinking any more vpon them: then is he no more sad, then feeleth he no more grief, but is fotted in his wickednesse, he is as it were stark rotten, and feeleth not any more of it. But yet in the meane whyle God ceaseth not to do the duty of a iudge: For all things are registred before him, and although hee make no countenance for a tyme, yet must all come too an accompt before him. Men could find in their harts to be alwayes hidden, that is too say, not too see their faultes, and then they think they shall neuer come to light. But their sin continueth still, and although it bee buried in respect of men, yet wil God bring it to light. Iob then sheweth heere, that men do but beguyle themselves by couering their finnes after that sort. For they must needs appeare and be brought too light, howsoeuer the world go. Then let vs remember, that it is best for vs too vncloke our owne faults, that God may deliuer vs from them. For if we bring them before him with a free hart, and condene the euil that is in them: it is certaine that they shall be vtterly done away if we require it. Therefore let vs condemne the euil where we find it, to the end we be not condemned of God. For as long as wee do hold our harts so close, and labour to conceale our fault, in them it behoueth God to fight against vs, and vs to feele how it belongeth to him to scatter the cloudes, and too pluck away the figleaves wherewith we shall haue couered our dishonesty, in so much that we shall be enforced to perceiue it spite of our tee.h. & it shall be knowne both to me and Angels. This is it that we haue to remeber in this streine, where mention is made of putting a mines sin into his secret. To be short, it wil happē vnto them as it doth vnto those that hide a sore. The sore is hiddē in the body, and yet in the meane whyle there is no meane made to purge it, but a man couereth it in such wise as it shall not be knowne, and yet the infectiō doubleth for al the cloking of it, and the rancor of it increaseth more and more for want of cleansing of it. It were better that it were opened: for then should it haue some issue to purge it self, which thing it cannot do, by cause the disease is so pent vp within. Euen so fare we when we go about to hyde our faults. For this is there as it were a rottē sore, and we would faine hold it in by force, and our struing to kepe it secret, breedeth a greater rankling, which causeth the mischance too increase and inflame more and more. What is to be done then? There is no meanes but that which I haue spokē of: which is, to come before god, and not to be ashamed to confesse our wretchednesse, to the end that he may remedie it as he knoweth moit cōueniēt for vs: and also to become our owne iudges, for he is so graciouse vnto vs, as to make vs our owne iudges: and in steade of condēning vs, he is ready to acquite vs. On the contrary part, drag we back as much as we can, wee do but offend our God, and prouoke a greater vengeance against vs. And that is a cause, why it is not for vs to ther vp our faults in secret as we are woont to do. And here is mention made expressly of our hydings, clokings or couerts, by cause me of their own nature do find many pretty shifts and sleights to stunn Gods presence: yea for a while True it is that we may well think asidē, but yet doth God see vs through his Neuertnesse (as the Prophet Esay sayth) the wicked do dig themselves caues, and when they think no more vpon Gods iudgement: then it seemeth to them that they haue very well thrust off the matter. And further if that serue not their turne, they fall to the flat contrary, & runne vp and downe, and whe they find any new mouse-hole or chanie, then are they safe, (so beare they themselves in hand,) and if they cannot hyde themselves altogether, they play the partiches or yong childē, which thinke it yrough if their owne eyes be hidden. And so the cause why here is expresse mention made of our hydings, is for that we be naturally giuen to hypocrisie, and seke continually some pretty sleights to beguile God: wherin we do but beguile our selues as it is seene. For it doth but soade vs in our wickednesse, and in the meane whyle we consider not that in so doing the diuell doth so possesse vs, as wee cannot recover ourselves vnto the soueraine Phisitio that is able to heale and cure al our diseases. Furthermore after that Iob hath protestēt the knowing of his faults: he addeth, that although he had ten eies to breake a great thing: yet he feared the wisest raskalles, and went not out of his house. How be it before we passe any further, let vs marke what manner of man it is that spekerh. It is Iob, who had liued an Angel amongst men, and had beloued himself so vncorruptly, as his like is hardly too bee seene through the whole world: and yet notwithstanding he sayth, that he had not his faults. How shall we do then? For if a man compare the righteouslest and perfectest men with Iob, he shall finde that they come nothing neere the holinesse and vprightnesse that was in him. Now if a man that had such feare of God, and liued so vncorrupt a life, acknowledged himselfe to be a sinner, and would not stand to the mayntenance of his honour, but yeelded himself guilty when he had done amisse: what a shame is it at this day, that such as are a great deale further off from such holynesse, will not confesse their faultes playnely and throughly? I pray you muste not the worlde bee needes worse than blinde now adayes when men cannot be made to yeelde glory vnto God by confessing their sinnes? Iob hath declared vnto vs that he was as the eye vnto the blinde, the feete of the lame, the father of the fatherlesse, and the defender of the wydowes: agayne he declareth, that he was the common hoit of poore strangers, that he had clothed the naked with the wooll of his sheepe, that hee had not eaten his bread alone, that he had not done any man violence, and that although he had credite in the place of iustice, and might haue bene borne out: yet had he neuer giuen any man cause to complayne of him. After the declaration of all these things he addeth that he had not hidden his faultes. But now adayes there is none of vs all, but he is infected with many vices, whereof Iob was cleere: and yet notwithstanding wee would seeme much more righteous than he. Muste not the Diuell needes haue plucked out our eyes, so as wee can nomore see what sinne is, but haue forgone all remorse, which is the extremitie and vttermoost poynt of all euill as S. Paule sayeth? So then lette vs learne to compare Iob with our selues as oft as wee be so foolish and ouerweening as to acquite our selues. And let vs acknowledge that we come farre short of such a perfection as Iob had: and therefore that there is nothing for vs to do, but to mourne before God, and to condemne our selues vtterly. And when we be so condemned before him, let vs learne to vse such mildnesse towards men, that if wee haue offended our neighbours by doing amisse, we may amed it, & that if we haue done any man wrong, we may labour to be recõciled to him, and to be short, that wee may be ashamed of our sinnes, and in all poynts and all respects yeeld glory vnto God. And now Iob proceedeth with his mildnesse in saying, that he had feared the veriest rascalles of all men, notwithstanding that he was able to breake and beare downe a great throng of people. This texte is taken otherwise of some men. For the Hebrew woorde that Iob vseth here (I meene the woorde which I haue translated to breake or burst asunder) signifieth sometime to feare or be afraid. So then the sayde woorde signifieth both to feare or be afraid and also to oppresse, beare downe, trample, tread vnderfoote, breake, broose, or burst asunder. Some therefore expounde it as though Iob declared, that he had not feared a great multitude: that is to say, that he was neuer abashed to rebuke euill wheresoever hee sawe it: according as when wee be zelouise to Godwarde, it is certayne that wee will not suffer any man to offende him without setting our selues against him: or seing that God hath done vs the honour to make vs his aduocates: we cannot at leastwise but declare our misliking of the euill, and indouer to stoppe it as much as may be possible, putting the lesson in vie which Sainct Paule sheweth vs in saying that wee muste not haue fellowship with the frutes of darkenesse, but muste reprove them. Many therefore do expound this text as though Iob protested that hee had set himselfe agaynst euill, and letted it by all meanes wheresoever he founde it: and that although he might have purchased himselfe displeasure and hatred of the whole world, yet notwithstanding he ceased not to condemne the euill alwayes where he found it: and this doctrine is good and profitable. And surely wee see howe necessarie a thing it is to stablish our selues in such steadfastnesse. For if wee intend to stoppe euill doing: wee muste haue the whole worlde, that is to say, most menne our enemies. True it is that God commaundeth vs to seeke peace with all men as neere as wee can. But when we do our duetie in that behalfe, wee shall be sure to set the whole worlde in our toppes, if we go about to rebuke sinne. For wee see howe euery man flattereth himselfe, and corrections are so harde and bitter, specially now adayes as no mā is able to suffer them. Then seing it is so, we had neede to settle our selues in such stoutnesse, that although the whole world should ryse vp agaynst vs, and all men without exception should labour to oppresse vs, yet wee should not swarue aside, but persist euen to condemne the euill. This doctrine surely is good and profitable: but if wee consider the order of the text: wee shall finde the naturall sense to be that which I haue touched. The first woorde that Iob vseth here signifieth, when, if, for, albeit, or although. Some thinke that by this protelation Iob ment to denie that he stooode in feare of any neuer so great a multitude: for the Verbe that commeth after the first woorde (as I sayde) signifieth to feare: howbeit the comõnest signification of the first woorde is the same that I spake of Albeit or Although: and therevnto the Verbe doth commonly signifie to breake. And so I see Iobs meaning is that although he were able to breake and scatter a great throng of people, that is to say, although he were of great might, credite and autoritie: yet notwithstanding he did not ouerawe men to stoppe their mouths, but abaced himself so farre, as to feare such as were most despized & as it were the ofcastes, rascals, & comon laughing stockes. This proueth well his former saying. For it is a very good signe that Iob ment not to hide his face, seing he had the mildnesse to feare the basest fort. VVee know that a man for his richesse, or for some other gifte that is in him, shall be so authorised among men, as euery man shall feare him and stande in awe of him, and not open their mouth at him. And although he should comit all the faults in the world. Yet men durst not speak against him, except it were by muttering in secretc. For no man might haue libertie to say, Behold, such a man misbeueth himselfe: And againe if such a one as is auanced so high, haue any brute going of him: he wil steppe forth and say, what? Haue they no body to speake of but mee? And he will take on maruelously for the sauing of his honour or worship. VVee see then that this is a common thing in the world, and no maruell: seing that euen in the time of Iob, those that were in credite abused their richesse and honour to the maynteyning of themselves in euill, and too the stopping of mennes mouthes that they shoulde not in any wise speake of them. It is an vnardonable offence if a man shoulde rebuke a Prince or a Curteour, or a lawlesse person that is in autoritie of iustice: by and by there will be a great sturre kept, if such a mans honour be touched. And although there be many things in them worthy of blame: in so much that eue litle children could tell them their faultes: Yet notwithstanding all men muste be whist. But contrarywise beholde, Iob sayeth I was able to breake throngs of people, that is to say, I was able not onely to subdue mine enemies, but also to bruse them and breake them in peeces: and although the whole worlde had set themselves agaynst me, yet notwithstanding I was of suche credite and power, as I could well haue gottē the vpper hand of them.

And what did I for all that? He sheweth that he was as meeke as a lambe, and that he suffered any man to reprove his faults. Although he were some rascal or begger sayeth he, yet I stood in awe of him, and I was ashamed when he spake of mee, and I acknowledged my finnes. I tarried not till some greate army was rayfed, or till some some greate men came to put mee to shame: but I giue care to the basest fort in the world. Now we see what is the plaine meening of this text. But the principall point is, to learne to take profit by this doctrine. And first of all let such as are in any authoritie about others remember, that they must not make a cloke of it to couer their filthinesse, but a looking glasse to see how God hath exalted them to hygh degree, to the end that if there be any euill in them, it should be the more noted. And vndoubtedly it is good reason that those whome God hath graunted to be in degree of honour about their neyghbours, should indeuer themselues to shewe good example: seing they are so hyghly exalted. And if they do the contrarie, their offence is so much the more greuoufer, and God hath iust cause to vpbrayde them, saying: How now? I haue aduanced thee, and I haue reached thee my hand, to the end thou shouldest be as a burning cresset to giue light to the whole world. But seing thou hast giuen occasion of offence, thy shame must needes be the greater. Therefore let those whome God hath set in state of honour, vnderstand, that it is not to the end they should haue the greater libertie to do euill, and be able to stoppe playne folkes mouthes: they must not vse such a buckler: For if they go about to couer and burie their faults after that sort, God will vtter the greater vengeance against them in laying open their shame. Marke that for one point. And therewithall let the meaner sort haue cōsideration of thē. For there is none of vs all that commeth nere to such authoritie as Job attributeth here to his owne person: wee are not able to breake throngs of people, nor to beare downe greate bands of men that may ryse vp against vs: hardly can wee fight with a snayle. Therefore by that meanes God holdeth vs in humilitie although it be against our wills. VVhat a matter were it then, if we would presume to shet the mouthes of those that haue iust cause to speake euil of vs: we are nothing, and lesse thā nothing, & yet notwithstanding we would be still in reputation and haue our honour maynteyned, that no man should touch it, and if any mā speke of it, we think that heauē and earth ought to be turned vpside downe for the taking away of that defamation. And I pray you, is not that a fighting directly against nature? Although God had exalted vs and giuen vs the meane to mainteyne our honour: yet wee heare how it is said here, that it behoueth vs to stand in awe of the basest fort. Now then, seing that God giueth vs not the brydle, but reineth vs short, to the end we should suffer our faults to be knowne: VVhat excuse is there if we fall to striuing against it? Thus ye see how the meaner sort ought to humble themselues double, considering that they see such a mirrour in the person of Job, that wheras he was able to beare downe greate multitudes, yet he submitted himself in such sort, as to suffer himself to be reprov'd of the meanest sort, yea euen of such as were counted the beggerliest of all others. VVherfore let vs haue the mildnesse to suffer our selues to be reproved, both of greate and small. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place. And the: ewithall it behoueth vs also to way well this word despised: for behold, the cause that maketh vs so proude that we cannot be corrected: is our looking what men are, whether they be our equals or no. And if they seeme no better than ourselues: wee think they haue no auantage ouer vs. Schall such a one take vpon him to rebuke mee? Is he better woorth than I? And furthermore we be not contented to esteeme me as our equalles, though they be much our betters, but we cast them vnder foote. For wee can good skill to note other mennes vices, yea and to inhaunce them, saying: VVho is he? do not men knowe that he hath done many things amisse? And in the meane whyle our owne faults be smoothed: all is clere in vs, and vice is made vertue. This is the thing that rocketh vs a sleepe in such pride as we cannot receiue any yoke or correction, when God sendeth men vnto vs to finde fault with vs, and to shewe vs, how greatly we be to blame. And therefore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke how Job sayeth here: If I feared the most despised, that is too say, euen such as were as the offscourings and filth of the world, yea euen the veriest raskalles in whome there was no dignitie nor any thing else. By this we see that if God do vs not the honour to warne vs by men of greate estimacion and credit: It doeth not therefore followe that we should despise the warning that other men giue vs. And for proof herof, the first thing that we ought to thinke when any man repro-ueth vs, is that he is a messenger sent vnto vs of God: in somuch that if a litle chid should speake to vs, and our conscience tell vs that he sayeth truth, wee resist God if we be wilfull against him. Therefore let vs no more say what is her deteuct, he to be heard? But let vs looke vpon the message that he bringeth vs, and if it be of God, let vs stoupe down our heades to receiue the yoke. Marke that for one point. And for the second let vs marke, that oftentimes those whome we do so despise, are much better than our selues, and that nothing blindeth vs, but our owne hypocrisie bycause we serche not our owne vices as we ought to do, & yet in the meane whyle are ouer eagre against our neyghbours. That is the cause which maketh vs so to reiect them which are worthy to be heard and receiued. Therefore let vs strippe our selues out of that pryde, and learne to feele our owne wretchednesse, yea and to feele it in such wise, as we may be abashed, as wee are well worthy. And therewithall let vs not haue such an eye to the vices of our neyghbours, as we shold not looke vpon the vertues that God hath put into them, and honour them. Thus ye see what will cause vs to receiue correction patiently. Againe, there is yet one other respect. For if we be warned by men of no valewe or estimacion, we must think with our selues: Behold, God intendeth to put mee to the more shame. For I descree not that he should send mee any man of reputation to the worldward. He could rayse mee vp some Prophet, or he could send mee some man that were wise or honorable for his vertues: but he will haue me subdew'd by one that is despised & reiected of al mé. And why? To the end to make mee feele my diseaze the better. For if I were warned by some man that had autoritie ouer me, I wold think wel, it were a shame for thee to stryue against such a man: and that would cause mee to nurrish still some pryde in me. But behold, God commeth to buffet mee after an other sort: he suffereth mee not to haue some good freend to counsell mee, or some man of good countenance too warne mee for the safegard of myne honestie. but he sendeth mee an outcast. Seing then that it is thus with mee, I must needes acknowledge that God deeth it not without cause. Lo how we are by all meanes brought to this reasonableness of fearing the meanest and most despised fort. Morceuer when Job sayeth, that he went not out of dores: he meneth not that he vsed any back shrinkings, but that he resreyned himself willingly: suffering himself to be condemned without gaynsaying, and hyding himself, as a man conuicted. This in effect is the thing that we

haue to note. True it is that a man may sometimes hyde himself, and yet not cease to chawe vpon the bit and to seke reuengement against such as haue defamed him. But wher as it is sayd that Iob went not out of his dores: It is not ment that he did it too the end he would not heare his reproch, and in the meane whyle practize to be reuenged of his enimies and of such as had sleandered him. No: but he hid himself within his house to rid the place of such as had gone about to rebuke his faults: he gaue them their full scope, as if he should say, I will not set myself against them, I will not send my mē to mainteyne my quarrell, let them condemne me before the whole world, here will I keepe mee as locked vp in prison. VVe know that if a man be in prison, other men haue libertie ynough to cōmence actions against him. Iob then of his owne wil kept himself as prisoner, to the end to suffer mē to condēne him. And this is well worthy to be noted: for we see nowadays that if a mā be the giltiest in the world, and he vnderstand that other men speake of him, & heare some windie words, what will he do to remedie it? he will come into the opē streete and iustle with his shoulders, & some like a boare: he will keepe a coyle to mainteyne his euill, and he wil bring a rowte after him, saying: I will get the vper hād whatsoeuer come of it: There are that haue spoken euill of me, but I will find the meanes to stoppe al their mouthes that speake euill of me. VVold God the exāples herof were not so manifest as they be. But what? A man cannot open his eyes, but he shall see it. It is an ouerordinarie vice that such as spyght God and the world, and sowe abroade their corruptions euery where, are vtterly shamelesse & shewe thēselues possessed of the diuel. For they come forth, facing and bracing with the forehead of a harlot, and whē they haue wyped their snoute, all is well againe, what soeuer the matter was. Their offences shall be so shameful, as the ayre shal stink of them, and yet shall not men dare speake one word, but must be fayne to giue place to those roysters. Seing then that this vice reyneth euery where: wee haue somuch the more neede to marke the lesſon that is shewed here: that is to wit, that when we haue offended, we must willingly keepe our selues as prisoners, and seke by all meanes to brydie our selues, and suff. r men to condemne vs, that God may acquite vs. True it is that our holding of our selues in, must not be to cloke our sinnes by keeping silence: howbeit, let vs in the meane whyle be quiet, and not come abroad like brazenfaced fellows to mainteyne our vices, nother let vs strue against God, but rather consider that we be blame woorthy in all respects before his maiestie, and therefore that there is no other remedie for vs, but to flee to his infinite grace and mercy which he vseth towards all poore sinners that returne vnto him.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to fele them, as being cōuicted of them, we may not followe our father Adam in vsing outleapes too think that we shal be quiet by shrinking aside from them, but rather that we may consider how we be more than damnable: and therupon flee only to his mercie, and also learne to be sory & to feele our own shame before mē, to the intent that when wee haue discovered them before God and his Angels, wee may bowe vnder his maiestie which shal not be dreadfull vnto vs, by cause we be reconcyled vnto him by the meanes of our Lord Iesus Christ: And that forasmuch as we canot liue in this world without feeling our vices and imperfctiōs ouermuch: it may please him to guide vs cōtinually by his holie spirit, vntil he haue clothed vs throughly with his owne righteoufnesse. That it may please him to graunt this grace, &c.

The cxxviii. Sermon, which is the eight vpon the xxxj. Chapter.

35. Oh that I had some body to heare mee, my marke is, that the almightie should ansyvere me.
 Let myne aduerfarie vwright a booke.
 36. If I beare it not vpon my shoulders, I vvill take it to me as a crowne.
 37. I vvil reckon al my steppes, I vvil present my self to him as a prince.
 38. If my land cry out against mee or if the furrowes therof do vvepe together.
 39. If I haue eaten the soyson of it vvithout siluer, or if I haue oppressed the ovvners of it vvith sorowve.
 40. Let it bring me forth chistles in steade of vvheat, and darnell in steade of barley.
 This is the ende of Iobs vvords.

We haue seen heretofore how Iob cō-50 plained that God harkened not too him that he might obteyne reason at his hand. Truly in saying so, his intent was not to blasfeme, as though God had bē cruel and vniust to him: but his meening was that he knewe not why he was so afflicted, and that it was not lawful for him to go too lawe with God, though he knewe not the reason of it. Proceeding herewithall he addeth now, that all his desire was that God should ansvere him. VVherein he doeth vs to wit, that if God would be so gratiouse to him as to shewe him why he was so tormented: that knowledge should suffice him. Howbeit that there was no apparant reason why he shold be handled so roughly, seeing his life had hen without blame, and that he had induered to walke in holynesse. True it is that this word ansvere may be expounded two wayes: that is to wit, that God should come afore him as his aduerfarie partie, and lay forth his reasons and articles, or else that he should ansvere, that is to say, that he should declare himself to be on Iobs side. Howbeit, forasmuch as heeretofore he hath often times sayde, that if God woulde condiscend to shew the cause of that his iustice, it should suffice him: I take this texte as if it were sayde, I desire no more but that God should shewe me the reason why he scourgeth me: For as for in common respecte I vtterly despize and desie the whole world. Let me haue a strong partie to put in accusation against mee, yea and let him make a greate boke of it: It shall not greue me to carry it vpon my shoulder. For it shal be no heauy burthen to me, but rather it shal be a crowne to me, and an ornāmēt to deck me withal. Now we see in effect what Iob ment to say: namely that he had hen no such mā as he was reputed and taken to be: according as wee see how his freends cōdemned him for a reprobate, by cause he indured so greate torments, and it seemed vnto them that God mēt to vtter his vengeance, to the intēt that Iob should be a mirrour of wicked men, whom God doeth vtterly destroy. Iob therefore protesteth that he is no such man, and therewithall desireth no more but to haue audience.

dience. Before whom? not before me only: but that God should answer him, that is to say, that God should make his righteousnesse to be knowne, and then would he mainteyne, that his suffering was not for his sinnes, namely if the thing might be thoroughly considered, and that God would pronounce sentence as by way of ordinarie proces, and not by prerogative of his hygh and secreet power, so as men might not knowe why he worketh after that manner. And we haue seene heretofore, that it is not without cause, that Iob should make that wish. And why? For diuerse times God chasticeth vs according to the threatenings that are set downe in his lawe: that is to wit, that when we be punished, it is by reason of our sinnes: and that is the most ordinarie maner. Ye see that God suffered not our misdeedes unpunished, and after he had giue vs a rule wherby to liue well, he added threatenings, saying: If ye breake my commaundements, I will punish you with warre, pestilence, and famin, with sicknesse, pouertie and diuers other things. VVhen then, if we be beate with Gods rodde, it behoueth vs to laye our life to his lawe: and if we find ourselues to haue done amisse, there our inditement is throughly framed, and our iudgement already giuen vpon vs, and there remaineth nothing but execution.

Thus ye see the ordinarie maner that God vseth in chastizing me. But in Iob he had an other respect. For he punished not him for his sins, (not that he deserued it not) for there is no creature so rightuous that can exempt him self from Gods correctiōs: But yet for all that (as I haue declared afore) God had not a respect to Iobs offences, he punished him not in that measure by reason of his misdeedes, but to trye the faith and patience of his seruāt, and also to make him an example to all the world. In the meane whyle Iob had his mouth shet, so as he wist not what to say: and therefore it behoueth vs not to inquire any other cause why he was handled so roughly: It is a secreet vnknowne to men. Then is it not without cause that Iob desireth God to answer him, that is to say, too enter in to plea with him, and to suffer him to mainteyne his owne soundnesse, and to let him know why he indureth such torments. But herewithall let vs marke, that it is not lawfull for men to challenge God after that sort. For it is good reason that he should handle vs after his owne pleasure, and that we should stoupe to him although the cause of his iudgements be not apparant vnto vs. Then if it please God to visit vs with rigor, and wee see not why he doeth it: yet must wee kepe our mouth shet that we murmur not against him, and neuerthelesse haue it open still to glorifie him, confessing that although his iudgements be a bottomlesse deepe, yet they cease not to be iust and rightfull. Thus ye see what we haue to note. For in good faith, there is not a more terrible thing, than if God should enter into lawe with vs. If he set himself against vs, alas, what shall become of vs? Then if we fall to prouoking of him, and desire too go to lawe with him, is it not to our greate confusion? And this doctrine is well woorthie too be noted. For wee see how men doo dayly fall too murmuring and grudging in themselves. And what else is that, but too prouoke God, and to desire to go to lawe with him? But shall we bring our matters well to passe?

True it is that they which skitmish, after that fashion when they be afflicted, say not that they would haue God to be against them: but in the meane whyle, that is the marke which they shoote at. For if a man be impacient in his afflictions, and hold not himself in quiet by yeelding too Gods good will too take correction at his hand: I pray you doeth he not lift vp himself, too the intent that God being so prouoked too wrath, should maynteyne his owne right? Let vs keepe ourselues from quareling with God when he stryketh vs with his rodde, that we haue him not our deadly enemy: and let vs learne rather to submit vs vnto his hand, and to like well of that which he doeth, although the reason therof be hidden from vs for a tyme. Surely we ought to desire earnestly, that it may please God to shewe vs why he scourgeth vs: Howbeit that must not be done to any other end, than to profit our selues by his corrections, and to apply our chastizements to our instruction, when we knowe the cause of them. Therefore when euery of vs feeling his owne sinnes, is sory that he hath offended God, and ashamed of his owne lewdnesse, and therevpon humbleth himself, seeking remedie to turne away from his euill: I say when we by all meanes indeuer to apply Gods corrections to our owne vse, and to make them turne into such a discipline, as we may shew ourselues not to be vtterly past amendment: we may wel after that manner desire God to make vs vnderstand why he scourgeth vs, to the end that his corrections be not in vayne. But if he list to vse his power, and to hold vs there as it were in ignorance, so as wee know not why he vseth so greate rigor against vs: yet must wee in such extremitie cast downe our heads, and flee for refuge vnto that which I haue declared already, namely that God is righteous in all respects: and therefore that although wee knowe not the cause why he afflicteth vs: yet wee must not cease to glorifie him continually. Lo what wee haue too marke in this Reyne. And herewithall let vs come to that which Iob sayeth: My marke (sayeth he) is that the Almighty should answer mee. If myne aduersarie wright a booke, and it beoume me to beare it, I will not be ashamed to carry it. I shall not be like an offendour that is indyted and condemned: but that booke shall rather maynteyne my soundnesse: I durst (sayeth he) dock myselfe with it as with a crowne. VVhen Iob speaketh so, he meeneth that all the accusations which were layed against him, were false: and that he had ben wrongfully sleandered considering that he had liued innocētly. Howbeit in saying so, he meeneth not that he had ben vtterly cleare, so as there was no faulte to be found in him: For (as it was seene yesterday) he hath confessed himself a sinner, yea and protested that he hid not his faults as men are wont to do, and according as we see mennes hypocrisie to be such as euery man would fayne hide himself with vayne and trifling lurkingholes. Iob declared that he intended no such thing, but that he freely condemned himself when he had done amisse, yea and taried not till men of authoritie reprobued him: but suffered him self to be shamed by the most despised sort, & humbled himself so low, as too receyue correction by those which were not worthy to looke vpon him. So then in this text Iob meeneth not that he was vtterly without sin or stayne, (for then were there contrarietie in his words) but he layeth forth his case according as we haue seene: that is to say, that he was not as a reprobate, and that although God handled him roughly, yet folowed it not that he did it for any haynouse faults of his: but for some other secreet cause.

VVe see then in effect, that Iob ment not to exalt himself against God with such pride as many do, which vphold themselves to be righteous, yea euen without feeling the finnes that they haue committed. And although he had liued as an Angel, yet notwithstanding he knew well that God might find sufficient cause in him to punish him. Neuerthelesse he mainteyneth his owne vncorruptnes, to the intent to separate himself from the nūber of the despisers of God.

of God. Hereby we be taught, that there is a meane for vs to maynteine a good cace. VVe know that they which are most faultie are by their good will most bold too iustifie themselves when they are rebuked. And although their condemnation be apparant ynough, and euery man doeth see that they be nothing worth: yet notwithstanding they will be most shamelesse in maynteyning themselves to bee faultlesse, and affirme themselves too haue greate wrong to be reprocued. But contrariwise, although Gods children haue indeuered to walke aryght: yet notwithstanding the first thing that they do, is that they yeeld themselves gilty, and acknowledge themselves too be wretched sinners. Therevpon we see that if a man go about to iustifie himself without exception, he vndertaketh warre against God. For whosoever sayeth that he is no sinner, intendeth to make God a lier, as sayeth S. Iohn in his Canonickall epistle. God hath pronounced one general sentence vpon vs all, and experience also ought to shewe vs, that all of vs ought to flee to Gods mercie for refuge. Hee then that will iustifie himself without exception, warreth manifestly against God, and iustleth with him. And what shall he winne by it in the end? Nothing: But what must we do after we haue acknowledged our faults? If we be reprocued for any thing, and feele our selues gilty, let vs cast downe our heades and acknowledge ourselves to haue deserued, that God should put vs to such shame, as to be condemned by men (yea euen of the basest sort) and to haue them to be our iudges. But if we knowe not that wee haue offended in the thing wherof we are accused: Gods meening is to humble vs after another sort: Neuertheless it behoueth vs to receiue correction patiently. Finally if men reprocue vs, and will through rashnesse beare vs downe that we be offenders, wheras we knowe the contrarie: It were hypocrisie for vs to graunt that such slaunders are trewe. If a man were accused of robbrie, of whordome, or of murther, and were clere of it, so as he might protest before God and his Angels that there is no such thing in him: If he do condemne himself he doeth euill. So then we may well maynteyne our cleernesse after the maner that Iob doth: not only in respect of our honestie, as the vainglorious sort do, which wil not in any wise be touched at al, but as tender of their honour as they cannot suffer it to be touched, no not though they haue defamed themselves, but wold haue their shame couered, & yet in the meane while they themselves blast it abroad, so as euery man knoweth it: VVe must not go that way to worke, but euery man must in that case iudge of himself as he ought to do of his neighbours, and we must lerne to condemne the euill, and too allowe the good, without accepting of persons. Lo after what maner we may maynteyne a good quarrell. And that is the cause why Iob sayeth, if God wold answer mee, though all the men vpon the earth should bend themselves against mee, and that myne aduersarie partie, alleage all that is possible: I shall be so farre off from being ashamed to beare it, that I shall take it as a crowne to decke me withall. It shall be an ornament vnto me. But herewithall let vs marke also, that when we intend to maynteyne our owne innocencie: It is not ynough for vs, to hyde our shame before men: but our principall point must be, that God may bee as our warrant, and answer for vs. True it is that the answer wherof Iob speaketh, is ment as I haue declared: that is to wit, that God should as it were enter an ordinarie proces against him, and shew the cause why he scourgeth him: but yet therewithall Iob pretendeth, that if God wold giue him libertie to maynteyne his case, all wold make on his side, and they that had reiected him by cause of his extreme afflictions, should be found liers. So then (as I haue touched afore) we see it is to no purpose to haue escaped from me, but we must specially haue an eye vnto God, to bring our good cace before him, that he (as I sayd) may warrant it, and we receyue sentence of discharge at his hand. And wold God that this were well printed in our hearts. For we see nowadays that all is one with vs, so we may be releas'd before the world, we seeke nothing but that: and so is God despised. For there is none of vs which thinketh that euer he shall render an accompte before him. But we loke that no man may byte vs, and that if any man come to assaye vs, we may haue wherewith to kepe him off. Therefore when wee be so escaped from the world, wee think all is safe, and so in the meane while, that is the thing which maketh vs bold to exalte ourselves the more against God: wherfore let vs think well vpon this doctrine, that is to wit, that it is a wretched reward when the world shall soothe vs, and God allowe vs not: And therefore about all things, let euery man examin himself what he is, and let not that be done after his owne fancie, but according to Gods lawe. For we knowe we bee no competent iudges, but it behoueth vs to receyue iudgement by the lawe, and by the things that are sayd and contened there. So then let Gods seate be set vp by hauing his worde before our eyes, and let vs consider throughly whether we haue walked as he commaundeth, and whether wee haue not swarued from his word: and if we haue done amisse, let vs learne to condemne our selues. And furthermore if he graunt vs the grace to obey him, although there be many vices in vs, yet notwithstanding so that our cheef marke haue ben to obey him, let it content vs to be allowed of him though the world condemne vs, and let it not greue vs that the world chargeth vs with slaunders, so that God reache vs his hand and accept vs, and shewe that he liketh wel of our life. VVhé we be at this point, let the dogges barke at vs so long as they cannot byte vs: and although we seeme (by the report of our enimies) to be the wickedest men in the world, yet let vs beare all things patiently. This is the thing that we haue to marke in this text. And so we see that there are two points to note. The one is that we must not giue our selues to ambition and vanitie, to seke our owne prayse before me, & to exempt our selues from Gods iudgement: but contrariwise it behoueth vs to feele how terrible Gods wrathe is, and to examin wel our owne consciences, to the end we be not faultie before him. VVhé we haue obeyned this, (that is to say, when God hath graunted vs the grace to walke vprightly, so as we be sure that he alloweth vs:) let vs beare the slaunders and false accusations of the world patiently, and tarry till God shewe our soundnesse openly, and make it to shyne as the breake of the daye according as he hath promised too do. And that is the second point. Yet notwithstanding as touching that Iob sayeth, that he will beare the booke that shall be made against him as a crowne, that is to say, the proces wherby he shall be charged after that sort with his faults: It is not ment that it is alwayes an honour vnto vs afore men too haue a good cace. And surely it is vnpossible to find a better case than Sainct Paules was, in that he had serued God faythfully in his office, and yet notwithstanding he sayled not to be charged and accused falsly. And what doeth he? For as much as he seeth that men are blind and ignorant and iudge wrongfully: he appealeth to the day of God. I appeale (sayeth he) to the day of the Lord. Ye see that sainct Paule is constreyned to vse such remedie, according as oftentimes it cometh to passe, that wee be defaced, and that the world holdeth vs for wicked, so as we be disgraced, by cause the wicked are so shamelesse, that all is one with with them to speake euil of men by hooke or by crooke. But yet in the meane whyle we shall not cease to go still with our heads vpright. And why? For wee may appeale vnto God for our warrant, as wee see the prophets doo. VVhen Jeremy sayeth, Lord if I be a deceyuer, thou hast deceyued mee: It is bycause it was layd to his charge that he did nothing but beguile the people. VVell (sayeth he) if it be as you saye, then hath God deceyued mee. VVhē he speaketh after that maner, he meeneth not that there is any deceit or guile in God, but he doth boldly repress 10 all the slaunders that were layd vpon him, saying: Arme yourselues against God, for I knowe that he will maynteyne my quarrell. And Esay reporting that he was reiected of me, and as greatly reproched & despised as could be: sayeth, yet will the Lord answere for mee. So then whensoever we be defaced and oppressed by men, and blamed by the whole world: yet shal we not fayle to haue a crowne of glorie, if we haue record before God. And that is the cause why Iob sayeth that he will ouerthrowe all the slaunders that shall be layed against him. No no 20 (sayeth he) I wil not come as an offender that is condemned alreddie in himself, before that informations be put in against him (for he is conuicted in his owne conscience of the misdeede that he hath doone: ) but I will come as a prince. And vndoubtedly the children of God are the iudges of their iudges whē they be wrongfully oppressed by men. It is certayne that they dare more boldly appeare, referring theselues wholly vnto God, and resting in him, than those dare which condemne them through malice, violence and tyranny. VVheras the enimies of the truth 30 do now adayes condemne the faithfull to be burned, and in doing therof do sit vnder their clothes of Estate: do we not thinke that a gallowes is more honorable wheron a martyr shall be tormented, or a stake that is set vp for a childe of God to be burned at? Yes: For that surmounteth all the thrones of the world. Kings and Princes together with all their iudges, must needs through their wickednesse vnhalowe the seats that are hallowed and dedicated vnto God. And forasmuch as they sit in them, they must needs be full of filthinesse and infection, bycause 40 they followe not the wil of him which hath set the there, and so they make those places shamefull and detestable, which notwithstanding of theirselues are honorable. Contrariwise, although a stake or a Gibbet be a lothsome thing to the worldward: yet notwithstanding it is certayne, that when a Martyr and a child of God bringeth a good conscience thither, and suffereth there in a good quarrell: he sanctifieth the same which was after a sorte cursed. So then it is not for nought that Iob sayeth, that if god wil be so gratiouse to him as to aunswere him (that is to say, too 50 giue him leaue to mayntayne his Innocency and to heare him declare his life) he will come with a lofty countenance like a prince, and not drooping like an offendour: and he will boldly receyue all the books that can be written against him, taking them as an ornament, crowne, our garlad. This is it also which ought to comfort vs, namely, our walking in vprightnesse before God, and our indeuering to serue and honour him. For then if the world be vnthankfull, and men do vs wrong and degrade vs, it maketh no matter, so we can protest before God, that our 60 case is good, and also that wee be able to shewe that it is so, when we be drawne before men. For it is a shamefull thing to say, God is my witnesse, when the rest of our doings are not answerable to it: according as many men call God to record rashly, and yet it is knowne too bee clean contrarie. But if we wil be allowed of God, we must so deale as the world may heare witnesse of our vprightnesse whē it cometh to the hearing: and we must haue our mouth open to declare how the matter goeth, and to disproue the slaunders that shal be layde against vs. Furthermore, when we haue this, (that is to say, when wee haue good record that we be not faultie before God,) and can also shewe the same in deede: Then although men make bookes against vs, (that is to say although they deface vs with so many blames and slaunders as shall seeme to be houg mountaynes:) yet shal the same be no heauy burthē to vs, bycause we shall be vphild by Gods hād, and rest ourselues vpon him. But rather we shall make it a crowne or garland vnto vs. For it is much better for vs to be so blamed of the world, and that God should allowe of vs: than to be flattered on all sides, and that the same should excuse vs, according as we see there be many that take libertie to do euill and to despise God, bycause the world sootheth them. For what is the reason that so many men runne out of square, and giue themselues the bridle to all euill: but bycause they haue ben spared, and mennes eyes haue ben shet to wink at all their wicked doings? Lo what is the cause of their destruction. So then it is much better that our Lord should be our warrant, and in the meane whyle the whole world be against vs: than to be praysed and commended of the world, and in the meane whyle to haue heauē crye out for vengeance against vs. VVe see how the Pope is exalted nowadayes in his holinesse, and that although he be a monster and a diuell incarnate: yet do all men bowe to him, and giue greater rides of honour to him, than to God. And in the meane whyle, is not this a cause to augment his damnation more and more? As much is to be sayd of them that iustifie the world, too the end the world also should receiue and flatter them in all their sinnes. But contrariwise (as I haue sayd) let vs learne to looke continually vnto God, and in the meane whyle if he suffer vs to be vniustly condemned of men, let vs suffer it patiently, and not cease to beare our heads still vpright. Furthermore, (according to that which is sayd here, concerning the reckening of all our steppes) let vs bee ready to yeeld an account whensoever we shal be accused of any cryme. Let vs not thinke to scape Gods iudgement by concealing any misdeede in vs: but let vs consider that it behoueth vs to answere for ourselues, and that although men doo iustifie vs, yet they cannot hyde the things that are in vs from God. Now after that Iob hath spoken so, he addeth his last protestation for a full knitting vp. If my land (sayeth he) haue cried against me, or if the furrowes therof complaine that I haue eaten the foynson of it without money, or if those that haue tilled it complaine of me that I haue oppressed them: let mee eate Thistles in steade of wheate, and darnell in steade of barley. Hereby Iob concludeth that which wee haue seene afore: that is to wit, that although he had ben greuously afflicted by the hand of God, yet notwithstanding men ought not to haue condemned him as though he had ben a greater offender than others whome God spared. And why? For (as I haue sayd) God keepeth not all one rate in afflicting men. Sometime he punisheth them for their sinnes, and otherwhyles when he intendeth to visite his owne seruauants with extreme rigor, he reserueth the cause of their afflictions to himself. For although they haue serued him and indeuored to frame themselues wholly to his righteousnesse: yet will he not therefore for beare to send them right greate afflictions. In that case we knowe not what to say, vntill the last day when God shall manifest the things vnto vs which now are hidden. So then Iob sheweth that we must not esteeme his lyfe according to the state wherin he is. For although he bee the miserablest of all men to outward sight: yet doeth he protest that he had a desire to serue God. And wherin shesheweth he that we haue heretofore seene many of his protestations, and now this is the last, that his land cried out against him. True it is that the earth hath no mouth to cry nor complaine, nother hath it feeling to suffer any wrong at our hand, nother semeth it that we do the earth any wrong: inso much that although it could speake, yet a mā wold not say that it had cause either to cry or to weepe or to make any complainte against vs. VVhat doeth Iob then meene by saying that his land complaind not, and that his furrowes wept not: He meneth not that the earth of it self hath cause to complayne: but the holy scripture vseth such maner of speche, to make vs perceiue the better and with greater vehemencie, that if we do amisse before God, the creatures shal be against vs, and beare witnessse against vs. As how? If we haue oppressed the poore labourers that til the earth to giue vs foode: If we haue vsed extortio against thē, or if we haue plucked away their goods. not only they shal beare witnessse against vs, but the earth which they haue tilled shal also depose against vs. And why? For they haue bestowed their sweate there, and that is as their blood. Now it is a greate cruelty in vs, whē we think not how the earth on her behalf hath opened her bowels according to the order that God hath set, and yelded her frute when shee was tilled. The earth thē hath don hir dutie & wrought with hir labourer, as if ther were a mutuall agreement betwixt thē, and yet notwithstanding behold how the Seagulfes deuoure the foyson of the earth, taking away mens goods, and doing them a thousand extortions. Then if the laborer complaine, must not the earth also on hir parte answer which hath be as it were tormented. Ye see then why the holy scripture vseth such speech, we see the hardnesse that is in vs, in so much that if a mā tel vs of our sinnes, we think our selues quite discharged, if we may find some prety starting hole. And although we be conuicted of thē before God, yet are we not so afraide as to be fory for them, or to feele how dreadful the wrath of God is. Therefore it behoueth vs to be spurred, not as asses, but as folke that are vterly hardened: Inso much that whē God striketh vpon vs with mayne strokes as vpon stones, he can no more soften vs or make vs to yeld, than stithies or anuilles, except it be by force. Thus ye see what we haue to marke. And so, as oftē as the scripture speaketh after that maner, namely that the earth crieth out and that hir furrowes aske vengeance: let vs vnderstand that God reprobeth our stubbornesse, and sheweth vs that we be so blinded in our sinnes, as we cannot come to knowledge except he drawe vs to it by some violent meanes. Marke well t<sup>r</sup> at point. So therefore let vs not continue hardharte: whē we see our Lord vseth such vehemencie against vs to wake vs withal: but at leastwise let vs then enter into the examination of our faults, and be cast downe before him. Lo what we haue to marke. And therewithall also we must come from the earth to the mē. It is said that a righteous mā wil haue a care of his horse, his ox, and his asse: but the wicked men wil turmoyle their brethre and neyghbours, in eating vp the sustenance of their life without any equitie. Therefore whē we heare any speaking of the earth and the beasts: let vs vnderstand that it is to the end we should be the more indifferēt towards our neyghbours, which are our flesh and blood, and of the self same nature that we our selues are: So that if we vse any tyrannie and crueltie, that thing must needs be fulfilled on vs which is said in the holy scripture, namely that our withholding of the wages of such as haue trauayled and taken paines for our profit, shall cry vnto heaven, and all creatures shal beare witnessse of the wrong & extortio that we haue don to our neyghbours, according also as the Prophet Abacuk speketh of it, saying that the walles of the houses which are builded with deceyte and extortion shal cry out loude and shirle, and play the quiresters in that behalf (as they terme thē:) so as they shal answer one another on either side: the one side singeth, behold blud: the other, behold murder: the one behold deceit: the other, behold crueltie: the one behold pilling & polling: the other behold couetuousnesse: the one behold periury, the other, behold robberie, and another, behold spightfulnesse. So then let vs marke wel, that according as we shal haue abused the creatures of God, so must they aske vengeance against vs at the latter day. And therefore let vs take warning hereby to walke with such cōscience, as we may go with our heads vpright, not as perfect before God to beare out his iudgemēt & vengeance, but rather as it may please him to receiue vs by his infinite goodnes, and so to guide vs by his holy spirit, as we may apply our indeuer to serue him with a good conscience, according to the grace which he shal haue giuen vs.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may haue our whole recourse vnto his mercy, and therewithall euery of vs so inforce himself to walk in purenesse of life, as we may be able by the power of his holy spirit, to resist al tēptations, and to followe whether soeuer he cal vs, and iustly protest that we haue serued the liuing God, and sought nothing but to glorifie his name as it becommeth Christians to do. For the performauce wherof, it may please him to graūt: that all the time of our life, we may seke altogether to please him, and by that meanes edifie one another, to drawe euen the silly ignorant sort to the light of the Gospell, wherunto our good God calleth vs by his grace: and that to the same end it may please him to raise vp true and faithfull ministers of his woord, &c.

The cxix. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xxxij. Chapter.

THESE three men left speaking to Iob by cause he esteemed himself to be righteous.

2. And Eliu the Sonne of Barachel the Buzite, of the house of Ram, vvas angrie and fore displeased vvith Iob, by cause he sayd he vvas more rightuouse than God.
3. Also he vvas angrie vvith his three freends, by cause they had made none ansvver, and yet condemned Iob.

That we may fare the better by that which is contained here, and by the things that we shal see hereafter, we must beare in mind what we haue seene heretofore: namely, that Iob hauing vnderaken a good case, did hādle it amisse: and that those which came to cōfort him, hauing vnderaken an euil case, vsed good argumētts & apparāt reasons, wherof profitable doctrine might be gathered. And therefore there was a fault in thē, by cause they laid not a good foundatiō: and there was a faulte in Iob by cause he builded amisse vpon a foundation that was good in it self. And that is the cause why it is said now, that Eliu the Buzite was angrie & inflamed vvith

Wrath, by cause those said men had not disproued Iob, and yet notwithstanding had condēned him: and also that he was angry with Iob, by cause he went about to iustifie himself about God. So we see that this anger of Elius was not without cause, as wel against Iob, as against his three friends that came to comfort him. For although Iob had a iust and resonable quarrell, yet did he farre ouershot himself: and although the other alledged very good reasons, yet did they resist God: for their reasoning was to an euill purpose. Now in the meane whye it is said, that Iobs three friends left off to dispute any more against him, by cause he thought himself to be righteous. We haue seene that Iob made not so great accompt of his owne righteousnesse, but that he thought there were many faults to be found in him, and therefore on the contrary parte, he protesteth himself to be a wretched sinner. Howbeit he wold not condēne himself at the wil of those which iudged amisse of his affliction. The opinion and imaginacion of Iobs three friends, was that Iob was a castaway before God, by cause he was handled so roughly. But it is sayd that we ought to iudge discretely of the party whom god correcteth. For we must not cōclude that euery mā is punished according to his offences. Some times God spareth the wicked and wincketh at their misdemeanes, and that is to their forer damnation: For they shall pay right dere for Gods goodnesse in tarrying for the so paciētly. Then if God do sometimes make no cōtenance of punishing those that haue deserued it, let vs not therefore think that they haue made the better market, nother let vs iustifie the by cause God spareth the. And contrariwise whē we see a man beaten with Gods scourges: let vs not therefore think him to be wickedder than al the rest of the world. For it may be that God will trye his pacience, & not punish him for his sinnes. Now Iob would not cōsent to this sonde doctrine of his freendes: and that is the cause why he seemed to them to iustifie himself, though he ment no such thing. And therefore (as hath ben heretofore shewed) let vs beware of vndertaking any euill quarrell: For we shall be blinded, and it will seeme to vs, that if a man agree not fully with vs, he is so condemned as we ought not to haue any further talke with him. But before we enter into disputacion, let vs be wel assured of the truth. There is nothing worse than to be to hasty: we know that these ordinary prouerbes are continually put in vre amongs vs, namely that hast maketh wast, and that a soles bolt is soone shor. Seing it is so, let vs learne to hold our iudgement in suspence, vntil we be throughly assured of the truth. And herewithal let vs marke, that oftentimes it may happen that we shall be wrōgfully condēned before men. And although that such as do backbite vs haue their mouths stopped, and haue not any reason to cōvince vs withall: yet they wil not cease to be caried away with such spite, as to slander vs, and to cast foorth wicked words against vs. Hereby we be warned, that if men bee so malicious as to condēne vs without proof, we must not take it to much to hart: For it is no noueltie: It happened to Iob that excellent seruant of God: and at this day we see that the papists think ynough, to haue decreed that their lewd errors, superstitions, and false doctrines, are good. For they steppe to it with a maystely style, that it is ynough for them to haue determined it to be so. There is no entring into disputacion, nor any serching by reason how things go. For to their owne seeming they haue all authoritie, and therevpon they thūder against vs. But in the meane seazō we know that truth is on our side, & we are fully resolued of it. VVherfore let vs resist such tēptations, and not be abashed at the, seing that at all tymes they that had no reason for themselves, haue notwithstanding not ceased to condēne the good case boldly and without remorse of conscience. Seing the that the diuell blindeth the so: let vs always kepe on our course, & sticke stedfastly to the truth that we knowe. And for our owne parte also let vs take warning to walk more leysurely when we haue ben anywhit to hasty. For oftentimes it wil fall out, that the children of God shal be ouerseene, and not haue stay ynough of ourselues. Therefore let vs not go on still, neither let our rashnesse be matched with wilfulnesse. Truly it is a hard thing: For he that hath once ouershot himself, doth commonly become wilfull. Howbeit when we haue done amisse we must not cōtinue in euill, but rather learne to restraine our selues, saying: I haue here exceeded measure, & I know wel I haue not bridled my self with such modestie as I ought to do. VVhat isto be done? Oh, I must not harden myself: but seing I haue taken a wrōg way, I must returne backe againe. Ye see then that by the exāple of Iobs friends, the holy ghost warneth vs, first, to be wel aduised that we take no quarrel in had rashly against God: and secōdly that if we happen to be ouerseene we must not in any wise be wilful, nor proccede in our euill, but acknowledge our fault & labour to amend it out of hand. As concerning Eliu of whom mencion is made here, it is not without cause that the scripture sheweth vs of what stock he came, according as he is named the Buzite, of the house of Ram. For here we see first the aūcientnesse that we touched heretofore: & the principal point also which God mēt to declare vnto vs, is that there hath always remained some good seede of religiō among those that were wrapped in many fond fancies. And that is a very notable point. For we knowe that the world did out of hand fall away from God, and all men turned aside to corruptiō and lies. I meene euen immediatly after the flood, notwithstanding that the vengeance of God were so horrible and worthy of remembrance, and that the children of Noe which had escaped, (hauiug liued a long time after) might tell their children and successors after what maner God had taken vengeance of the wickednesse of the world. For notwithstanding all this: yet they fell all away and forsooke the right religion, turning aside vnto lyes, idolatrie, & all other disorders. Herein we see that men are exceeding frayle, & that there is nothing harder than to hold them in the feare of God & in good religion. True it is, that in respecte of euill, we be but too stedfast, we cannot be bowed aside: and if a man wold go about too amend the euill in vs, he knoweth not at which end to begin, nother can he bring it to passe, by cause there is such a piteouse hardheartnesse in vs. But as for goodnesse: wee forgo it by and by: there needeth nothing to thrust vs from it. VVe haue a faire mirrour hereof shewed vs in this, that men went astray, and forsoke the pure knowledge of God so soone after the flood, notwithstanding that they were cold of it. And herewithal we see in this example of the persone of Eliu, that God hath always left some good seede in the middest of darknesse, and that there hath alwayes ben some good and holy doctrine. And why? To the end the vbeleuers should bee left vnexcusable, so as they could not alledge that ignorance reigned ouer all. For wherof came it, that God was not serued and worshipped purely, but for that men turned their backs vpon him? And they did not that through a simplicite, wherunto they might giue some colour of honesty: but rather of a stubborne wilfulnesse. Men are loth to be beguiled, yea or to seeme to be beguiled: but whē it cometh to the seruing of God, they shet their eyes, quench all the light that shyned in them, and seeke nothing but to giue ouer themselves to all trumperie. This is the thing that is shewed vs here. But it behoueth vs to way wel what hath ben

Psal. 4. v. 1.

ben treated of heretofore : namely that although these men were no Prophets of God, yet notwithstanding the doctrine that proceeded from them had such a maiestie, as it might right well besecme the person of Prophets. True it is (as I haue sayd) that they did misapply it. But yet notwithstanding there was an excellent spirit in them. And in very deede (as I haue declared afore) the things that haue ben set out by them, ought to be receyued as out of the schole of the holy ghost. And although these personages were so excellent : yet were they not taught by the lawe of Moyses, but were separated from the churche of God. For if the lawe were published at that tyme (which thing is vncerteyne,) yet were they distant from the countrey of Iury, and had not any fellowship with them, that they might bee partakers of the doctrine which God had simply appointed for his people. VVe see then that men which had no scripture, nor any thing saue the doctrine which Noe and his children had spred abroad after the fludde: are Prophetes of God, and haue an excellent spirit. And although they dwelt in a strange countrey, yet we see that God had giuen them a knowledge sufficient to edifie all the common people. Thus ye see how the world could not bee excused of ignorauce. For although idolatrie reigned in the tyme of Thare and Nacor, and that they themselues also were idolaters, (as it is sayd in the last chapter of the booke of Iosua) and that those which came of them folowed their steppes : yet notwithstanding Elia which was of the house of Ram, and the other three, were exempted from the common corruptions of that tyme : And so wee see that the pure religion was not quite abolished among them, but that they had a sufficient doctrine to leade them to God, and to conuince the world of the wilfulnesse and ignorauce that was in it. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place. Also when we heare it sayd, that God gaue men ouer to walke in destruccion: Let vs marke well, that it is bycause he was not so gratiouse to all mē, as to giue them the peculiar doctrine which he had reserued to his owne people and church : but yet was that no excuse for them. God therefore did let all men runne astray, and they were all drowned in destruccion: Neuerthelesse there continued alwayes some seede in their hearts, whereby they were so conuicted as they could not say that they knewe not God, nor had any religion, nother could any of them cleare himself from it. For it aboade ingrauen in their consciences, that the world was not made by it self, but that there was a heauenly maiestie wherunto it must needs bee subiect. Verely saint Paule speaketh expressely of the records which God hath imprinted in his creatures insomuch that the order of the world is as it were a booke to teach vs, & ought to leade vs vnto God. Howbeit herewithall it behoueth vs too come to that which is treated in the second chapter to the Roimaynes, namely that God hath grauen such a certeinie in our consciences, as we cannot wipe away the knowledge which we haue of good and euill. Every man hath not so much knowledge as wee heare that Iobs three freends had: But yet notwithstanding we shall neuer find any mā so rude & barbarouse, but he hath some remorse of conscience, and knoweth that there is a God: and hath some discretion to condemne the euill and to allowe the good. God then hath left these traces and crancks in the hearts of the ignorantest, to the end that men might not couer themselues with any excuse, but be condemned by the inditement that is laid vp within themselues. And by the way let vs marke, that it was foolishly doone of men to fight against God, in maintenaunce of the doctrine which had reigned among thē. For seeing that the knowledge of God hath shyned so clere in the world, as all men might be inlightened by it, as we haue seene afore : How is it possible that they should giue ouer themselues to so grosse a beastlynesse, as to worshippinge stocks and stones, to honour the Sunne and Moone, to make puppets, and quite and cleane to forgette the liuing God? How could this come to passe? For it is all one as if a mā should wilfully runne headling against a thing at hygh none, or like the stumbling of a dronken man that reeleth aside, though he see the right way before his eyes. VVe see thē that men swarued not aside through simplicitie, but that they spighted God through a purposed malice: and therefore let vs consider it well, to the end wee runne not any more to these wonted shifts, to say: I pray you if mē be so dazed as they knowe not any thing concerning God, ought it not to serue to excuse them? when any man alledge th this: let vs on the contrary parte take that for our answer, which is sayd in saint Iohn : namely, that the light shined in darknesse: and we see the same by this present example. For it had ben vnpossible for men to haue runne astray into so grosse and outrageouse superstitions, if they had not wilfully throwne themselues into them. Their ignorauce therefore was matched with wilfulnesse and stubbernesse, when they forsooke the right way of saluation, and gaue themselues ouer too their idols. Lo what we haue to beare away. And it warneth vs to be the more ware in walking, whyle we haue the light with vs: I haue sayd already, that if God be so gratiouse to vs as to shewe vs the way, it behoueth vs to make hast, and it is no time for vs to sleepe, and much lesse to shet our eyes wilfully. At this day we see that greate darknesse reigneth ouer most parte of the world. The wretched Papists go astray, and knowe not what they do. And why? For God hath giuen them ouer as they be woorthy: and forasmuch as they haue forgotten the truthe, his vengeance must needs come vpon them as a water flood, to ouerwhelme them and drowne them in destruccion. But we on our side haue Iesus Christ, who is the Sunne of righteousness that shineth vpon vs. And therefore we must not haue our eyes shet, but we must walke whyle the day lasteth, following the exhortation that is giuen vs here, that we become not gilty of wilfull defacing of the knowledge which is giuen vs at these dayes. Thus ye see what wee haue to marke in the first place of this sentence. Now as touching the anger of Elia, let vs marke that it is not blamed here as an inordinate passion: but it is a good and allowable mistyking, bycause it proceedeth of a zeale that Elia had toward Gods truth, when he saw Iob iustifie himself in such wise, as he esteemed himself more righteous than God. Iobs freends had not this knowledge. For they held opinion against him, that he was a wicked man : and Iob declareth that he was not so : No more was he indeede. Howbeit (as I haue sayd) he exceeded measure : and although his case was good, yet did he handle it amisse, and toke an euill way with it. Elia therefore marketh Iobs ouershooting of himself, and his murmuring now and then through impacience : and how that therein he wente about to iustifie himself aboute God. Againe he is angry at those that tooke vpon them the euill case vnadvisedly, & were not able to compasse it, but were confounded in it when it came to the pintche. Behold then how Elia is inflamed with anger, but not without cause: and forasmuch as his zeale was good, therefore the holy ghost allowed the anger and wrath that was in him. But by the way it behoueth vs to marke this saying, that Iob inteded to iustifie himself aboute God. Truly his intent was not so, & he would rather a hundred times that the earth had swallowed him vp, or that he had neuer ben borne into the world, than to haue to haue thought such a blasphemie. And truly I haue told you, that as often as he ouershot himselfe, it was not to conclude fully so, but it was through the raging of his passions, according as it is verie harde for men to staye themselves, but that many passions shall oftentimes escape them. Ye see in what case Iob was, and howe in the ende he alwayes condemned himselfe: and when he had done amisse, woulde not excuse it. Howe is it sayde then that hee intended to iustifie himselfe aboute God? This saying conteyneth a good and very profitable doctrine. For here we be taught, that we may sometimes happen to blaspheme God, when we thinke not of it. In what sort? In pleading agaynst him. If wee allowe not all things to bee good which God dooth, and specially when he afflicteth vs: It is certaine that we would make our selues more righteous than God. True it is, that we will not say it, neither will we thinke it: but the thing sheweth it selfe. And it is inoughe too condemne vs, if we do not glorifie Gods iustice in allowing it to be rightfull. This will bee the better vnderstoode by an example. Beholde Iob knoweth God to be righteous, yea and he vnfeynedly acknowledgeth him so to be: and as for his owne part, he acknowledgeth himselfe a wretched sinner, and that there are manie faultes too bee found in him, yea and that he if shoulde quarell agaynst God, he shoulde bee vanquished a thousande tymes, before hee coulde answere to any one poynt. Iob then meeneth not directly to iustifie himselfe aboute God, nor to make himselfe equall with him: but in the meane while what sayeth hee? I maruaile why God afflicteth mee thus? VVhat fault is there in mee? And againe, I am a poore creature, full of infirmitie, and is it meete that God shoulde stretche oute his strong arme agaynst mee? VVhy doth he not kill me out of hande? VVhen Iob runneth oute intoo so manie murmuringes and grudgings: no doubt but hee iustificeth himselfe aboute God. And why? For it seemeth too him that God is vnreasonable in afflicting him so: and bicause he knewe not why it was done, hee desired God to come thither as his aduersarie partie. Afterwarde againe hee is angrie that God consumeth him not out of hande, and that he sendeth him not quite away.

Seeing then that Iob had so headie passions, no doubt but in so dooing hee made himselfe more righteous than God. And this is it that I tolde you euen now: namely, that wee shall oftentimes blaspheme God in oure passions, ere wee thinke of it. VVhiche thing ought too cause vs too take the more heede, that wee giue not oure passions the brydie, least wee fall too suche wretchednesse as too blaspheme God ere wee bee aware. This doctrine then is verie profitable for vs, when the holy Ghost telleth vs that all suche as grudge and murmur in theyr afflictions, and cannot submit themselves too the mightie hande of God, too confesse that all his doings are rightfull and reasonable: do make themselves more righteous than God: and that although they say it not, but protest a hundred tymes that they neuer ment too thinke it: yet neuertheless, it is so indeede. And beholde a competent Iudge hath giuen determinate sentence vppon it, and therefore there is no kicking agaynst it: for we shall gaine nothing by it. So then, what remayneth, but too learne first and formoste too condemne our selues, and too bring our inditement alwayes readie made, when we come before God, and too say that we be wretched sinners?

And furthermore, that when Gods iudgements which hee shall execute vppon vs, seeme ouersharpe vntoo vs: et vs beare them patiently withoute making anie greate inquiries. If wee thinke it straunge that God shoulde handle vs with anie great rigour, and see not the reason why he dooth it: or if the miserie seeme too harde, and that God spareth not our frailtie, nor hath suche pitie of vs as he ought to haue: let vs not giue brydle too oure fancies to consent vntoo them, but let vs alwayes beare in minde, that God is righteous howsoeuer the worlde go. True it is, that wee shall not perceyue the reason why he dooth it. And whereof commeth that, but of oure owne infirmitie and rudenesse? Is it mee: that wee shoulde measure Gods iustice by our witte? VVhat a presumptuousnesse were that? VVhat reason were in it?

So then let vs learne too glorifie God in all things that hee dooth: and although his hande bee roughe too wards vs: yet let vs not ceasse to confesse still: Alas, Lord if I go to lawe with thee, I knowe well my case is ouerthrowne. Beholde howe Ieremie proceedeth in that behalfe, and sheweth vs the way in the things that wee haue to do. For although things were in so great confusion as hee might haue bene caryed away in a madnesse too murmure with the rest of the people: yet notwithstanding hee vseth this preface, Lorde I knowe thou arte righteous: Truly I woulde faine enter intoo disputation with thee, I am prouoked thereto by my fleshy desire, and by cause i see things so farre oute of order, I woulde faine inquire the cause why thou workest after suche a sorte: For I am tempted therevnto. Howbeit Lorde, before I take leaue to aske why thou dealest thus: I protest first, that thou art righteous and vnpartiall, and that nothing can come from thee which is not worthie of prayse.

Thus yee see that the manner of proceeding, which we ought too holde, so often as wee haue too deale with Gods incomprehensible iudgements: is too consider that our witte is not able to mounte so highe, and that they bee too deepe a dungeon for vs to go downe intoo. And let vs practize this thing cheefely in oure selues. For inasmuche as men are full of hypocisie, they alwayes beleue themselves to bee cleare and guiltlesse before God. And although they be not fully perswaded of it: yet they beare themselves in hande, that God hath no cause too pursue them with so greate rygour. Euerie man flattereth himselfe too lessen his owne finnes, although hee bee fully conuicted. VVell (sayth hee) it is true that I am a sinner, yet am I not of the worst sort in the worlde. And why knowe we not the greatnesse of oure finnes? Bicause wee tie scarfes afore our eyes.

Forasmuche then as wee are puffed vp with pryde: It standeth vs in hande too practize this lesson, specially when God afflicteth vs: namely, not too enter intoo quarelling with him, although his chastizements seeme ouerroughe to vs: But too acknowledge that there is a measurablenesse in all his doings, and that he is not excessiue: too the ende that the same maye teache vs too frame oure selues quietly vntoo his will. And whensoeuer Gods chastizing of vs, is not in respect of oure finnes: let vs assure oure selues, that the same is a singular grace, and a speciall priuiledge which hee gyueth vntoo vs. For there were alwayes iuste cause too punish vs, although wee were the rightououest persones in the worlde. But nowe are wee farre off from suche perfection. VVhat might God then doo vntoo vs? Neuertheless, if hee visite vs too trie oure patience, and graunt vs the grace too suffer for his names sake, when hee might punish vs for our finnes: let vs vnderstande that hee dooth vs an excellent great honour. And therefore fore let vs humble our selues, and euerie one of vs in hys owne behalfe haue the modestie to say, well, I woulde faine that God shoulde vse mee after another fashion, (for too my seeming hee passeth measure in afflicting mee:) but yet for all that, I knowe he doth it not without cause, and sirhe his afflicting of mee is not for my sinnes, it is so muche the more fauour that hee sheweth mee. For I haue deserued muche more: and therefore it behoueth me to stoupe, and to submit my selfe wholly to his good will.

Yee see then that the meane whereby God may be glorified through vs, and we yeelde vnto him the rightuoufnesse that is his: is by keeping our mouthes shutte, according as Sainct Paule treateth thereof in the thirde Rom. 3.c.19 to the Romaynes, saying: too the ende that all mouthes might bee stopped, and all the worlde acknowledge it selfe, too bee indetted vnto God, and that he onely shoulde be iustified. After what sort is it that God shal bee iustified by vs, according too Sainct Paule? Too witte, when all of vs condemne oure selues, and haue not the boldenesse too styrre agaynste God, but do willingly confesse that all of vs are indaungered vnto him. If wee bee once come too that poynt, then is God iustified: that is too saye, his rightuoufnesse is commended by vs with such prayse as he deserueth. But contrarywise, if men exalt themselues, and knowledge not that they bee indaungered vnto God, so as hee maye condemne them: nor confesse the bonde of dette whiche they haue forfeited vnto him: although they protest that they minde to iustifie him (that is to say, to confesse him too bee rightuous) yet neuerthelesse they condemne him.

Furthermore, whereas it is sayde that Eliu was so angrie: let vs marke that there is a greate difference betweene the anger that proceedeth of godly zeale, and the anger that any of vs is moued withal, either for his good, or for his honour, or for any respect of his owne. For he that is angrie and displeas'd through a priuate passion, is in no wise to bee excused: and although hee alledge that it is for a good cause, yet notwithstanding he offendeth God in beeing angrie: For we bee too blinde in oure owne passions. Therefore marke this for one poynt, that it behoueth vs to bydle our anger, specially when we bee prouoked to bee angrie with our neighbours in any respect of our selues. Howebeit there is one anger whiche is good, namely, that which proceedeth of the greefe that wee conceyue when God is offended. Then if we bee inflamed with a good zeale, and mainteyne Gods quarell: if we bee angrie we are not to blame for it: But let vs marke that such anger must bee without respecting of persones. For if a man bee angrie through a passion of the fleshe: suche one hath a respect too himselfe, and intendeth to mainteyne himselfe.

And againe, if hee intende too shewe that hee beareth a fauour to his frendes, and dooth more for them than for other men: then is there an accepting of persones bycause wee haue regarde too our selues. VVee should rather bee angrie with our selues, if we woulde that God shoulde allowe of our anger and wrath. And this is the thing which Sainct Paule speaketh: For hee alledgeth purposely that whiche is sayde in the Psalme concerning our beeing angrie, howebeit withoute offending. And howe is that done? It is when a man entereth into his owne conscience, and searcheth himselfe earnestly, and hath not an eye vnto others so much as to himselfe, to condemne himselfe, and to fight agaynste his owne passions. Ye see then after what sort we may be angrie, and at what poynt wee must beginne our anger, if we will haue it allowed of God: that is to witte, euerie man must beginne at himselfe, and bee angrie at his owne sinnes and vices, and cast vp our cooler at them, in that we see wee haue prouoked Gods wrath agaynste vs, and are full of so muche wretchednesse. Let vs bee angrie and greued at that, let that be the poynt for vs too beginne at: and afterwarde let vs condemne the euill whersoever it bee founde, as well in oure selues, as in our frendes: and let vs not bee ledde with any priuate hatred, to cast out our rage vpon any man bycause wee be forepossessed with some euill affection. After this maner shall our anger be allowable, and shall shewe that the same proceedeth of a true zeale to Godwarde. True it is that we shall not alwayes bee able too keepe measure: for although a godly zeale reigne in vs, yet shoulde we still doo amisse in exceeding measure, if God restrayned vs not. Therefore in this zealousnesse it behoueth vs too haue both discretion, and stay of our selues. But yet neuerthelesse (as I haue sayde already) this anger shall bee allowable, if it springe oute of the sayde fountaine: that is too say, if wee hate the euill whersoever wee fynde it: euen though it bee in our owne persons.

Nowe then what is the thing that we haue too marke in this streyne? First and forme, that we muste not condemne all anger, and that when we see a man chafed or in a choller, we must not alwayes take it for a vice, as we see these scorneres of God do, whiche say: Oh, will you scorne so? Is it meete you shoulde be angrie? Might you not vse a quieter fashion? They blaspheme and dispise God wickedly, according as there are manie to be seene, which coulde finde in their heartes to overthrowe alldoctrine: seeking nothing else but to spreade such corruptions abroade, as men might not any more knowe God, and that his truth might bee buried. And when they haue so done, they woulde haue men too winke at them, or rather to allowe all their dooings, and to tell nothing but fables in the Pulpit, so as there should be no rebuking of them at all. It is very well too the matter say they: can they not preach without beeing angrie? Howe then? Is it possible that we shoulde see a mortall and transitorie creature, lift vp himselfe after that fashion agaynste God, to trample all good doctrine vnder his feete: and yet notwithstanding beare it patiently? VVe should shewe thereby that there is no zeale of God in vs. For it is sayde in the Psalme, that the zeale of Gods house ought to eate vs vp. For if we had a worne gnawing vpon our hart, it ought not too greue vs so much, as when there is any reproche done vnto God, and when we see his truth turned into a lie. So then let vs learne, not to winke at vices, but let vs discern betweene godly zeale and the fleshy anger wherewith men are moued and inflamed in their owne quarells: according as it is sayde heere, that Eliu was kindled with displeasure and in a whote anger, and yet notwithstanding, it is reckened too him for a vertue: For it is the holye Ghost which speaketh it I say let vs consider heereby, that we must not at the first dashe reiect all anger: but haue an eye to the cause why a man is displeas'd. For when it greueth him that God is offended, and his truth peruerted: let vs consider that that anger of his springeth out of a good fountaine.

Furthermore, according too that which I haue said, let vs learne to ster our choler when we see Gods honor wounded, and when we go about to darken or deface his truth, let vs be moued & inflamed at it, that we may shew our selues the childre of god. For we canot give a better proof of it.

of it. Neuerthelesse, let vs herewithall keepe such measure, as we mingle not our owne excessiue passions with the zeale of God, but be discrete in putting a difference betweene them: and againe, although wee hate and abhorre the vices, yet notwithstanding let vs labour too bring the persons too saluation. Truly the practising hereof is hard. Howbeit, God will guide vs, so we suffer our selues to be ledde by his holy spirit, and giue him the whole government of vs. In the meane while it behoueth vs to marke well this doctrine, by cause that in these dayes wee see infinite occasions too be angrie at, if wee bee the children of God. On the one syde there are the Papistes, whiche seeke nothing but too abolishe all religion. True it is, that they will pretende to mainteyne Christianitie: but whatsoeuer they say, they intende nothing elsie but to suppress the Maiestie of God. VVee see howe Gods truth is torne in peeces, and what cursed blasphemies are spued oute by them. I pray you if these things shoulde not touche vs too the quicke, too be wounded with them as if a man should stryke vs with a Dagger: Shoulde wee not thereby shewe, that wee knowe not what God is, and that we are not woorthie too bee taken for his children? VVee bee so chare when our owne honestie is wounded, as wee can by no means indure it: and in the meane while, Gods honor shall bee put too all shame and reproche, and wee wyl make no countenance at all of it: And must not God then needes shake vs off, and shewe that wee haue had no affection to mainteyne his honour? Marke that for one poynt. Howbeit we neede not go so farre as the Papists: for euen among our selues when wee see these Dogs and Swine which seeke nothing but too defyle all things, which thrust their groynes at Gods woords, and labour to ouerturne all: when wee see these mockers of God, and these heathenish villaynes whiche turne all things into a scorne and mockerie: when we see wicked men turken, corrupt, and marre all things with their false slanders: and when we see heretikes sowe their poyson abroade too destroye all things: I praye you when wee see all these things, ought wee not to bee moued? It is sayde, that when men bende themselues agaynst God

after that manner, it is all one as if they woulde wounde him too death. They shall see him (sayeth the Scripture) whome they haue peeced. God telleth vs that men (in so dooing) come too stryke him with theyr Daggers: and shall wee in the meane while not passe for it? God telleth vs that his spirite is greued, and after a sort in payne: and shall wee but laugh at it? Againe, we heare suche horrible blasphemies, that the name of oure Lorde Iesus Christ is as it were torne in peeces: There is no talke nowe adayes but of scorning and reproching Gods name in suche wise, as a man might bee ashamed too heare of among the Turkes. VVee see naughtipackes that committe on the one syde whoredome and all disorders, and on the other syde outrage and all violence. Too bee short, wee see all things vterly out of square, and doo wee shewe oure selues too bee Gods children and Christians, if wee make no accounte of it? VVhat prooffe doo we giue of our Christendome? So muche the more then behoueth it vs too haue another maner of zeale than we haue had heretofore. And when any of vs is angrie, let it be for our sinnes: and specially if we see God greuously offended. So shall wee haue an anger that is allowed of God, like as he had that is spoken of heere, and whom the holy Ghost here prayseth. And yet notwithstanding, for as much as it is easie for vs to swarue aside: let vs therewithall beware that we giue not the bridle to our passions, but let vs pray God so to gouerne vs by his holie spirit, as our zeale may be altogether pure, to the ende it may be allowed of him.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may sigh and sobbe for them, and that whereas we haue bene ouermuch hardened heretofore by soothing our selues in our vices, so as we could not be greued to see the world so farre out of order: we may learne hereafter to bee sorie for our euill doings, and to desire him of forgiueneffe, to the intent he may so guide vs all the rest of our life by his holy spirite, as we may seeke altogether to serue and honor him in all poynts according to our calling. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly father, &c.

4. Eliu vwayted till Iob had made an ende of his vwoordes, because they vvere all elder than he.
5. And vwhen Eliu sawv those three men to haue no reason, he vvas moued to anger.
6. Therefore Eliu the sonne of Barachell the Buzyte aunsvvered and sayde, I am yonger in yeares than you, and you are auncient, and therefore I doubted and vvas afrayde too put forth mine opinion.
7. For I thought vvith my selfe, the yeares shall speake, and the length of time shall bring forth vvisedome.
8. But it is the spirite of God vvwhich is in men, and the inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding.
9. The great men shall not be vvise therefore, neither shall the aged haue iudgement.
10. Therefore I say, heare me, and I also vvill shewve my doctrine.

Esterday I treated of the zeale of Eliu, which is praysed to vs here by the holy ghost, and I shewed wherunto that example ought too serue vs: namely that when we see Gods truth defaced, and his name blasphemed, the same ought to wound our hartes. Also I shewed, that if we haue any affection to God and his honour: then must wee mainteyne hys truth to the vitermost of our power. True it is, that euey man shall not haue learning to do it. But yet neuerthelesse, according to our abilitie and measure, it behoueth vs to shew that our minde is too resist the euill, and not to consent vnto it. And therewithall it was declared, that this zeale ought to be guided vvith reason, so as wee must not be moued vvith ouergreat headinesse, but must haue some good respect matched vvith it. And that is the thing vvwhich we red euen now: namely that Eliu was not ouer-hastie, but had giuen care to all the sayings that had bene alledged afore, and therein hee shewed his modestie. Then let vs marke well, that if a man thrust himselfe foorth rashly, without considering whether it bee needfull for him to speake or no: it shall not bee reckened vnto him for zealousnesse. As for example: wee see manie that thinke it long till they may haue libertie too speake, and yet notwithstanding it is possible, that some other shall be much better able too lay foorth the matter than they: and yet (to their owne seeming) they shall neuer speake soone ynough. This hastinesse can neuer be allowable. And for prooffe therof, what knoweth he which speaketh to instruct others, whether some men be better able too do it than hee? Hee himselfe had neede too be taught, and hee thrusteth foorth himselfe to bee a teacher. But there is yet another fault: for when an ignorant person, or suche a one as is not well grounded, babbleth: hee stopperth the mouthes of suche as haue more grace, and better meanes too edifie withall. Therefore let vs marke well, that where modestie is not, there the zeale is rashe, and not gouerned by the spirite of God. For Gods spirite dooth in deede deale abroade his gracious giftes, but he is not contrarie to himselfe. Seeing then that he is named the spirite of discretion: it is meete for vs too discern when it is needefull to speake, or when to keepe silence.

1. Co. 12. b. 10

True it is that a man may well put foorth some good matter, although he be not of the most abilitie, but be inferior too others: Howebeit it behoueth him too deale fearefully, and too shewe that hee commeth with a desire and readinesse too take profite, and that hee had leuer bee a learner than a teacher. If a man go so too worcke, although hee speake before a multitude: yet will hee not saye too bee modest and lowly. But if a man fyle his speache, and make no ende of his talke, but determine vpon all things: therein hee sheweth, that there is some vaingloriousnesse in him, and more ouer, that hee giueth not roome too Gods grace, as hee ought too doo.

Thus ye see what is shewed vs in the example of Eliu, when hee sayde that he wayted till their wordes were at an ende: For hee knew not as yet wherevntoo the matter would come. And heerevntoo hee adderth, that hee bare reuerence vnto age. For hee sawe that both Iob, and those that talked with him, were auncient men. And forasmuch as age bringeth experience and grauitie with it: Eliu thrusteth not hymselfe foorth, knowing that when God suffereth a manne too liue a long time in the worlde, hee giueth him grace too bee able to profite suche as are yonger. For hee hath liued longer, and therefore hee ought also too bee better fertied, and too haue gotten some skill: And so the thing which we haue too marke in the seconde place, is that Eliu acknowledged those that had spoken afore him, too bee his auncientes. And here yong men haue a good and profitable lesson, if they can put it well in vre. For as I haue sayde already) when a man hath liued long, hee ought too haue remembered the things that God hath shewed him by experience and: those ought to serue him, not only for himselfe, but also to giue good counsell too others which haue not like experience. Also there is a grauitie matched with it. For yong men ought to thinke, that although God hath giuen them some vnderstanding, yet they want much, because they haue not seene much. If a man want experience surely hee shal from time to time rashly ouershoot himselfe: for hee forecalleth not the end of things, neither knoweth he where to begin: and moreover the heate that is in yong men, is alwayes contrarie to reason and good vnderstanding. Though a yong man be well stayed and also haue good knowledge therewith: yet notwithstanding youth driueth him headlong, & there is such boyling in his nature, as he cannot alwayes rule himselfe. VVee see howe Saint Paule warneth Timothy, that he should not be subiect to the lusts of youth. And by these lustes of youth, hee meeneth not disorderrednesse in playing, whorehunting, drunkennesse, or other such looce behauiour: for Timothy was a myrrour and patterne of all holinesse in himselfe, yea and S. Paule was faine to exhort him to the drinking of wine, and yet notwithstanding he speaketh to him of the lusts of youth. And why? For inasmuch as hee was yong of yeares: it was possible for him too bee ouerhastie in diuers things. Nowe if it behoued Timothy (who passed his elders in discretion and grauitie) to receyue this warning, what had the common fort neede to do? Therefore let yong folke looke well too themselues: for if they haue not the honestie to hearken to their elders, and to learne of them, and to followe their counsell: surely if they had all the vertues in the world, that only one vice would staine and defile them all. And there is not a more commo vice, than this presumption. For inasmuche as yong men haue not bene acquainted with the difficulties that are in manie things: therefore they steppe forth boldly: they sticke not at any thing: nothing (as they thinke) is vnpossible vnto them. Youth then doth alwayes carie presumption with it, as an ouercommon and ordinarie inconuenience: and yet is it not therefore to be borne withall. For (as I sayde) if a yong man haue manie vertues besides, and yet do trust in himselfe, yea and dispise his Auncientes, and beare himselfe in hande, that hee is able to leade all others: God will confound him with all his pride, and all the giftes that are in him shall be defaced. And therefore so much the more ought yong folkes, and suche as haue not yet seene much: bridle themselues. Yea and forasmuche as wee see that nowadays the worlde is so farre out of order, that yong folkes haue gathered suche a diuelish pride, as they bee past receyuing any maner of nurture or instruction at all: Such of them as haue a nicke feare of God, ought to fight so muche the more agaynst themselues, to the ende they bee not caryed away after the common fashion.

VVe shall see these yong Roysters take vpon them to bee men, as soone as they bee from vnder the rodde, when notwithstanding they bee not yet worthie to beare the name of children. They be but as yong Cockchickens of three dayes hatching, and yet they will needes be great men. They ought too bee kept yet halfe a score yeares more vnder the rodde: and beholde, they bee (to their owne seeming) fully men. And wherein? In malapertnesse: For they are as shamelesse as a harlotte of the Stewes, and they may not (by their good willes) be vnder any more awe or correction. All the world seeth this. Now seeing that this vice is common, and as it were a contagious disease: those to whom God hath giuen any grace, ought to bethinke themselues well, and to take hede that they bee not intangled with it: For they should be caryed away as other are, if God hilde them not by strong hand. So then let Gods children stande vpon their garde, & assure themselues that if they be modest, it is very much although it haue not so gay a shew. And albeit that they which are desirous to set forth themselues, despise them, because they go not perking vp with their nelbes: let them assure themselues, that they are much more allowed of God, & that he will blisse their honest behauiour & make the to profit more in two yeres, than those ouerhasty fellows shal do in foure. VVe see what hapneth vnto fruit.

If a frute bee too soone ripe, and come soone to his perfect colour: it dooth also fade away incontinently: but the frute that is more latewarde, is of longer continuance. Euen so is it with suche as will put forth themselves before their time. Truly they may beare a goodly shewe, and haue some taste in them: but it shall haue no substantialnesse in it.

Contrarywise, they that are shamefast and honest, and not presumptuous too putre forth themselves hastily: will surely be slowe. But yet in the meane season, our Lorde giueth them a frute of longer continuance. Thus ye see a good poynt to beare away in this sentence. True it is that modestie is a vertue conuenient for all men: but yet oughte yong folkes too marke that whiche is sayde heere: namely that they muste yeelde honoure too their Elders: acknowledging that they for their owne parte, maye haue excessiue passions whiche had neede too bee restrayned by other men: For they are not sufficiently stayde of their owne nature, and againe, they haue not experience too bee so skilfull as were requisite. Furthermore, when a yong man hath behaued himselfe so modestly: hee muste in time conuenient vtter the thing that God hath giuen him, yea euen though it were among olde men. For the order of nature letteth not, but that when olde men discharge not their dutie, yong men maye supplie the roome in that behalfe, yea euen too the shame of those that haue liued long, and mispent the time that God hath giuen them, or rather vtterly lost it. Yee see then that the meane whiche we haue to hold, is that the reuerence which yong folkes beare too their elders, muste not hinder the continuall maintenance of the truth, that God should not be honored and vices suppressed. For it may come to passe, that the elder sort shall bee destitute of Gods spirite, or else lewde persons that shall haue nothing in them but craft and vnfaithfulnesse: or else they shall bee wilfull and brainlesse. Nowe in such caces, ought yong folkes to be hilde so vnder the yoke, that they shoulde by the authoritie of their elders bee turned away from God, and his woorde, and from the thing that is good and holy? No. Then let vs marke, that this modestie importeth not that yong men should become sheepish, to discern and know nothing: but that it is ynough that they presume not of themselves to skirmish and cast their froth before their time. Let them hearken, let them be teacheable, let them bee alwayes willing to kepe silence when any good matter is in debating, and specially let them beware of stepping into other mens places. That beeing done, if they see that the elder sort shewe not good example, specially that they peruert the good by turning it into euill: then (as I sayde) it is meete that Gods spirite shoulde shew it selfe where it is. Like as in our time, they that haue beene misledde in the superstitions of Poperie: the longer they haue liued in the worlde, haue still the lesfer knowledge. Nowe to tarie till God shoulde serue his turne by them, (I meane commonly) it were not needfull. These then are aged men that haue had long experience. But what for that? They haue beene plunged in darkenesse, and there is no knowledge of God in them, nor anye purenesse of Religion. What then coulde suche aged men bring, but onely a greater wilfulnesse? For they haue beene so saped in their errours, and so wholly giuen vnto them, as there is no likelyhood of any meanes to bring them oute of them. Nowe if God list too call yong men too publishe his woorde abroad: It were no reason that the holiest shoulde bee so bridlede, that yong men might not speake, and olde men bee contented too heare them. True it is that like as God calleth some of all sortes: so hath it commonly beene his will, to be serued by the elder sort: neuertheless hee hath declared also, that his truth is not ryed vntoo age. So then wee see nowe what modestie ought too bee in all men generally, and specially in yong men: that is too witte, that they must yeelde themselves quietly, too learne so farre as occasion shall bee giuen them, and not desire too vaunte themselves, nor bee ledde with sonde longing too make a shewe: but receyue the thinges with silence, whiche shall bee alledged by others, and not make so muche of their owne painted sheathe, as not too acknowledge that they haue neede too bee guyded and gouerned by those that are of more experience. This done, wee shall not neede too bee retreyned from iudging, vnder the shadowe of eldershippe, nor too go like filie beastes, and too holde all things that come oute of their mouth to be as the word of God, because they say it must be so. For discretion ought to be matched with zeale, according as I haue declared already, that the spirit of God conteyneth both of them in him.

So then if there bee modestie in men, there must bee also zeale and discretion, and wee muste not onelie not be bridlede by the authoritie of such as haue liued long, but also if the whole worlde were brought agaynste vs, yet oughte not antiquitie too prejudice the thing that is rightfull and necessarie. As howe? I haue tolde you already, that if all the old men in the Pope dome had conspired agaynste the Gospell, and woulde heue other men too stande too their accustomed fashion: it is not ment that their auncientnesse shoulde shette God and his woorde oute of the doores, or that yong men should be letted too mainteyne the truth, although that the olde men sette themselves agaynste them, and woulde haue all other men too holde themselves too their customes, because they haue mainteyned the euill a long time. For those too whome God hath giuen better grace, ought too steppe vp agaynste them. Howebeit, it behoueth vs too passe further: and if any man say vntoo vs, howe nowe? It is aboute a hundred yeares ago since our fathers and forefathers haue lyued after this sort: or it is fife hundred yeares, yea or a thousande yeares ago since these things haue beene obserued, and since men haue hilde them for a lawe and infallible rule: I say if men alledge this antiquitie of time: yea or if a man shoulde alledge from the creation of the worlde: yet muste not Gods truth bee oppressed vnder that shadowe. So then we see nowe, that to bee modest, it behoueth vs not too be blinde Buffardes, but to keepe a meane and measure. And this is it which Eliu meeneth by adding, I sayde age shall speake, and the multitude of yeares shall vtter knowledge. But it is the spirite of God that dwelleth in men, and the inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding. Marke howe the order of nature goeth afore: that is too witte, that wee muste giue eare to our elders: For when men choose gouernours in a Citie, or in a Countrey, if they should take yong light headed and brainlesse fooles, which haue no skill to gouerne their owne persons, the choosing of such too bee their Iudges and leaders, were a peruerting of the order of nature, yea & it were a shame, and it might seeme that men intended to spite God as often as it were so.

Then if men which might choose settled personages and men of great grauitie & ripenesse, would let them sit still in their houses, & in the meane while take phantasticall fellowes, and little Snales of one nightes growth, and set them in the seate of Iustice, when as they knowe not what it meeneth: It were like, as if men shoulde marrie little babes. It woulde please them well too bee married, bycause it woulde be sayde vnto them, you shall eate rost meate and pastycrust, and that woulde like them, verie well. But were it therefore a maryage? Euen so (saye I) is it with those that are sette in the seate of iustice, and haue neyther skill nor witte, but are worse than babes, bycause men had not a consideration too chooze suche as were of more grauitie and experience. Therefore it behoueth the order of nature too be obserued firste of all: whiche is, that when wee haue men of yeares whome God hath indued with grace, 10 then they shoulde bee putte in office too guide others, and the yonger sorte humble themselues vnder them. For it is a shame that yong men shoulde take vpon them the roome of theyr elders, and disdain too receyue instruction at the handes of those that haue liued long. This pryde bindeth not it selfe agaynste mortall men, but is a resisting of god, who hath settied the order of nature, and woulde haue men to obserue it. As muche is too bee sayde of vs preachers, and of the state of bearing abroad, and publishing Gods woorde: for when there 20 is a well tryed man of good experience and knowledge: If men vouchsafe not too bee serued with such a one, but take a yong man at auenture: what a thing is it? Therefore it behoueth vs to haue the same order in estimation. Neuerthelesse there muste no generall rule bee made of it: for oftentimes it may come too passe, that God shall gyue muche more grace too yong men, than too suche as haue lyued double their tyme. And therefore the sayde order which wee haue spoken of, must not hinder the spirite of God, that he shoulde 30 not bee receyued where hee sheweth himselfe, and his giftes be applied too good vse, according as hee distributeth them. And that is the cause why Saint Paule chose Timothy, though there were many elder men at that time. For when hee had seene that excellent man (as Phil. 2. 20. who had the recorde not onely of men, but also of the holy Ghost) hee preferred him before those that were elder. Euen so dealeth Eliu heere: who after hee had hearkened vnto others, sayeth, hee knewe that it is the spirite of God whiche is in men: as if hee shoulde saye, 40 true it is, that wee muste not iudge that olde men doo dote, except wee knowe howe the matter goeth: neyther muste wee sayle too giue them roome and place: but wee must yeelde suche honour too their age, as too say, well, the man that hath seene muche, is able too teach vs. But if wee perceyue that he discharge not his duetie, or that hee hath lost his tyme whiche hee hath lyued in the worlde: then if the spirite of God be in a yong man, it behoueth him too putte foorth hymselfe.

Then let vs marke well, that the obseruing of the order of nature, must not bee alwayes with suche condition, that when God indueth them with anye giftes of grace, they shoulde not serue his Church, or that they shoulde not teache, not onely theyr equalles and companions, but also euen the oldest men of ail. And consequently, the riche men muste not sticke to theyr age, and therevpon bee vnpacient, and reiect all warnings, too saye, howe nowe? I haue lyued a long tyme, and shall a yong laddie teache mee my lesson? No, but let 60 them thinke thus with themselues: I ought too haue profited in suche wise, as I mighte haue bene a leader of others: but I seee nowe, that I haue neede to be ledde my selfe: I am a yong childe in comparison of those that shoulde haue bene taught by mee. And seeing it is so, that God hath disappoynted me of the grace that was requisite in a leader: it behoueth mee too bee a scholler and not a mayster.

Yee see then that olde men ought too yeelde themselues too conformitie, when they see that God hath gyuen larger giftes of grace too those that ought too followe them, and not to go afore them. Nowe haue wee a good doctrine too put in vre, whiche wee gather of the things sette downe heeretofore: whiche is, that Gods spirite reigneth aboute the order of nature. And for the better conceyuing of the thing whiche is conteyned heere: let vs marke that Eliu in saying that it is the spirite of God whiche dwelleth in men, ment too expresse, that when it pleaseth God that one man shall bee of greater vnderstanding than another: it is a speciall gifte whiche hee graunteth as it were for a priuiledge.

True it is, that generally God hath made vs all reasonable Creatures: and that is the thing wherein we differ from the brute beastes. God then hath gyuen some discretion, and vnderstanding to all men without exception: and yet notwithstanding we see that some are slow and dull, and other some quicke witted, some are phantasticall, and other some are of good grauitie. VVhereof commeth that? Let vs vnderstande that God holdeth his giftes in his hande, and dealeth them at his pleasure, too whome hee thinketh good. This is it that Eliphaz ment too expresse in this place, too the ende that men should not thinke themselues to haue it by natural inheritance from their mothers wombe, nor as a thing belonging to them of dutie, nor as gotten by their owne purchase. Beholde, Eliu telleth vs that God hath created vs all: and true it is, that wee haue some reason: howbeit but by measure. Yet notwithstanding if a man haue knowledge and wisedome: it behoueth him too know, that God hath reached oute his hande vnto him peculiarly, and that therefore hee is the more beholden and bounde vnto him. And this is sayde vnto vs, too the intente wee shoulde not bee exalted with pride, nor thinke oure selues too bee the more worth, bycause wee haue knowledge and vnderstanding: But that wee shoulde consider, that forasmuch as it hath pleased God too giue vs that grace, it behoueth vs too walke in so much the greater feare: For we be so much the more in his dette: and therewithall his giuing of his benefites, is to the ende wee shoulde communicate them with our neighbours. Therefore if we cannot vse them too the glorifying of our God, and to the edifying of suche as haue neede of them: it is certaine, that wee are so muche the more blameworthy. This is it that we haue to marke here for one poynnt.

And further, it behoueth vs also too make comparison here betwene two degrees: that is to wit, that if it be God that giueth speciall vnderstanding vnto men, to discern the things that pertain to this transitorie life: what is too be sayde of the doctrine of the Gospell, and of the true and pure Religion? Haue wee those of nature? Can wee purchase those by oure owne trauaile? Alas, wee muste needes come faire too short. If it fall oute that a man be a good schoolemayster to teach children, or a good Aduocate or Phisition, or a good Marchant, of a Citie, or a good Labourer in the Countrey. It is continually the spirite of God that woorketh in all these things. A man shall haue neede too bee sharpe witted, in some one thing more than in some other: like as there is required a greater skill in some handycraftes, than in marchandize.

Nowe then, euen in all these things whiche seeme too bee common and of no value in themselues, God muste bee fayne too distribute his spirite vnto men. But if wee come too the doctrine of the Gospell: there

Like as it was declared yesterday, that no man ought to put forth himself too hastily, but that wee should rather seeke to learne than to teache others, except necessitie constrained vs: So now it is shewed vs here, that wee must not thrust ourselues into any vnknowne matter, before we knowe well howe the case standeth. And truly wee see that such as will bee disputing of matters that are not well knowne too them: do runne astray and speake vntowardly, and therein wee perceyue our owne want. Therefore we haue to marke what is shewed vs heere by the example of Eliu: namely that wee must not cast foorth any wordes at auenture, nor be ouerhastie in giuing sentence of things that are hidden from vs, and whereof wee are not duly informed. True it is that this lesson pertheyneeth chiefly too suche as are set in the seate of iustice: for they ought to examine matters throughly, before they iudge of them: neuerthelesse, euerie man ought to obserue the same rule in his owne behalfe. And that is the fyrste whiche wee haue too marke heere, according too that which was declared yesterday. And alwayes wee see that which was said: namely that when Gods spirit gouerneth a man, then like as he giueth him zeale, & moueth him to religion, so also he giueth him skill & discretion, so as the one goeth neuer without the other: and if a man haue an vnruely zeale, it cannot be counted for any vertue: but if Gods spirite raigne in him, he shall perceyue that those things are inseparable. And so much the more ought we to pray God, that if hee giue vs the grace to mainteyne his truth, he will also shewe vs when it is time to speake, and when to holde our peace, and that hee will giue vs vnderstanding and reason, that wee runne not at rouers through vnauidednesse. For it is too slender an excuse, too say I thought I had done well, I tooke the matter to be so. True it is that there is no man but hee is sometymes ouerseene: and therefore so muche the more ought we to take heede too our selues, and (considering the weaknesse of our owne witte) to seeke too be governed by Gods hande, so as in hauing a good zeale, we may also haue reason to weelde and rule it well. Now let vs come too that which Eliu sayeth. Hee declareth that his discourse shall not bee such as the other mennes were. Say not (sayeth hee) wee haue founde wisdom: for God hath ouerthrowne Iob and not men. Here Eliu betokeneth that he will take another way in disputing agaynst Iob, than the other men had done. For what way hild they? Thou art afflicted by the hande of God (saye they) and not without cause: and therefore it muste be concluded, that thou art a wicked man. Thine affliction is so great and vnmeasurable, as there was neuer yet any man in the worlde seene to bee so sore pressed as thou: and therefore it followeth, that thou passest all men in wickednesse.

Lo what the foundation was which Iobs freends toke in going about to reprove him. But Eliu protesteth, that hee will not take that way. And surely it is apparant, that if hee had gone forwarde after that sort, it had still made the matter worse and worse. For I haue tolde you, that Iob was able too mainteyne his soundnesse, in that hee had walked in the feare of God, and not offended, in any thing, sauing in that hee coulde not settle his minde wholly to the obeying of God, but thought his afflictions strange, howbeit in that respect of the principall poynt, his case was good and iust. Surely some men vnderstand this text, as though Eliu shoulde say, thinke not that ye shall become wyse by holding your peace, and that God will confounde him well ynough though mortall men meddle not with him. But if a man looke neerely too the matter, hee shall finde the naturall sense too be that whiche I haue spoken: namely that Eliu taunteth Iobs freendes. For hee vpbraideth them exprefly, that they thought themselues to haue founde wisdom, like as we commonly say in the Prouerbe, that a man thinketh hee hath founde the Beane in the Cake, when there is some subtile meaning in a thing, and hee windeth himselfe into some companie to put foorth his opinion and deuce, bearing himself in hand, that he hath an inuincible reason although it be but sonde and tryfing. So speaketh Eliu heere. It seemeth to you (sayth he) that the knot of the matter is, that forasmuch as God hath pressed Iob after that sort, and punished him so roughly: therefore hee is his enimie: you take that too be so good and strong a foundation as can be: but it is nothing woorth, according as I haue declared alreadie, that although God doo visite a man, it dooth not therefore followe that hee is wicked. For albeet that God doo threaten the transgressours of his law, to punish them both in their owne persons, and in their goodes, and in their children: yet was not Iob persecuted in that respect, but for another cause. Although God threaten the transgressours: it is not ment that hee reseruet not libertie too himselfe, to exercise the pacience of the faythfull when he listeth, or that hee may not shew himselfe rough towards them, although hee haue not a respecte vnroo their offences whiche they haue committed. VVherefore then? to humble them. If there were no other reason but that: It ought well to suffice. Besides this, God will haue hys seruants an example vnroo others. And moreover it is needfull to mortifie their fleshy affections. For oftentimes we haue secrete vices vs, the which God remedie before hand. And sometymes when he sendeth vs afflictions, wee knowe not the cause, but hee seeth farre cleerer than wee. So then wee must fully conclude, that God scourgeth the good, and suche as haue not prouoked his wrath, and that he ceaseth not to shewe himselfe rough towards them and to execute great rigour vpon them, insomuch as it shall seeme that he is minded to ouerwhelme the vtterly. And is it therefore to be said that men should count them wicked? No: then is it a sonde argument: and although Iobs freends ground themselues vpon it, and thought to haue found wisdom in that behalf: yet notwithstanding I say it is but a childishe thing. VVherefore concerning this text, let vs beare that thing in minde which I haue touched heretof ore, which is, to behaue our selues discretely when God afflicteth men, and not to iudge of them at auenture, that he whiche is beaten with gods rods is forthwith to be condemned, & that his sinnes are to be measured by his afflictions. For it were a rashe and vnwyse proceeding too make a generall rule of it. Howé then? Let vs vnderstande, that God hath diuers reasons too afflict men. True it is that it is his ordinarie iustice to punish the sinnes: Neuerthelesse, sometymes it is his will too trie the obedience of good men, and of suche as haue serued him and applyed their whole indeuer too followe his commaundements: yea and those shall be handled with greater rigour, than the wicked. And why? For God intendeth to teach them what it is too be humble and obedient. Seeing the case standeth so, it behoueth vs too refrayne from hasty iudgement when any man is afflicted. For God wyll also preferue his seruants from the temptations that he sendeth them.

True it is that if they haue by any meanes prouoked him too displeasure, hee remedyeth that euill by afflicting flitting them. Nowe shall wee therevpon iudge, that such as are handled roughliest, are the wickedest. VVhat a thing were that? See yee not that wee shoulde pro-ceede cleane backwarde from God, and quite contrary to his intent and purpose? Furthermore let vs applie this, as well to our neighbours, as to our selues. If wee see men that are afflicted with many miseries: let vs first looke vnto their lyfe, and not bee hastie too giue sentence vpon them, but consider howe they haue liued.

 If a despiser of God, an vnruely person, a man giuen to outrageous vyces, bee greuously punished: let vs acknowledge, that therein God sheweth vs as it were in a picture, what his vengeance is. And there wee haue a iust occasion too iudge. VVhy so? For the thing it selfe speaketh. VVhen a man hath despysed God and spent his whole lyfe disorderly, and wee see that God scourgeth him. In that behalfe there is no doubting, the matter it selfe is not darke nor difficult. So then our iudgement shall not bee ouerhastie, if wee proceede after that sort. But contrarywise, if we haue sought for the reason why God afflicteth men, and see none: (as if some man had walked vprightly :) in that case we must brydle our selues. And why? For we knowe not Gods purpose, vntill hee shewe it vnto vs. Lo howe wee ought to iudge in respect of others. And heere wythall when we see the wicked punished as they haue deserved, let vs not onely condemne them, but also applie the same too our owne vse, according as Sainet Paule sheweth it: whiche is, that wee shoulde walke in the feare of God, and take warning by other mennes harmes. Be-holde, God punisheth VVhoremonges, Theeues, and Rebelles: and that is too the ende that we should learne to walke in his obedience, and not prouoke his wrath, as those did whome wee see so roughly handled. This then is the thing which wee haue too doo, when God maketh vs to beholde his vengeance, in such as haue bene vterly rebellious agaynst him. But if wee see the good men visited: it behoueth vs to thinke: Alas, if the grene tree be cast into the fire, what shall become of the drie?
 VVhen wee compare oure selues with suche as are in a maner halfe out of this worlde alreadie, wee shall see verie great vertues in them, and yet notwithstanding they are handled muche more greuously than wee.
 Therefore wee must needs say, that God beareth wyth vs. For if hee pytied vs not, what shoulde become of vs? And when wee bee wakened by that meane, let vs assure our selues, it is not too the ende wee shoulde take the more libertie to do euill: but too restrayne vs, and as it were to tie vs vpr too the intent wee shoulde submit our selues wholly vnto our God. VVhen we haue so considered the scourges and afflictions that God sendeth vpon our neighbours: let vs on oure side (when our turne commeth about too bee punished at Gods hande, yea euen for oure sinnes) acknowledge that there needeth no other witnesse than oure owne conscience, which also is a sufficient Iudge to condemne vs. But if afterward God be at any time rough to vs, and we see no reason why: yet let not our heartes fayle vs, neither let vs vex our selues in disputing with God though he do not as we would haue him: but rather let vs learne to comfort our selues. And although God seeme to be our mortall enimie, and to thunder agaynst vs: yet notwithstanding let vs trust in him, as we haue seene Iob speake hereto-

Thus yee see howe we ought to be discrete in iudging fore.

of the chastizements that God sendeth vs, and also that we ought to be verie milde towards our neighbors. This is the thing that we haue to beare away in this sentēce of Eliu, when hee sayth, that it is a follie for men to gaze so much at the present afflictions, as to say, that bicause gods hand in rough, hard, and sharpe vpon a creature, therefore he vterly ouerthroweth him. I say wee must not followe that for a generall rule. And why? For we shoulde bee beguiled at all assayes, as I haue shewed alreadie. Now heerevpon Eliu vpbraideth Iobs freendes, that they were confounded. I prayed (sayth hee) and they spake no more, but gave ouer their talke. Heereby he betokeneth, that they were confounded, bycause they were euill grounded: For wee knowe that the truth is alwayes in-uincible. True it is that hee whiche hath a good cace, shall not alwayes be heard: For we see that a good cace may be oppressed by brainlesse and frantike folke when they haue their full scope. For they stoppe the mou-thes of suche as haue iust cause too speake. But when things go orderly, if a man haue a good cace, God gyueth him wherewith too maintaine it: For truth (as I sayde) shall haue the vpper hande. So then it is not for naught, that Eliu taunteth Iobs freendes, who were confounded in the middest of their way. VVherefore let vs assure oure selues, that when wee knowe throughly that a thing is true, God will also giue vs arguments and reasons to maintaine it, too the ende wee be not vanquished by suche as labour too beate downe the truth, and to turne it into a lye. God I say will so strengthen vs, as wee shall neuer bee destitute of reason. And this is a doctrine well woorthie too be marked. For what is the cause that oftentimes wee dare not vndertake a good quarell, but for that we haue not the stoutnesse and skill too resist so stedfastly as were requisite? Nowe to the ende that suche fearefulnesse shoulde not hinder vs from being zealous in maynteyning the truth as wee ought too doo: let vs marke that God forsaketh not those that haue courage to mainteine good caces, but giueth them victorie in the ende. Yea, and although they be oppressed by subtiltie and wilynesse (as it may so come to passe as I haue sayde:) yet notwithstanding they shall neuer bee confounded howe soeuer the worlde go. Then let vs trust too this promise, and referre oure selues vnto GOD, and wee shall finde that this is not sayde in vaine.

True it is, that aboue all things, it behoueth vs too discern whether the cace that wee mainteyne, bee good or no. For God punisheth the lightnesse of suche as take matters in hande before they knowe why or howe.
 Hee leaueth them as soone as they haue opened theyr mouth, and they become laughingstockes vnto all men.
 Beholde the iuste rewarde of suche as are ouerhastie in putting foorth themselues. But when wee bee sure of the goodnesse of a cace, let vs rest vpon that whiche is sayd vnto vs heere: that is too witte, that God will so strengthen vs, as we shall not bee overcome. And furthermore, when wee see sometymes that suche as ought too mainteyne a good cace, play the gossings, and stande as if they were dead and abalhed: let vs marke that God punisheth suche fayntheartednesse, and gyueth them not suche courage as they ought too haue, bicause they called not on him, nor hung vpon him, forso much as they thought not the holie Ghost to be able ynough too giue them strength.

So then this vnbeleefe sheweth it selfe now adayes, in that if there be a good cace, it shall be thrust vnder foot.
 Yee see that the wicked haue courage ynouge and too much, to set forth theyr lyes, and to withstand the com-ming forth of the truth. And why? For the wicked faile not too applie too strayne themselues to the vtermost too ouerthrowe all things, and too bring matters to confusion:

there is a wisdom that surmounteth all mans vnderstanding: yea and is woonderfull euen too the verie Angelles. They see the verie secretes of heauen which are conteyned in the Gospell. For it concerneth the knowing of God in the person of his sonne. And although oure Lorde Iesus Christ came downe heere beneath: yet must wee comprehend his godly Maiestie, or else we cannot grounde and fettle oure fayth in him. I say it concerneth the knowledge of things that are incomprehensible to mans nature.

Nowe if God muste bee fayne too deale his spirite in respect of the handicraftes and worldely trades that concerne this transitorie lyfe: muche more ought wee too thinke, that oure owne sharpe witte is not able too knowe the things that concerne God and the secretes of his kingdome, and that it behoueth vs to bee taught by him, and in the meane season too become fooles in respect of oure selues, as Sainct Paule sayeth, that wee maye bee partakers of that wisdom. For this is the sentence that is giuen thereof: namely that the naturall man dooth neuer comprehend the doctrine of God: that is too say, as long as men abide in their owne naturall kinde, they neyther knowe what God is, nor can at any time taste of his woorde, but (whiche worse is) it is follie to them as Sainct Paule sayeth: For too their seeming it is an vnreasonable doctrine: and therefore it is the onely spirite of God that giueth vs fayth and inlight-

1. Cor. 3. d. 17

1. Co. 2. d. 14

ness vs. And this ought to be well marked. For when wee see there are so fewe that knowe God, yea and that many men whiche are well striken in yeares, and haue liued long time in the worlde, are starke madde in their Superstitions, and fight feercely agaynste the doctrine of the Gospell: oftentimes it dazeleth oure eyes, and wee are amazed at it. Yea, but heere is a text whiche ought too arme vs agaynste suche stumbling-blockes. It is the spirite of God whiche dwelleth in men: it is the inspiration of the Almighty that giueth vnderstanding. Do wee see wretched men blinded, and so plunged in ignorance, as they cannot come too the gospell? Let vs not maruell at it. And why? For it is mannes naturall kinde, not too discern anie whitte of Gods secretes, vntill wee bee inlightned. But contrarywise when wee see a man that knoweth God (whether he bee yong or olde) or if wee see an olde man that hath bene saped a long while in the dotages of Papistrice, come to right Religion, let vs assure oure selues that God hath wrought a miracle in that case. Also if wee see yong folkes come too it, let vs assure oure selues that God draweth them too him after a marueylous fashion. For they doo not easily receyue the yoke, bycause they bee

1. Cor. 1. c. 18

full of presumption as I sayd afore. Then if God tame them, and make them teachable, it is his mightie hande that hath brought them vntoo it. And so wee see, that this texte ought too serue vs in twoo things. The firste is, that seeing that by oure witte wee can neuer reache so highe as too knowe God or his truth: we ought too putte oure owne reason from vs, and too renounce it vtterly. And that is the thing whiche Sainct Paule tearmeth too bee made a foole.

1. Co. 2. d. 14

Then if wee will haue our Lorde too fill vs with his wisdom: it behoueth vs too become fooles: that is too say, wee muste not bring anie thing of oure owne, nor weene oure selues too haue one thing or other: For that were a shetting of the doore agaynste God. VVherefore if wee will haue God too continue the grace of his holie spirite, when hee shall haue gyuen vs anie portion of it: wee muste learne too exalt and magnifie him as hee deserueth, and too acknowledge that there is not one droppe of good vnderstanding in vs, till God haue putte it intoo vs. And agayne, the same muste cause vs too persitt alwayes in hys obedience, and too walke in greater feare and carefulnesse: seeing that if God shoulde quenche the light that hee hath putte intoo vs, wee shoulde bee in darkenesse, yea and in so horryble darkenesse, as wee could neuer gette oute of it. This is the firste vse of this place.

10 The seconde is, that although we see the greater part of the worlde goe astraye, and scarcely anie man willing too submitte himselfe vntoo God: wee muste not thinke it straunge that menne shoulde bee so farre oute of order, as too playe the wilde beastes. And why? For it is the spirite of God that giueth vnderstanding. VVherefore let the same bee as a grounde for vs, too magnifie Gods grace the more, whiche wee shall haue receyued: and therewithall let vs not bee caryed awaye, though we see suche rebelliousnesse. And why? 20 For men doo but followe theyr owne kinde, they follow theyr owne heade, and in the meane while resist God: and that is bycause the doctrine of the Gospell surmounteth all mannes reason: and God muste bee fayne too woork by his holy spirite in opening theyr eyes, or else they shall abyde continually in their beastlynesse.

Finally, Eliu concludeth therevpon, that great men are not alwayes wise, and that sometymes aged men haue no vnderstanding, skill, nor discretion, more than other men. Truely Eliu meeneth nor heere, too peruert the order of nature. For hee hath protested heeretofore, that hee woulde hearken too the aged, and was willing too submitte himselfe too theyr doctrine. But he meeneth that whiche I haue touched alreadie: namely that God is not bounde too age, nor too the states and qualities of men.

VVhen it pleaseth God too aduance a man too dignitie, if hee will haue him too serue for the welfare of hys people, he indueth hym with grace too bee able to discharge his office: Otherwise hee leaueth hym destitute, and the higher that a man is in degree, the more shall hee bee knowne too bee a double beast. As for example, If there bee a man chosen too preache Gods woorde, and God bee mynded too shewe fauour too his Church: hee will indue the sayde man with hys spirite, hee wyll giue him vnderstanding of his worde, and hee will graunte him cunning and skill too applie it too the vse of the people, and too gather good doctrine of it: and finally, hee will giue him zealousnesse and all other things that are requisite: and hee will shew himselfe so manifestly in that behalfe, as wee maye saye, that hee hath a care of vs, for that hee distributeth his graces after that sorte vntoo men, in the things that are requisite for oure welfare. As muche is too say of them that sitte in the seate of iustice: according as they haue neede that the spirite of God shoulde bee doubled in them, so also when God intendeth to be serued by them, hee giueth them a mightie power too discharge their dutie.

60 Contrarywise, if God bee angrie with vs: then they whiche shall haue the preaching of his woorde, shall be beastes withoute vnderstanding, and men shall dispise them for disguysing thinges, so as the good doctrine shall bee defaced, and defyled by them, and (too bee shorte) scarcely shall they bee good schoollers, and therefore muche lesse good Maysters. Yee see then what Eliu ment too shewe in saying, that the great men shall not alwayes be wyse, nor the aged men alwayes be

man of best vnderstanding. As if he should say, we must not make a generall rule to saye this man is aduanced to his estate and authoritie, and therefore he must needs bee a man of knowledge: wee muste not gather any such consequent of it. And why? For God can well forsake the greates, so as they shall become grosse beastes, and the longer they shall haue liued, they shall but haue mispent the more breade in beeing fedde at Gods cost, insomuche that it had bene better (as you would say) that an Oxe had bene fedde with it. For 10 it had bene better bestowed.

So then let vs learne, that forasmuche as God distributeth his spirite too those whome hee intendeth to applye to his seruice: they ought so muche the better too employ themselues carefully and in the feare of God. And if they doo otherwyse, it will appeare that those whiche were taken too bee wysest, shall bee vtterly blinded, so as they shall not knowe God, according as God threatneth by his Prophete Esay, saying, that the aged shall not see any whitte, and that the wise shall become brutishe and vtterly dull. VVee see then howe God declareth a much more horrible vengeance agaynst the great men, olde men, and gouernours, than agaynst the common people. Hereby wee bee warned, that wee muste not attribute an infallible authoritie too them, as though they coulde neuer erre nor misgouerne others. Nowe if God doo blinde the olde men, great men, and suche as are in authoritie after that sort: what shall become of them (I pray you) if God giue them not his holy spirite? And let vs marke well the cause why God 30 maketh that threatning. It is for mennes hypocrisie, bycause they serued him but for countenance sake, and their heart was farre from him, so as they protested too serue him wyth theyr mouth, and in the meanwhile gaue themselues too the traditions of men: that is too say, God reigned not alone ouer them by his woorde, but men had theyr owne scope. But God cannot abyde that his authoritie should bee so diminished. And that is the cause why he sayeth, I will blinde the wyse, and take away vnderstanding and reason from the aged. 40 VVherefore if wee desire too haue God too gouerne vs, and too reigne among vs, and to inioy the gracious giftes that are necessarie for our saluation: let vs learne that it behoueth vs too yeelde him the dominion and foueraintie ouer vs, and all of vs both great and small, must frame oure selues too his obedience.

Furthermore, let vs take his worde for our rule, and suffer our selues too be gouerned by it: assuring our selues that otherwise we must not loke that the holy ghost shall worke in vs. And therefore let vs seeke all the meanes that can be to be taught. God would that there should be shepheards in his Church to preach his word, and that wee should receyue correction and warning at their handes. Is not this done so thoroughly as it ought to bee? Let vs pray God to supplie that default. VVherefore let vs walke in such humilitie, asoure whole desire may be, that god should haue al preheminence ouer vs, assuring our selues that we can haue no further reason nor vnderstanding, than we bee inlightned by his holy spirit. That is the meane whereby hee will neuer suffer vs to be thrust out of the way, but when he hath once begun too guide vs and teach vs, hee will make vs growe stronger and stronger in all wisdome, according as Sainct Paule 1. Cor. I. sayeth, that seeing that God hath once begon in vs, hee will not suffer vs to want any thing, vntill the latter day, at which time we shall haue full knowledge of the things which we know as now but in part.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good god, with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make vs so too perceyue them, as wee may bee vtterly beaten downe in them, and specially that knowing what a number of wantes and miseries be in vs, we may pray him too reforme vs and cleanse vs from all our spots, and make vs so pure by his holy spirite, as hee may alwayes acknowledge and auowe vs too bee his children: and that wee also on our side may serue and honour him as our father, and shewe such brotherly loue one towards another, as he commaundeth, so as we may seeke nothing but to exalt his holy name among vs, and euery of vs in his degree too yeelde him his due honour. That it maye please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also too all people and nations, &c.

The Cxxj. Sermon, which is the thirde vpon the xxxij. Chapter.

11. Behoide I haue vwayted for your vvordes, giuing eare vvile you prepared your selues and sought out your reasons.
12. Then I considered you, but there vvas none of you that disproued Iob, or that answered his vvordes:
13. But to the ende you may not say, vvechae founde vvisedome: God hath cast him, and not man.
14. He hath not directed his vvordes vnto me: neyther vvill I answer him according to your vvordes.
15. They vvere afrayde and answered not, but left speaking.
16. And I taryed, but they spake not: they stode still and answered no more.
17. I also vvill answer in my turne, and shewe mine aduice.
18. For I am full of matter, and the spirite of my belly constreyneth mee.
19. Behoide my bellie is as the vvine that hath no vent, and as the nevv Barrelles that burst.
20. Therefore I vvill speake and haue a vent, I vvill open my lippes and answer.
21. I vvill not novve accept the person of man, neyther vvill I giue titles to man.
22. For if I should flatter, I cannot tell vvwhether my maker vvoulde destroye mee incontiently.

Like

fusion: and in the meane while no man setteth hymselfe agaynste them, at leastwise with suche courage as were requisite. And why? For suche as are willing too doo well, and haue some affection, are notwithstanding faynt of beleefe. But surely if they trusted in God, he would not suffer all things to be confounded as they be. Thus yee see what we haue to consider when Eliu taunteth Iobs friends for being confounded. It is as much as if hee should saye, that thereby it was apparant, that they had an euill cace, and that they had made a wrong match agaynst Iob. And hee addeth, that hee also wyll speake in his turne. This woorde Also ought to bee well weyed. For thereby Eliu betokeneth, that hee putteth foorth his aduyce in due time. Why? I haue tolde you alreadie, that bycause he was a yong man, he ought too haue yeilded reuerence to the aged: For otherwise it had bene a peruerting of the order of nature. Therefore it behoued this modestie to go before, and that Eliu should suffer his elders to speake, and he to heare them. That done, forasmuch as God giueth him the grace to discern the cace better than they had done, hee also speaketh in his turne. We see then that hee runneth not a heade, that is to say, he thrusteth not himselfe intoo the matter at aduenture: but holdeth his peace till conuenient time serueth, and then speaketh. And this is a poynt which we ought to mark verie wel. For we know that in Gods Church all things ought to be handled orderly and comely, as Saint Paule sayth. Therefore there are twoo things requisite in the manner of teaching: First, that order be obserued, and secondly, that the order be matched with honestie, so as the things may be comely and conuenient. Seeing it is so, let vs beare in minde the example of Eliu, and let vs holde vs to the doctrine that Saint Paule gyuerth vs in the sayde Texte: whiche is, that there bee no disorder amongst vs, according also as Saint Paule sayeth in another streyne of the texte by mee alledged, that although God haue raysted vp many Prophetes in his Church, and that there be many which haue skill to speake, yea and also wherewith to teache: yet notwithstanding it is not for them all too vtter forth what is giuen them. For it behoueth that there be order and measure, and also there is a certaine honest comeliness too bee kept. That therefore is the thing whiche is shewed vs heere in the example of Eliu, when hee sayeth that hee will speake, yea, but that is when he seeth that things are misordered, and that Iobs freendes had disguised the truth, and that they had mainteyned an euill and false principle. For although they vsed faire and apparant reasons to colour the matter withall: yet notwithstanding the foundation wherevpon they builded, was not good. And Iob also on his side, although his cace were iust, yet notwithstanding did handle it amisse, and vsed many wandring wordes. Therefore after that Eliu had harkned quietly, now when he seeth that God giueth him an entraunce and access: hee vseth it. And besides this, hee is also constreyned to doo so, according as he sheweth when hee addeth that his heart is greued, and that hee is like a caske full of newe wine. If a man put newe wine intoo a Caske and close it vp, and giue it no vent: the caske bursteth when the wine boyled. Euen so sayth Eliu that his minde is shet vp as if a caske were full of newe wine, and could hold no longer, but must needs burst out.

Hereby hee meeneth that necessitie constreyned him to put forth his opinion, to the ende that the cace which had bene euill debated, might nowe be ordered by reason. And bicause Eliu speaketh here with great vehemencie: some perceyuing not the cause, haue thought him to be a man of a loftie minde, and full of boisting. But first of al we see, that God condemneth him not. VVheras he condemneth Iob and his freendes, and sheweth that all of them had done amisse one way or other: yet notwithstanding Eliu is iustified. Now seeing that God condemneth him not: what mortall man shall take vpon him the authoritie to iudge aboute God? Therefore that is a great follie. Moreouer, this must not be thought so strange a thing. For we must beare in minde, how it hath bene declared heretofore, that Eliu was not as one of the Prophetes that were in Gods Church. After that God had published his lawe by the hande of Moyse, he promised also, that the people of Israell should neuer bee destitute of Prophetes. For it is written in Deutr. thou shalt not go too Sorcerers, nor Soothfayers: thou shalt not seeke for such reuelations as the Heathen do: Thou shalt not run after witchcrafts, and other vaine sciences: neither shalt thou aske counsell at the deade. For thy God shall alwayes rayse thee vp a Prophet in the middes of thee: as if he should say, the heathen men seeke and search many wayes too bee taught. And why? For they knowe not where they be: they haue no Prophete, nor any certaine doctrine to lead and guide them. But it is not so with you (sayd God to the children of Israell:) I will alwayes giue you some Prophete, so as I will dwell familiarly among you, and my truthe shall bee knowne vnto you. Thus then there were Prophetes in the Church of God according to his promise: and that was continually a common thing. But Eliu dwelled among such folke as had not the lawe and promises of God, neither did our Lorde make anie couenaut with those people. For either they were before the lawe, or else they were among Idolaters, according as I haue tolde you, that Thare and Nachor (who were the greate Grandfathers and aunceters of Eliu) were Idolaters.

Seeing then that Eliu was instructed by God with skill to speake as we haue seene, the same was an extraordinarie matter. And therefore we must not think it strange, that there is a great operation in him, and that god sheweth heere an vnaccustomed power, and that Eliu also feelerth himselfe as it were cheuiged. For to the intent that Prophecyes should haue the more authoritie, we see that God hath at tymes sette some apparant markes in them. Like as when God called Saule too the kingdom, hee so changed and reued him, as hee seemed too bee quite and cleane another man than he had bene afore. And the text it selfe sayth, is Saule also among the Prophetes? Then if God so reued those Prophetes too the quicke whiche were called too that state according too his promise, and that the same was a custome order: I saye, if hee changed them in suche wise, as it appeared that they were as men rauished: muche more reason is it, that when hee wrought in a heathen man whiche was out of his Church, there muste needs bee some notable marke in that behalfe, so as the worlde might knowe that Gods hande was vpon him. Howebeit, forasmuche as the Diuill is alwayes an Ape of God and a counterfeyter of his woorkes: the like befell too the false Prophetes also of the Infidelles, whiche brought them reuelations in the name of their Idols. For they also were rauished. VVhen a man came to inquire of any secret thing at the Idols which had the same renoume of foretelling things too come: they had there their Prophetes eyther men or women, whiche were as it were halfe deade, when they should answer such as came to inquire of them. They drew out their wordes like those that were fallen into the falling sickness: they foamed at the mouth, & their cies turned in their heades.

heades. And this was done purposely, bycause the diuill would bleare the eyes of ignorant wretches, and sette them after such a fashion, as they should be moued too reuerence, whether they would or no. As how? Needes must this be through a heavenly power (did folks say) seeing that men and women are so changed. But (as I said) all this was done by Satans pollicie, who through a certaine slight did counterfeit Gods workes, and so disguise him self after that sort, to the ende that men should not discern, but rather thinke that the things which came from hell, proceeded from heauen. Neuerthelesse we see well, that the cause why we ought not to thinke it strange that Eliu had such a vehement pang in his minde: was for that God had ordeined him of purpose, to vndertake the encounter agaynst Iob and his freends. Yea and it was requisite that God shoulde worke after a newe fashion in this man. And why? For youth of it selfe shall not be heard among men, bicause that olde men make greate account of their age, and think themselues to be of great abilitie and wisdom: and that maketh them so much the more arrogant. For by meanes thereof, they are so forepossessed with a foolish opinion, as they cannot finde in their heartes too bee taught, but with great hardnesse, and as it were by force. Therefore it behoued God too touch Eliu to the quicke, and to make a great alteration of minde in him, to the end that his doctrine might haue some entrance, and be receyued among his elders. To be short, God ment too authorize Eliu when he gaue him such a vehemencie of minde. But there is also the reason which I haue touched, namely, that he sawe the truth oppressed, in somuch as Iob had mainteyned his quarell amisse although it was good, & the other men had disguised things & made an euill foundation, abusing the talke which concerned God, by alledging good and holy reasons for the prooue of a wrong principle which they had taken. Therefore at the sight of this, he was moued with a zeale that he conceyued in himself, and his heart did as it were boyle within him, and it woulde haue made him to burst if he had not discharged himselfe of it. This ought to serue vs to double vse. For first of all sith we see that God hath printed suche a marke in the doctrine of Eliu, and that the heavenly spirite is apparant in his mouth: So much the more ought we to bee moued too receyue his sayings. For too what purpose hath God marked it so, but too the ende it shoulde haue the more reuerence among vs? So then, forasmuch as God hath put his Seale to the things which Eliu shall discourse hereafter, and woulde that his doctrine should thereby be made the more certeyne vntoo vs: let vs not receyue it as the doctrine of a mortall man, but let vs learne hereby too submitte oure selues vnto it, and let vs be sure that our sayth shall not be grounded vpon the doctrine of a creature, but that it is God which speaketh by the mouth of a man, and vseth him as an instrument. Lo what we haue to marke. Howbeit it behoueth vs too passe further: namely that if the marke which was dimme in Eliu ought to serue to make vs receyue his doctrine with fuller obedience: what is to be sayd of the great and notable proofes, which God hath giuen vs by his lawe, and by all his Prophecies? True it is that Eliu bringeth the pure worde of God, and that it behoueth vs to take the things that procede out of his mouth, as things that come of the holy ghost. And why? Bicause God hath stirred him vp to such a vehemencie. But if wee consider how God hath magnified and approued his lawe, and the doctrine of the Prophets: we shall see, a fashion that is much more mightie. For when the law was published,

the ayre rored, the skies were shaken with thunder and lightning, the trumpets sounded in the cloudes, the earth quaked, the Mountaynes remoued as sheep at the voice of God, and (to be short) there was no Element which gaue not recorde of that doctrine, in shewing that it was altogether heavenly. Also there followed miracles when the Prophet spake, and the heavenly power appeared alwayes with so great proof, as ought to put out our eyes, if we do not see it. And therefore seeing we knowe it was gods wil that that one only mark which he gaue vnto Eliu, should cause the doctrine of Eliu to bee receyued as of sufficient authoritie: let vs vnderstand, that when the law & Prophets come in question, we ought to haue reason to be more moued & stirred vp, according as the thing which is spoken of Eliu, is but an appurtenance of the other. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place. And in the second it behoueth vs also to marke, that like as Eliu was moued with zeale, when hee sawe men disguise Gods truth and falsifie his woorde: So must wee also haue the like minde at the least. Then if false Prophetes ryse vp too deface the good doctrine, if wicked men disguise theyr blasphemyes to perswade the worlde too despise God, and his woorde, if an euill cace bee mainteyned, or if men go aboute too ouerthrowe right: let vs not bee dumbe nor carelesse: but let vs haue the same vehemencie in vs whiche hee shewed vs heere. For if wee haue not this godly zeale towards Gods truth, wee shewe oure selues too bee none of his children.

And therefore let vs marke well the example which is set fourth heere in the persone of Eliu, yea and let vs make comparison betweene oure selues and him. For if a man that was not brought vp in Gods schole, but was intangled among the Infidelles, was moued with suche zeale when God touched him, that hee irned, as if hee shoulde haue burst, till hee had discharged hys conscience: I pray you what shoulde wee do when God teacheth vs so familiarly in his worde? Can we bee excused when wee yeelde not recorde vntoo him before men, at suche time as we see goodnesse defaced, yea and vtterly razed out: and yet set not our selues against them that do it?

Then seeing that our Lorde calleth vs therevnto, and layeth such a charge vpon vs: If we be dumbe, and make no account of mainteyning the good, but rather do help the wicked by our silence: are we not traytors to God and his truth? Yes doubtlesse are we. So then it behoueth vs to be moued the more, sith we see that a man which had not beene instructed in the lawe of God, nor was of the body of his Church, had notwithstanding such an earnest will to mainteyne the truth, and was in a maner inforced to it. True it is that this inforcement is willing. For when God intendeth too bee serued by men, hee caryeth them not away too make them go too it by constreynr. I meane his Prophetes and true seruantes: for hee will serue his owne turne by the wicked, whether they will or no: but I speake heere, of those too whome he giueth his spirite of Prophecie: whome hee maketh not to serue him without giuing them a good will to do it. Hee coulde well speake by the mouth of Balaam, and yet notwithstanding we see that Balaam was still a deceyuer, and the holy Ghost setteth him forth too his reproch and slander. But as for Eliu, God stirred him vp as his Prophete, so as hee serued him with a good will, that is too say, hee ouercame all lettes that myghte turne him away from maintayning of the truth. So then, nowe adayes also when wee see the truth oppressed, so as some men mocke at vs, and other some go aboute too byte vs, yea and too eate vs vp, bycause wee

mainteine the truth : let vs fight against such tēptations, for that is the inforcement whiche ought to sette vs forward. Sometyes we will be ashamed to mainteyne a good quarell, bycause wee see that men do but make a mocke at it, and that the scoffers which scorne God, will also be so malapert as to bleare out their tongues at vs, and to laugh all our allegations to scorne. But Gods truth muste not bee despisable vnto vs, though the worlde reiect it. Then let not these temptations withhold vs from fighting valiantly agaynst them : but if we see our selues redie to be hated, and that men practise mischeefs against vs, for mainteyning good quarelles : let vs not giue them ouer for all that. True it is, that that were ynough to draw vs backe, and to stoppe our mouth: neuerthelesse it behoueth vs to fight agaynst such temptations after the example of Eliu. Ye see then how Gods seruantes ought to be fully resolued, not to swarue from confessing the truth when neede requireth. And finally, Eliu sayth, that there shall bee no accepting of persons with him, and that he will not vse any flatterie, bycause that if he should see men, hee cannot tell whether his maker wuld destroy him. Eliu meeneth to say in effect, that he will not be bideled by the authoritie of man, that he should not speake freely when it commeth to the mainteyning of Gods truth. But this cannot be layde forth at length as nowe, and therefore it is ynough for vs to haue Elius meening. Surely it is not an euill thing, nor vtterly to be condemned, to call a man by an honourable tytyle. Howebeit, forasmuche as the same dooth ostentymes hinder vs, and abashe vs before hande, so as we haue not suche libertie as were requisite, to do our dutie in speaking plainely and flatly when wee ought to do it : therefore doth Eliu say, that hee will not giue tytles to men, that is to say, that hee will not exalt men so highe, but that the truth shall bee aboute them. So then, let vs beare in minde, that although it bee lawfull for vs too yeelde honour vnto men, yea and that wee ought to do it, insomuch that we must honour not onely our superiours or equalles, but also our inferiours, according as the scripture commaundeth vs : yet notwithstanding, whether it bee towarde our equalles, our towarde our inferiours, or toward such as surmount vs in degree : alwayes the truth must be preferred before men.

And although wee yeelde euerie man the honour that belongeth to him, and which he deserueth : yet let vs not cease to speake alwayes freely withoute accepting of persones, according as wee knowe, that when wee speake in Gods name, hee will haue vs too do it without feigning. Then if wee intende to honoure God as is meete, and as hee deserueth, it behoueth vs to vtter our wordes freely when we speake to men : and (as I sayde,) that vwill bee no impeachment of yeelding euerie man his due honour. For yet for all that, wee must not haue our mouthes shette, but euerie of vs must followe his owne calling, and when it commeth too our turne too speake, wee must speake truth. Ye see then what wee haue to beare away in this last saying of Eliu, too the ende that suche as beare office in the common weale, shoulde speake freely as they ought too doo, and that euerie of vs, (although all haue not the office of teaching and pronouncing sentence publikely) shoulde neuerthelesse confesse the truth frely when it is required at our handes, assuring our selues that God accepteth it as a sacrifice of honour done vnto him : And that wee doo so, it is not onely a keeping of the rule that is giuen vs, but also an honouring and exalting him aboute all creatures.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue done : and that for the bringing thereof to passe, wee may not presume aught of our selues, knowing well that wee cannot open our mouth except hee guide and gouerne vs by his holy spirite, and therefore that it may please him too instruct vs in such wise, as we may haue our mouth open too speake when neede requireth, and that we may not followe our owne affections and lustes in speaking, but that all our life may be agreeable therevntoo, and be bestowed in suche obedience towards our God, as wee may seeke nothing but to frame it wholly to his holy will: and that although wee bee subiect too muche wretchednesse and corruption in passing through this worlde: yet wee may not fayle too labour still for the full perfection, wherevnto God will call vs, when we shall haue glorified him in this worlde. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also, &c.

The Cxxij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the xxxiiij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the three last verses of the former Chapter, and they vpon the text that followeth.

- Therefore Iob heare thou my talke, and hearken vnto all my vvordes.
2. Beholde I haue opened my mouth, my tongue shall speake in my palat.
  3. My vvordes are the rightnesse of my heart, and my lippes shall vtter pure doctrine.
  4. The spirit of God hath created me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me life.
  5. If thou canst, ansvvere mee, and prepare thy selfe agaynst mee, and debate thy case stoutly.
  6. Beholde I am to God vvatde as thou [or according to thine ovne mouth] I am also formed of the clay.
  7. There is no feare of me to trouble thee, and although I presse thee, yet shall it bee no heauie burthen to thee.

Haue begon already too lay soorth the protestation that Eliu made of speaking rightly without regarde of men : and (as it hath bene declared) the mā that will speak rightly and godlily, must haue his eye shet that he accept no persons. For if we be led either with hatred, or with fauor, there will be nothing wel ruled in vs, there will be nothing but trouble. Specially when it standeth vpon teaching in Gods name, it behoueth vs to be well aduised to turne away from a l fleshy affectiō And Eliu said purposely, that God might roote him out, if he shoulde haue respect of mens greatnesse. Now it might seme hard at the first sight, that God shoulde shoulde destroy one for no more but magnifying some mannes greatnesse. Howebeit lette vs marke first of all, that when God graunteth vs the grace too speake in his name: it behoueth vs too yeelde all the authoritie too his worde, and too aduance the estimation thereof. But if wee bee so turned aside by looking vnto creatures, that wee speake not freely as wee ought to doo: Is it not a dishonouring of God? If a man be sent from an earthly prince, and suffer other men too scorne him, and he playeth the goose and dare not preferre the message that is committed vnto him: it is such a lozelrie as is not to bee pardoned. Beholde, God receyueth vs to his seruice, euen vs that are but dust before him, euen vs that are altogether vnprofitable: he putteth vs in honourable commission to beare abroade his worde, and he will haue it to bee borne at roade with authoritie and reuerence. Nowe, there is a man that doth so dismay vs, as we disguise Gods truth, to turne it into a lie, or else brue it in such wise, as it shal be put quite out of his owne nature: I pray you is not that as great a reproche as can be done vnto God? So then if Gods word be not caried abrode so soundly and freely as men may honor it: it is no maruell though punishment be prepared as Eliphaz speaketh here. Thus haue we a double lesson to gather of this text. The one is for such as preach Gods word, and are in office to teach as shepherdes. These must settle theselues too suche constancie, as they swaue not howsoeuer the worlde go, according as it is sayde in Jeremy, that he must take to him a forehead of brasse too fight withall, because the world will neuer be without great stubbornnesse, and such as are exalted to any dignitie of honorable state, can not yeeld themselues in subiection and obedience vnto god, but doo alwayes set vp their trissles against him. Nowe seeing that they doo so forget themselues, as they cannot stoupe too him that hath created and fashioned them: It behoueth vs to haue an inuincible constancie, & to make our reckning that we shall haue enmitie and displeasure when wee doo our dutie: but yet neuerthelesse let vs go throughout it without swauing aside. Lo what we haue to marke on oure side, we (I say) which are ordeyned as pastorsto preach the worde of God. Notwithstanding it behoueth all people too receyue a generall instruction. Therefore when wee come to heare a sermon, let vs not carie such a lositie stomacke with vs, as to checke agaynst God when we be reprov'd for our finnes: let vs not carie such bitternesse, as to be angry when our galled backs be rubbed: neither let vs bee so foolish and ouerwise, as to thinke that God ought to hold his peace for vs: neither let vs seeke to be borne withal vnder the colour that there is some good qualitie in vs. Though we were kings and princes, yet behoueth it vs to low downe our neckes to receyue Gods yoke: for all losstinesse must be pulled downe, as S. Paule sayth in the second to the Corinthiâs. For the cause why the gospell is preached, is to the ende that both great and small should submit themselues vnto God, & suffer themselues to be gouerned by him: which thing can or be done, except we cast down our losstinesse (as S. Paule sayth in that place) which exalteth it selfe against the maiestie of our lord Iesus Christ. And we must not tarie til we be inforced and compelled to obey God: but euery man must do it of his owne good wil. Then let such as are in any estate vnderstād, that though they were more than kings, yet ought they to humble themselues at the preaching of Gods truth. And why? For they must thinke thus of themselues. From what Lorde or mayster is he sent that preacheth? Euen from him that is fouereyne Lorde of all mankinde, and vnto whome all men owe subiection. Then if we bee of meane degree:

I pray you, is it not an ouerfranke follie, too desire that men shoulde beare with vs, and winke at oure faultes, and cloake them, yea and that the worde of God should bee falsified for our sakes? Can God transforme himselfe? No: But hee will haue his woorde too bee his liuely Image.

Nowe then if we seeke to be flattered, it is asmuch as if wee woulde desire that God shoulde chaunge his nature, and renounce himselfe, to the intent too please vs. And is not that too diuelishe a rashnesse? Then let vs learne to come too the hearing of Gods worde with all humilitie and mildenesse: assuring our selues that oure obedience muste bee tried in this behalfe, and that none must be spared, but all mens faults shewed with rightfull libertie, as is conuenient. Now let vs come to that which Eliu addeth. Iob (sayth hee) beare thou me. Truly I speake with my tongue, and I vtter my woordes from my palat. But yet not withstanding, my sayings are the rightnesse of my bart, and thou shalt not beare any thing but truth and vprightnesse at my moutb. See heere what a protestation Eliu maketh, to the intent to be heard: that is to wit, that he will not speake feynedly, and as a double minded man, but will set downe things purely, according as he knew them to be, and as they had bin reuealed vnto him. Marke that for the first poynt. Secondly he addeth, Beholde I am in respect of God as thou art, or according to thy mouth. The worde that he vseth signifyeth properly a mouth: howbeit, sometymes it is taken for Measure. Nowe wee haue seene heere tofore, howe Iob desired God to come to him, without bringing any such terrour as he felt. If God were my match (sayth Iob) I coulde answere him: and although he haue all authoritie ouer me, yet coulde I mainteyne my case. Lo after what maner Iob speaketh. And so this sentence might be expounded thus: Beholde I am according to thine owne moutb: that is too say, according as thou hast desyred: or else thus: Beholde I am according to thy measure: that is to say, I am like vnto thee, in respect of God. Neuerthelesse, the meening will abide alwayes one: And therefore wee neede not too stande much vpon the worde. Let vs consider still wherevntoo Eliu intendeth too come: that is to witte, that hee is not God that he might make Iob afrayde, but that he is created of clay as Iob is: that is to say, that he is a mortall and transitorie creature which hath no strength in himselfe. For (sayth hee) it is the spirit of God, that hath fashioned me: and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me life. Too bee short, we see howe Eliu telleth Iob heere, that hee will speake agaynst him with such reason, as hee shall bee overcome. Thou shalt no more alledge (sayth he) that God maketh thee afrayd, that his glory is terrible to thee, and that thou canst haue no right at his hande: Thou shalt not bee able to say so. For who am I? Beholde, I am a wretched lump of earth and myre. True it is that I haue breath and life, howbeit I haue them of God: but yet am I as full of frayletie as thou. So then there shall nothing ouersway betweene vs two, but reason: and thou must be faine to be confounded. VVe see in effect the two poynts that are conteyned heere. The first is, that Eliu declareth that his woordes are the rightnesse of his bart: and that he will not speake any thing which he hath not thought and conceyued in himselfe.

This is well worthie to be noted: For therevpon we may gather, after what sort hee ought too bee disposed which beareth about the worde of God: namely that he must not haue store of biblebale at his tongues ende, nor cast forth wordes at all aduerture, no nor yet play an enterlude: but according as God hath taught him, so must hee deale foorth that thing which is printed in his heart, hart, vnto those oter whom God hath giuē him charge, So then, will we serue God purely in our office? It behoueth vs first and foremost to brydle our tongues, that they speake not any thing, but that which is printed in our hartes. And surely we heare how it is sayde by Dauid, and likewise alledged by S. Paule, (who applyeth it to all the miniters of Gods worde:) I haue beleued, and therefore will I speake. True it is, that this thing is common to all Christians, and to all the children of God: but it ought chiefly to be obserued of those whome God hath ordeyned to bee as instruments of his holie spirite. Whensoever we speake: then is it Gods will too bee heard in our persons. Seeing then that hee hath done vs so great honour: at leastwise his doctrine ought too bee printed in vs, and too take roote there, and afterwarde our mouth shoulde beare witnessse that wee knowe it. Too bee short, it behoueth vs to haue beene taught by God, before wee can be good maysters or teachers. And specially when wee preache, let it not be onely to teache others: but let vs comprehend our selues in the same number and companie. Beholde I say what we haue too marke. And vndoubtedly when a man speaketh Gods worde without feeling the operatiō of it in himself: what doth he else, but play a part in an enterlude? And what a trecherie is that? What a defiling is it of Gods worde. So then let vs bethink vs throughly: and as oft as we go vp into the Pulpit, let vs remember well the lesson that is giuen vs heere: namely, that the rightnesse of oure heart must shewe it selfe in our tongue. And therewithall also when wee see that a doctrine is good, and that the man which speaketh, laboureth too edifie vs: let vs knowe that we bee vnthankfull, and vterly rebellious agaynst God, if we heare not his matter with all humilitie. Nowe when Eliu maketh this preface, hee speaketh not after the maner of men, as in the way of curtesie: but he sheweth after what sort God intendeth to holde vs to himselfe. By what meanes is that? B: bolde mee (sayeth hee) beare mee: for there is nothing but right in my talke. It is as lone as it hee did set it downe for a rule in Gods name, that if a doctrine that is preached bee good and holy, and we conuincd that it is so: then if wee yeelde not with all reuerence too frame our selues thereafter, wee shall not be guiltie of resisting a man, but it is all one as if we spited the liuing God.

So then let euerie of vs bee attentiuē when Gods woorde is preached: and seeing hee is so gracious vnto vs, as to raise vp men too declare his will familiarly vnto vs: let vs not bee as wilde folke, but let vs yeelde our selues teachable in the things that wee knowe too too proceede from him. And forasmuch as the lawe, the Prophetes, and the Gospell, haue beene conueyed vnto vs, by such maner of men, whose vprightnesse is well ynough knowne and witnesssed: let vs marke that whosoever submitteth not himself to that doctrine, needeth no other procs to his damnation. To be short, let vs marke, that our Lorde hath authorisid his Prophetes and Apostles, to the ende that the doctrine which they haue giuen vs should not be doubted of, but be taken as an vnrpeachable decree. Marke that then for one poynt. But herewithall we be warned, that the faythfull must not become so sheepish as to receyue whatsoeuer is tolde them, but must examine the doctrine whether it be of God or no. And that is the cause why it is sayd, that we must trie the spirites. And this muste bee well noted. For wee see that the wretched Papiſts suffer themselves to bee ledde without any discretion, and the fayth which they haue is nothing but meere sheepishnesse that men must stoppe their eyes, and haue no reason at all in them. But contrarywise, Gods will is, that wee shoulde haue both skill and discretion, that we be not abused and seduced by the false doctrines that men shall bring vs. Howe shall that be done? Truly we must not presume to iudge of Gods truth according too our owne witte and fancie. But wee must rather captiue all our reason and vnderstanding, as the scrip. ure sheweth vs. Neuerthelesse, wee must therewithall pray God to giue vs discretion, to discern whether that the thing that is set before vs, be good and right or no. And furthermore, let vs with all lowlynesse desire too bee gouerned by him, and too bee vnder his hande, assuring oure selues that by that means, wee shall knowe whether there bee anye right in the matter that is tolde vs or no. Also it is the thing that oure Lorde Iesus Christ alledgeth, when hee will haue vs too receyue his sayings. I seeke not mine owne glorie (sayeth hee) but the glorie of him that sent mee. Therefore it behoueth vs alwayes too searche too what ende the man tendeth that speaketh vnto vs. For if we see that the marke whiche hee shooteth at, is that God shoulde bee glorified, and reigne ouer all men: there muste bee no more disputing agaynst him, but wee must rest fully there. But on the contrarie part, if his doctrine tende too the defacing of Gods glorie, too the turning of vs from his seruice, or too the aduancing of ambition and vanitie, so as it builde vs not vp too bee the true Temples of God, or if it gronde vs not vppon God, too remitte our selues wholly vnto him, too call vppon hym purely, and to rest our selues vpon his grace and fatherly goodness: Then do wee see that there is no rightnesse in it.

True it is, that we shoulde bee fore combred in that cace, if God had not first of all shewed vs, what maner of one this rightnesse is: but if wee haue once the principles that hee hath gyuen vs, wee can neuer swarue, vnlesse it bee long of our selues. Beholde, God telleth vs, that hee will bee exalted, and haue men too acknowledge, that all goodnesse cometh of him. Againe, hee will also haue all Lordshippe and power ouer our life, and therein holde vs so in awe, as wee may be gouerned by him, and according to his good will: he will haue men too bee vterly abaced, and bereft of the truſte of their owne rightuousnesse, wisdom and strength: hee will haue vs to come & draw water in our Lord Iesus Christ, as in the fountaine of all goodnesse: hee will haue vs too call vpon him purely, and hee will haue the Sacraments which he hath ordeyned, to be receyued as warranters of his grace, and as meanes and hopes to further vs to serue him with so much the more free and earnest hart. These are the things wherein there can bee no glose, nor anye darkenesse or difficultie. So then let vs alwayes haue this touchstone with vs when we come to the trying of any doctrine. And then shall wee perceyue whether it be right or wrong, true or false, pure or corrupted & mingled, or according to the true rightnesse which God hath shewed vs. I say we neede not to bee wrapped any more in doubts in this behalfe: only let vs open our eyes, and therewithall pray God to guide vs by his holy spirit: for without that we shall alwayes wader, & not be able to discern so much as little childre, according as S. I. Paule saith Gods spirit must be as a cresset to giue vs light or else we shall neuer cōprehend Gods secrets. They are spiritual, & we of our nature are fleshy and earthly and we alwayes beare downward. But if god indightē vs by his holy spirit, thē do we iudge of the doctrine, & discern in such wise, as we cannot be deceyued by al Satans temptations. And although he send vs deceyvers & raise vp many tumultu- lers that labor to turne a l thing vpp d. down yet cannot that preuayle anye thing agaynste vs, so long as Gods spirite is our light, (as I haue sayde alreadie.) Furthermore, although God do sometymes speake by the mouthes of the wicked (according as it is sayd that the kingdome of our Lorde Iesus Christ shall bee furthered now and then by occasion, so as the hypocrites or folke that haue no feare of God, but are led with vainglorie and other vanities shall serue for a time, and God wyll make their doctrine auaylable too the saluation of his chosen, howbeit that it bee too the greater condemnation of themselves) although he say I, that this may nowe and then come too passe: yet notwithstanding it is not the ordinarie meane. For when it pleaseth God too haue vs edified in him, immediately he rayseth vp men that speake heartily and zealously, yea and hee giueth suche a marke to the worde that commeth out of their mouth, as men maye knowe the working of the holie Ghost, according as also Sainct Paule sayeth. And here yee see, that suche as are in office too preache Gods woorde, ought too muche the better too practise that whiche I haue sayde: that is too witte, too learne well themselves before they teache others, so as their heart may speake before their mouth. For the bringing hereof too passe, let them pray God so too touche them too the picke, as they may haue the woorde well rooted in their mindes, that they may bee able both to serue their neighbours, and too perceyue that they thrust not forth themselves at aduerture, but that they are drawne by the holy ghost. Yee see then what wee haue to remember in this streyne. Now in the seconde place Eliu protesteth, that he is a transitorie and frayle man, so that hee cannot make Iob afraide: Nevertheless hee will not winne anie thing at his hande, but by reason and truth. Before we come too the cheefe poynt, by the way we haue to marke the maner of speache that hee vseth heere: which is, that the spirite of God hath created him, and that the breath of the Almighty hath giuen him lyfe: and further, that hee is but myre and clay. Truly this is well woorthie to be noted of all men. For if wee coule well beare in minde that which is shewed heere: vndoubtedly all pryde would be buried in vs. For what is the cause that men do glory so much in themselves, and are so full of ouerweening, but first for that they knowe not their owne originall beginning: and secondly, for that they haue not the skil to consider in good earnest, that looke whatsoeuer they haue, they hold it of God, and that it is no heritage vnto them, but that they haue their life and all the appurtenances thereof, by cause it pleaseth God to preferue them. Then if men coule first consider from whence they come, and secondly, that whatsoeuer goodnesse is in them, they hold it of Gods meere grace: it is certeyne that they shoulde be rightly meekened. Therefore it is sayde, that wee are fashioned of mire and clay. Nowe let vs go boast oure selves and make as great vauntes as wee list, and yet shall we not bee able too chaunge our nature. Wherefore, when a man feeleth himselfe tempted with pride, so as hee woulde exalt himselfe too muche: let him enter in too himselfe, and consider from whence hee came, and oute of what thing God tooke him. If but onely our feete bee myrie, it seemeth too vs, that wee are the lesse woorth. And if the myre doo but touche vs, we thinke our selves defyled: yea if it do but hang on our shoes. And yet for all this, we be made of clay. Therefore we ought not so too forget our pedegree from whence we come, namely that we are but earth and dust. True it is that this saying is common ynough, and euerie man confesseth it: but in the meane season no man acknowledgeth it. For such a through conceyte were ynough too purge vs of all pryde. VVhat else is the presumption and ouerweening that in is mē, but only a windinesse, because they bee puffed vp with ignorance, and haue forgotten themselves: So much the more then ought we to wey well this speeche, wherein it is sayde that wee bee created of clay or myre. True it is, that there were some worthinesse and excellencie in our nature meete too bee commended, if we were thoroughly whole and sounde: but yet were it not lawfull for vs to bee proude of it. And seeing we are so corrupted in Adam as wee bee, it is certaine that we ought too be double ashamed. And why? For we were created after the Image of God. And what maner of Image is it nowe? It is a disfigured one: wee be so defaced, that the marke which God had put in too vs to be glorified thereby, is turned into his dishonour: and all the gracious giftes that were bestowed vpon vs, are become as many recordes too make vs guiltie before God, by cause wee defile them, and so long as we continue in our owne nature, we do but abuse the benefites that wee haue receyued, and applye them vnto euill. And so yee see alwayes that our confusion increaseth, by all the giftes whiche God hath bestowed amongst vs. But yet let vs put the case, that we were as vncorrupted as euer our father Adam was at the first. Shoulde wee therefore presume of oure selves vnder the colour that God had so innobled vs? Truly wee holde all things of him. VVhat is it that putteth a difference betwene vs and the brute beastes, and maketh vs more excellent? Haue wee it through our owne purchase? Haue we gotten it by our owne strength? Haue wee it by inheritance from oure forefathers? No. But wee haue it of Gods free gift through his owne meere goodnesse. So then what is to be done, but onely to humble ourselves?

This is the thing which we haue to gather in general vpon this streyne, where Eliu confesseth himselfe to be made of clay, and that hee is beholden too God for his life and breath, by cause hee bestowed them vpon him of his meere goodnesse. And nowe by the waye, those whome God will haue too serue him in state of honour, ought too remember this lesson the better. For when God reacheth men his hande, and setteth them in some degree of honour, it is not too the ende they shoulde vaunte themselves, but rather acknowledge how muche they are bounde vnto him, and bee so muche the more prouoked too honour him, sharpening and applying all their wittes and affection too worke in suche wise, as God might bee honoured by them: according as it is sayde, that a candle must not bee hid, but set vpon a table or cupborde that it may giue light ouer all the house. Those then to whom God hath shewed the fauour to exalt them to any hie and worthie calling, ought to be the more inflamed too inlighten their neighbours, and to giue them such example as the grace whiche they haue receyued, may not be as it were choked. This is the thing which we haue to marke here in this second place. And heerewithall let vs marke generally, that men cannot yeele God his due glorie, except they stripe themselves starke naked. For so long as wee pretende too reserue any thing too oure selves, bee it neuer so little, the glorie of God shall bee so much diminished. VVhat is too bee done then? VVhen wee haue well searched what graces or benefites wee haue: let vs make so manie Items of receyts in our account, & acknowledge that we haue nothing at all of our owne. The verie way for men to kepe themselves from robbing god of his prayse, is to indeuer to know themselves, how there remaineth not one drop of goodnesse in them, but euery whit of it must be be put into an inuentorie, according also as they are accountable for it afore God. Furthermore when we be so brought to nothing in our selues, we susteyne no losse by it: for we shal not fayle to be apparelled againe: yea & if we be truly ioyned vnto God, & yeeld vnto him his due prayse: we shal be much richer than those that are so full of ouerweening, surmizing theselues to haue I wote not what a kind of inheritace. So then let vs not be loth to be diminished and to be so vterly stripped fro all glory: for our lord wil not suffer vs to be vnfurnished of any goodnesse: but yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs to be so abaced, as I haue sayd. Besides this, when we know that we ca do nothing but as it is giue vs fro aboue: let vs apply al the things that God putteth into vs, to such vse as he coman-

 deth. For our Lord hath not indued vs with the giftes of his holy spirit, that the same should be otherwise applied than to good vse, or that they shoulde bee vnprofitable. Therefore let vs be well aduised, that the things which we haue receiued be presented and as it were offered in sacrifice vnto God: & seing it is his will to haue the welfare of our neighbours aduanced, let vs aboue all things haue a regard to edifie one another. Lo what wee haue to beare in minde here. And now let vs come to the talke that Eliu holdeth here, & to the substance of it. He had sayd, the spirit of God hath created me, and his breath hath giuen me life. So then (addeth he) there is no terrible nesse in mee to make thee afraide, but onely reason shall beare the sway. Here Eliu sheweth what the duetic of a good teacher is: namely to looke well to himself, & to view and consider himself before he open his mouth. And why? for they that haue not knowne their own frayltie, will haue no copassio of their neighbours: and when they fall to rebuking of suche as haue done amisse, they go to it with such rigour, as it shal be rather to make the wretched wanderers stray further, than to bring them into the way. And when it cometh to comforting, they haue no skill how to do it: or if they come to teaching, they do it with a displayne. Therefore if we will teach Gods woord as we ought to do, let vs begin at the knowing of our owne infirmities. And when we be well acquainted with them, that wil leade vs to a modestie & meekenesse, so as wee shall be of a milde heart to vtter the woord of God. True it is that for as much as there are many which are full of pryde & stubbornesse: the woord of God had neede to be vnto them as a hamer to brouse and breake their hardnesse: but yet notwithstanding we ought first and formost to teach those that yeeld theselues teachable. And how may we do that when we know not what neede we haue to beare with them? But beare with them we cannot, except we feele how frayle we our selues are. For he that knoweth not his owne wantes, hath no compassion to partake other mens sorrowes, and to comfort them. So then will we teach the ignorant faythfully? we must vnderstand that there is nothing but ignorance in our selues: & that it had bene worse with vs than with all other men, if God had not giuen vs the things which wee haue receyued of him. Againe, will wee comfort the wretched and afflicted? Let vs first vnderstand what it is to be afflicted, let vs haue passed that way our selues, and let vs be touched with griefe and heauinesse, that we may comfort our selues with others that are in sorow, & haue skill to beare with them. Furthermore if we will rebuke such as haue done amisse, let vs not do it with ouer great rigour, but rather let vs pitie their destruction. True it is that sometimes vehemency muste needes be ioyned with it: for when we see their wretched soules perish, it is no time to cocker them: if men be wilfull in their stubbornesse, we must not only strike them, but also woude them to the quicke. Yea, but yet therewithall it behoueth vs to haue this poynt afore had, namely that we haue bene acquainted with our own infirmities, & that it grieue vs to deale rigorously: like as although a father beate his children, & vse much more rougher wordes to them than he would do to strangers: yet notwithstanding his hart bledeth, when he is fayne to transforme himselfe after that sort. Then let vs marke, that a man shal neuer be meete to be a teacher, except he haue put on a fatherly affectio. & first of all knowe his owne infirmitie, to the end he may frame himself to such a pitifainesse, as he may haue copassio of all such as he hath to deale withall. This is the thing which is shewed vs here by Eliu. Furthermore let all such as are placed in authoritie, consider well that they must not abuse their power vnto tyranie, to oppresse those that are vnder the. For they shall haue a double account to make before God, if vnder the colour of their authoritie, they will haue men to feare them and stande in awe of them, and not seeke cheefely the honour of God & the welfare of those that are committed vnto them. And see here how 20 Ezechiell speaketh of cuill shepherds which haue mistreated Gods people through tyrannie. He sayeth that they reigned ouer them with all rigor and lordinesse. Yea but contrarywise it is shewed vs here, that all such as will quite theselues faythfully towards God and their neighbours when they be set in hie degree, must not therefore aduance themselves, but rather know that if they intend to carry terrour with them to put poore folke in a feare: God must be fayne to shew them that his minde was not to set wilde beastes here to feare his flocke, nor Goates to pulse at them with their hornes, and to trouble their water, as he speaketh in the sayd text of Ezechiell. God then 30 will shew, that those to whom he hath giuen the swoorde and seate of iustice, and those whom he hath put into the pulpit to teach his woorde: are not set there to be Goates to treade downe and oppresse the silly Sheepe. Lo what we haue to marke in this text. And here withal Eliu sheweth, after what maner we ought to receyue doctrine: that is to wit, that if we know it to be true and right, we must out of hand passe with it without gayne saying, although wee be not forced nor constrained vnto it. Yee see then 40 what we haue to beare in minde concerning the circumstance of the place & the matter: that is to wit, that when a good doctrine is propounded vnto vs: very well, he is but a mortall man that speaketh it, but do wee see that he hath reason and truth. Then let vs assure our selues, that in replying agaynst him, we fight not onely agaynst God, but also agaynst our owne conscience, which is a sufficient iudge to condemne vs. And herewithall we haue a very profitable warning to gather: which is that whensoever we come to be taught in the name of God, if we see that the doctrine which is offered vs is right, there must be no more replying: for wee shall winne nothing by it: but if there be reason, it behoueth vs to submit our selues to it. Furthermore this ought not to hinder vs from setting Gods maiestie before our eyes. For wee must not iudge of the doctrine that is set forth vnto vs, according to our owne wit and fancie. Therefore two things had neede to be matched here together. The one is, that wee fully determine to be ready to obey God, concluding in our selues 50 that our maker ought to haue all foueraintie ouer vs, and that we ought to be subiect vnto him. This is the preparatiue that must be made aforehand. And afterward we must enter into iudgement, that is too say, wee muste examine the doctrine, howbeit not with pryde, nor with an opinion that wee be wyse ynough of our selues, but with praying vnto God to gouerne vs with his holy spirit, that we may follow the doctrine which he shall haue shewed vs. Thus ye see the two things that ought to be matched together. And this match'ing or mingling bringeth no confusion. For he that is prepared to obey God, will not leave for all that, to open his eyes, and to consider how he ought to discern vnto truth from truth. Howbeit herewithall lette vs learne, not to be so frowarde as to haue no regard of the man that speaketh: but let vs consider that God sheweth vs great fauour, in that it pleaseth him to vse his creatures, and to abace himselfe after that sorte vnto vs, to the ende wee should haue the more leysure to consider his woorde. For if he should come vnto vs in his owne Maiestie, we should be vndone. But when he offereth himselfe to vs by men, he applieth himselfe to our infirmitie, to the intent we might the more commodiously know his truth which he setteth before vs. Yee see then in effect what wee haue to remember in this streyne, and the rest shall be referued till another time.

Now lette vs fall downe before the face of our good

God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so too feeble our wretchednesse, as wee may be taught, not to challenge any thing at all to our selues, nor to be abused any more with vayne follies, but to acknowledge that we be altogether miserable, and therevpon to desire to be succoured of him through his mercie, and be thankfull for the benefites which he hath already bestowed vpon vs, to the ende that by his gracious goodnesse in continuynge them towards vs, wee may learne to apply them to the glorifying of his holy name, and to dedicate them vnto his seruice, beseeching him further to beare with our weakenesse, vntill he haue vtterly ridde vs of it, and transformed vs into his owne glory. And so let vs al say: Almighty God our heavenly father we acknowledge and confesse according to the truth, that we be not worthie to lift vp our eyes to Heaue, to present our selues before thee, nor &c.

The.cxxiiij Sermon, which is the second vpon the.xxxiiij. Chapter.

8. Doubtlesse thou hast spoken to mine eares, and I haue heard this voyce of thy saying.
9. I am pure and without sinne. I am cleane and there is no vnrighteousnesse in mee.
10. He hath found occasion agaynst mee, and taken mee for his enimie.
11. He hath put my feete in the stockes, and taken heede to all my vvayes.
12. In this thou shalt not be iustified, I will answer thee that God is greater than thou.
13. VVhy struest thou agaynst him? for he will not answer to all vvordes.
14. God speaketh once and tvvoyce, and men heare it not.

W e must call to minde what was treated of yesterday: that is to wit, that God doth vs a great pleasure, when hee vouchsafeth to apply himselfe so far to our infirmitie, as to speak familiarly vnto vs by the mouth of a mortall man which is tyke vnto our selues. For it is to the ende that beyng not put in feare by his maiesty, we should haue the better leysure to thinke vpon the things that he sheweth vs, so as we may haue a quiet and vntroubled minde, to conceyue well the doctrine that wee heare, and to make our profite of it. True it is that if God spake to vs from heauen, it would moue vs the more, and consequently the doctrine should be of the more authoritie: howbeit in the meane season wee would be as it were agast, and so should we not be masters of our wittes to consider what he sayeth. But when a man speaketh, wee may the better at our owne ease, both taste and digest the things that are spoken.

Yee see then in what wise God beareth with vs. Surely wee see that when the lawe was to be published, the people of Israell sayde, lette not the Lorde speake vnto vs, for wee be vndone if wee muste heare him. And why? for since the tyme that God had begonne to shewe his Maiestie, there was such a feare stryken into their hearts, as the poore soules wiste not where too become: in so much that they concluded, that if God should haue spoken to them stil, they should haue bene destroyed. VVhen Moses came abroade, he was fayne continually to hang a veyle before his face, because God had giuen him a marke of his glory, and the Iewes were not able to abide it. So then wee see that when God rayseth vp menne to teache vs by, therein he hath a respect vnto our feeblenesse, and vttereth not his power vnto vs, too the intent wee should not be too much dismayed, but that wee might haue our wittes at liberty to be edified by his doctrine, so as the same might be familiar too vs, and wee haue the more leysure to thinke vpon it, and to apply our study to it. And hereby we be warned, that we must not despise

Exod. 20. c. 19.

Exod. 34. d. 33.

Gods woorde when it is preached vnto vs by men: for it were to villanous an vnthankfulnesse in vs, if God should abace and humble himselfe from his owne greatness to the intent to apply himselfe to our vnabilitie, & we take occasion thereat too make no account of the things that he sayeth vnto vs. And therefore although this treasure of Gods woorde be sette before vs in earthen vessels, that is to say by mortall men which are full of all infirmities: yet muste wee alwayes esteeme it as it deserueth, knowing that the men speake not in their owne name, but are sent vnto vs of God, who will be heard by their mouth. Nowe lette vs come to the vpbraidings which Eliu offereth here vnto Iob. Doubtlesse thou haste said in my hearing, and I haue heard the voyce of thy wordes: That thou art righteous and without sinne, and that thou arte not guiltie of any iniquitie. Therefore therein thou canst not iustifie thy selfe, that is to say, thou canst not mayntayne thy quarrell that thou haste not done amisse. And that it is so: how wilt thou answer God, seing he is greater than thou? Thou accusest him that he hath sought occasion to punish thee, and that he hath set thy feete in the stockes, so as thou hast no libertie to maynteyne thy case. But thinke not thou to escape by that. For thou muste be condemned, and God muste make thee feeble that he doth iustly punish thee after this sorte. Here wee haue to examine, first of al, whether Eliu do charge Iob wrongfully or rightfully with intent to iustifie himselfe: for it seemeth at the first sight, that he hath mistaken Iobs talke, and that hee turneth it slanderously too another meaning. And for prooffe hereof, Iob neuer went about to challenge such perfection, as to haue no sinne in him: we haue seene the contrary. Therefore it should seeme, that Eliu doth falsifie the woordes that he had heard, & apply them to a contrary meaning. Howbeit forasmuch as God blameth him not (as we shal see:) and that we haue already herd how he protested that he would not assaile Iob after the maner that the other had done: let vs marke that here he taketh Iobs wordes as Iob himselfe ment them: that is to wit, that Iob had an eye to his present affliction, as if he

he should say, true it is that I am a poore sinner, I cannot denie but I haue committed many offences before God, but in this I finde my selfe righteous, and God vseth his absolute power agaynst mee, in that I see not the reason why he tormenteth mee after this sort: for my affliction is ouergriuous. Although then that Iob ment not to iustifie himselfe generally: yet notwithstanding he ment to iustifie himselfe in the case of his affliction. And it seemeth that Eliu doth him wrong still in this behalfe also. For I haue tolde you already, that in very deede, God met not to punish Iob for his sinnes, although he might haue done it iustly: but thought it ynough to trie his patience. And had not Iob reason, seing he knew that? For he framed himselfe to the ordinaunce and will of God. But the answer is, that in receyuing the afflictions which God sendeth vs as triales of our obedience, after wee haue perceyued that God punisheth vs, not in respect of our offences, or for that he is angry with vs, but rather for that hee intendeth too humble vs, and to know whether wee will bee subiect vnto him in all poynts: and also too mortifie our lutes: when wee are in this forwardnesse, wee muste immediatly haue an other consideration: which is, that yet neuertheless God can well finde good cause to punish vs if it please him. Although then that God spare vs, and will not vse his rigour towards vs in respect of our sinnes: yet notwithstanding he may do it and there is iust cause to do it. Why then doth he it not? Bicause of his goodnesse: and yet in the meane while hee afflicteth vs for some other respect. Marke that for one poynt. And the second is, that if God shewe vs not, why he afflicteth vs, it behoueth vs to cast downe our heades, vntill he come neerer to vs, and make vs perceyue why he dealeth so with vs. Therefore wee ought to tarry his leysure, and not to giue brydle to our affections. Iob fayled in these twoo poynts. For although he acknowledged himselfe to be a sinner: yet notwithstanding he gaue not God the glory which was due vnto him. The reason whereof was, that he had not sufficiently minded this poynt, that God (if he had list) might haue punished him much more rigorously, yea euen for his sinnes. And againe wee haue seene, how he raunged abroad and chafed in himselfe, saying: what meeneth God? I am here a wretched creature, and is it meete that God shoulde stretch out his arme agaynst mee? And is there any reason in this dealing? It seemed then that he ment to accuse God of some tyrannie: not that he concluded so in himselfe, but that he was tempted so to do. That is the thing wherein Iob fayled. And therefore it is not without cause, that Eliu sayeth vnto him: how now? Thou hast ment to iustifie thy selfe as if thou were pure and cleare without sinne: And therein thou shalt neuer be acquit, nor get the better end of the staffe. So then, to the intent we may profite by this doctrine, let vs beare in minde that if God punish vs for our sinnes, it behoueth vs first of all to yeelde our selues guiltie. And there is nothing more expedient than that. For if wee intend to be iustified afore God: what els haue we to do, but to looke vnto our owne lyfe, and to know that wee are well worthy to be beaten with Gods scourges, seing we haue offended him so many wayes? Notwithstanding, if God haue some other respecte in afflicting vs, and yet handle vs more roughly, than such as are altogether vnruely and make an vtter skorne of Gods maiestie: let vs marke that his doing of it, is not bicause of our sinnes. Why then? He intendeth to trie vs and to make vs knowe whether we be wholly his or no. For so long as things go as wee would haue them, what know wee whether wee be forwarde to serue God or no? But when we must be fayne to renounce our owne will, to subdue all our owne naturall wit and vnderstanding, and (to be short) to fight agaynst our own affections: that is a true triall of our seruing of God. Therefore when the case shall stande so, let vs thinke in our selues: truly my God may iustly ouerwhelme me a hundred thousand times. For although he haue graunted mee the grace to waike in his feare and to indeuer myselfe to serue him: yet were that nothing at all, I could not stande one minute of an houre, vnlesse he vphilde mee by his infinite goodnesse. Surely he will vpholde mee: Howbeit therewithall he maketh me subiect vnder his hand, and sheweth me that I ought to hang wholly vpon him. Go to, he doth it for a good cause, and therefore it behoueth vs to be quiet, so that after wee haue inquired, why God vexeth vs so sore, and why he persecuteth vs so extremely, and we perceyue no cause why: It behoueth vs to conclude, O my God, thy determinations are incomprehensible, and so far as I am not able as now to know any more by reason of the rudenesse and infirmitie of my vnderstanding: I will wayte patiently till thou make mee to perceyue the cause why. So Lord, when I shall haue taried in this sorte like a poore blind soule, thou wilt open mine eyes, and make me perceyue wherevnto these things tende, and what shall be the ende of them, and I shall profite better by them, than I do now.

Yee see then that the wisdom which ought to be in the faythfull, is to haue such mildenesse as to confesse alwayes that God is righteous, although they perceyue not the reason of his workes. And herewithall also, they must with all humility acknowledge themselves wretched sinners, and that God might finde cause ynough to make cleane riddance of them, if he list not to beare with them of his owne mere grace. Thus yee see in effect what we haue to gather of this text. Now lette vs come to that which he addeth. God (sayeth he) hath taken occasion (or picked a quarrell) against mee, and therevpon hath set my feete in the stocks, and tormented mee and looked vnto all my paynes: he spieth mee out, and hath his eye so vpon mee; as I cannot stirre a finger, but by and by I haue committed a fault. True it is that Iob intendeth not to accuse God of vnrighteousnesse, or of punishing him without cause. Howbeit herewithall lette vs marke well, that he was caried away with his affections, as there scaped many disordered woordes by fits, which are not to be excused. And I haue noted all this heretofore as oportunitie requyred, and as they came in place. For I haue shewed you, that Iob skirmished too much agaynst God, and yet was still patient, resting in full purpose to glorifie him, notwithstanding that he was troubled at times, and was brought so lowe as he wiste not how to recouer. And this is well woorthy to be noted, as whereof we may gather a good lesson: which is, that although we be not so caried away, as to purpose too blaspheme God: yet notwithstanding as soone as wee haue neuer so litle libertie, immediatly we ouershoote our selues, and there is no hope with vs. It is a pity to see what man is: for he is so fraught with euill, that as soone as he hath a litle libertie giue him, by and by he raungeth out on the one side or on the other, and will not hold the right way, but gaddeth astray, yea euen or euer he thinke it. It is certayne that if Iob had bene asked whether God sought occasion against him to handle him so cruelly: he would haue answered, no, he is righteous: yea and he woulde haue sayd it without hypocritie. Yet notwithstanding he is charged here, (& not without cause) to haue stryued agaynst God, as if he had sought wayne shiftes. How cometh that to passe? and why? Bicause Iob was tossed too and fro in his sorowe, and nowe and then had not so good stay of himselfe as he ought to haue had. So then let vs marke, that although a man be well ground-ded in the feare of God, and had leuer to die than to vtter a blasphemie : yet notwithstanding, we cannot giue our passions the bridle, but by and by there will scape vs some euill woordes that are to be condemned : and specially if we be pinched with aduersitie, the passion of sorow is so vehemēt, as it canot be ruled : for then a man skirmisheth in such wise, as he iustleth against God, and that is to his owne destruction in the end. Sith we see this : first of all let vs consider, that our nature is to sinfull and frowarde. And so ye see one poynt which we haue to marke, which is, that it followeth of necessitie that we are corrupted, seeing we canot thinke vpon God without doing him wrōg and iniurie. And furthermore also we are admonished to enter into an other consideration : which is, to holde our selues in subiectiō whensoever God scourgeth vs, and to say, alas I perceyue thou art disposed to afflict me : do thy will. VVhen God hath graūted vs the grace to be at that poynt : let vs assure our selues, that we haue well profited, inasmuch as we are ready to obey him and to receyue the stripes of his rodde patiently. Howbeit when God hath brought vs to so much reason : we must not the slip aside, but rather say, Go to, thou art already bouēd vnto thy god, in that he hath made thee willing to receyue the chastisements that he sendeth thee : Neuerthelater, there are stil so many infirmitie in thee, that in the turning of a hād thou shouldest by & by become impacient & rebell against him, and blaspheme him also without thinking of it. So the let vs learne so to mistrust our selues, as we may stand vpon our gard to prevent these temptations. That done : let vs know further, that notwithstanding the good wil which we haue had to yeeld our selues vnto God & to beare the afflictions paciētly which come of him : yet is not our paciēce perfect & faultlesse. For what a nūber of euill imaginaciōs will run in our head ? And although we sticke not to the, but rather do mislike them, & alwayes settle our selues to say, behold, my God shall gouerne mee, he shall haue the rule of me, and it behoueth mee to haue the meekenesse to hūble my self vnder him, euen though he would triāple me vnder his feete : yea, and although he would thrust we downe into the depth of the bottelēsse pit, yet ought I to yeeld myself vnto him. VVhen we be come to this point, yet will there be many euill thoughts in our mindes. And againe if we speake, there will alwayes somewhat slip frō vs, & we shall neuer haue our wordes so well restrained, but that there will still be somewhat of our fleshlineesse, & of our own naturall imaginatiō lapped about it. Therefore let vs learne to condemne our selues, although wee haue bene pacient. And seeing that Iob is reproued so greuously by Eliu in this sentence : let vs be sure we shall be found much more blameworthy : specially if we haue not indured to obey our god, nor yeelded him the honor which belongeth vnto him. Lo what wee haue to marke in this streyne. And by the way, if Iob be condēned here to haue blasphemed God : what shal become of vs, when we be so caried, as there is no more paciēce in vs, as it is most commonly seene. Then how can we beare this condēnatiō, if we haue charged God, as though he sought vaine & fond clockings to execute his rigour against vs. But it is certaine that if men confesse not freely and willingly, that God is righteous in al his punishmēt, nor do fully cōclude & rest vpon it : it is all one as if they should say : yea verely, behold, God is a tirant. They will not vtter such wordes, for it were horrible : but yet so is their meening : for there is no meane. If wee glorifie not God in his rightuousnesse, acknowledging all his doings to be grouēd vpon reason, equitie, & right : it is as much as if we charged him with executing of tirānie vpō vs. I graunt that the blasphemies shall not be alwayes alike, nother shall there alwayes be a consent. Iob ouershot himselfe so far as to say, there is no reason why god should afflict me : howbeit forsomuch as the headinesse of his passiōs caried him away, as we haue seene heretofore : therefore the holy Ghost is fayne to cōdemne him in this text. VVherfore let vs be sure, that our dānation shall be the greater, if we be not quiet in our afflictions, but fall to grudging, & that although our mouth speake not a woord, yet we be so ful of hartburning within, that we play the Mule which chaweth vpō his bit. Now then, whē we haue such bitternesse in vs against God : it is asmuch as if wee accused him of picking couert quarrels to vs, to punish vs without cause. As touching that it sayd here, God hath set my feete in the stockes : Eliu rehearseth Iobs woordes as Iob had ment them. For God gaue him no libertie : as when men hold an offender in the stockes it is a kind of punishmēt to make him cōfesse that which he would not, whether he will or no. Iob then had vsed the sayd cōpariōn, saying : that God gaue him no means to maynteyne his quarrell, although it were good. Neuerthelēsse it is true, that Iob of al the while was sure in himself, that God knew well some reason why to afflict him : but yet for all that, he ceased not to wonder & to chafe at his affliction as though God pressed him to fore. If a mā had asked him whether he had mēt so, he would haue answered no : he would haue vn sayd it out of hand : neuerthelēsse his passions were so vehement and prouoked him so fore, that this saying scaped from him, ere he was ware. Now if Iob were rebuked for a woord that had scaped him vpon the suddaine and vnwares : what shal befall vs when we be wilfull and hardharted, and not only haue spoken some woord vnaduisedly, but also purposed long afore, so as we be wilfully stubborne ? Truly God warneth vs therof, and sheweth vs that we haue done amisse : and therefore if we will not receyue the warnings that he giueth vs, but follow still our owne wit and naturall conceyts : I pray you shal not this stubborneesse condemne vs a hūndred fold more, than this ouersight which was in Iob. And it is woorthy to be marked well, that whensoever we thinke of Gods mightie power, we must not take it to be a tirannicall power, to say, Beholde God may do with vs what he listeth, we are his Creatures : he seeth that there is nothing but frayltie in vs, and yet notwithstanding he ceaseth not to vexe vs without cause. VVhen we speake after that fashiō, it is not only outrage, but also cursed blasphemie. And therefore let vs match Gods mighty power with rightfulnessse, saying : true it is, that the power of my God is terrible vnto me, & I am wholly dismayde at it : but yet doth not my God cease to be righteous : he doth al things rightfully. Thus then the thing which we haue to gather vpon this sentence, is that when we be astonished & feele as horrible torments as may be possible : yet must we not therefore say that god is excessiue in afflicting vs, nor that he will shewe what he is able to do : let vs keepe vs from saying so : for what a thing were that ? let vs consider that euen in the greatest extremities that wee can feele, God maynteyneth vs, and so alayeth his power, as wee are not consumed at the first blow. And therewithal let vs know, that although the afflictions be sore to vs warde, and as heauy as may be, yet notwithstanding God ceaseth not to be righteous. Marke once agayne what we haue to beare away in this sentence. And whereas God watcheth our steppes : let vs be sure he doth it not without cause. Now lette vs come to the argument which Eliu vseth too reprooue Iob. Herein thou shalt not be quitte (sayeth he) : And why ? For God is greater than thou. This present reason seemeth to be very colde to conuince Iob, and to decide the present cace. For firste of all, who knoweth not that God is greater than men ? And who is so mad, as not to confesse his greatnesse, and to acknowledge it in him ? VVee see many fantasticall heads that despyse God :

but yet they sticke not to graunt that God is greater than they. Eliu then sayeth no new thing: and although the same speache were not very common, yet notwithstanding what a reason is it to say, God is greater than wee, and therefore it followeth that it shall not boote vs to maynteyne a good cace. It seemeth rather that Eliu agreeth to that which Iob had sayde: that is to wit, God vsseth such rigour agaynst mee, howbeit that is of his absolute power: he is greates, and I am not able to make my parte good with him: he is my maker, and I am but a poore earthen pot: there is nothing but infirmitie in me. It seemeth here then, that Iob doth father an absolute power vpon God, as who should say that he did what he listeth agaynst men, without reason or equitie. But let vs marke that it behoueth vs to take this sentence otherwise than the woordes sounde. For whereas mention is made of Gods greatnesse: it is ment to go ioyntly with all that cuer is in him. And truely we must not separate the vertues that are in God: for they are his owne proper being. Men may well haue some vertues in them, that may be taken from them: but it is not so with God. VVhen wee speake of his power, or his iustice, or his wisdom, or his goodness: we speake of himself: they are things inseparable, and cannot be seuered (that is to say, they cannot be taken away from his Being): for they are so ioynd together, as the one of them cannot be without the other. Is God mightie? so is he also good. His mightinesse defeateth not his goodness, nor yet his iustice. Therefore whereas Eliu sayeth here, that God is greater than man: he meeneth not that his greatnesse is onely in power, but also that with his greatnesse of power, there is infinite iustice, infinite wisdom, & al others things infinite in him. And what are we in comparison of him? That therefore is the naturall sense of this streyne. Now wee see that this argument is good to put all men to silence, and to make them stoupe to humilitie, that they may stande no more in contention agaynst God. And why? what is the cause that we murmur in our afflictions? That we cannot suffer God to handle vs according to his will? that he seemeth to haue done ynough and to much already? And that we demaund so curiously why God vsseth such rigor agaynst vs? what is the cause of all this? for that we thinke not vpon Gods greatnesse. For it is certayne that if a man considered what God is, it woulde at the first brunt stay him and shette him vp, so as he would not take any more libertie to grudge nor to reply in anywise. Therefore let vs marke, that all our ouergreat and excessiue affections, all our murmurings, and all other such like things: proceede of this, that wee knowe not what God is, and that we spoyle him of his Maiestie, as much as lieth in vs. That is a cursed thing, and there is none of vs, but he lotheth it: and yet for all that (as we see by experience,) it happeneth vnto vs, ere we thinke of it. For if things fall not out, as we would wish: do not we breake out of aray to enter into disputation agaynst God? No doubt but we would that all should be well. I put the cace that our zeale were good: yet would we bring God to dispose things according to our liking. And if they happen otherwise: by and by ye see we are out of pacience. And whereof commeth this? Bicause we be to desirous that God should giue vs leaue to common familiarly with him, and wee beare our selues in hand, that we could shew him how things ought to go otherwise. And though we canot do so, yet notwithstanding his will cannot content vs. To be short, we must come to this poynnt, that all things are governed by Gods prouidence: but it seemeth vnto vs, that all should go contrarywise. Ye see then, that to enter into debate and disputation agaynst God, is all one as if we would defeate him of his greatnesse and bereeue him of his right, as much as in vs lieth. So then it is not without cause that Eliu vsseth this principle here agaynst Iob: namely, God is greater than thou, and howe then wilt thou pleade agaynst him? Hereby we be warned, first of all that whensoever wee be to much greeued in our afflictions, and would haue things to go otherwise, and cannot abide that God should gouerne vs after his pleasure: it is all one as if wee would first rob him of his right, & afterward make him our fellow and companion, so as he should haue no more authoritie nor superioritie ouer vs. Our intent shall not be so, but yet are we woorthie of blame for it. And therefore so much the more ought wee to be fory, and to gather our wittes about vs, seing there is such a loftinesse in vs, as we cannot be thorowly subdued to glorifie God in all things that he sendeth vs, but wold that things should go cleane contrary: taking vpon vs to taske God to do what wee would desire him: for it is all one, as if we would take his greatnesse from him. Marke that for one poynnt. Furthermore let vs marke, that it is not ynough for vs to haue conceyued generally that God is great: but it behoueth vs also to consider the greatnesse. For else wee shall well ynough confesse that God is Almighty, and that as hee created the worlde, so he hath all things in his hande and gouernance. VVee shall neuer sticke at that, howbeit these are but flying confessions houering in the ayre, and wee shall fare neuer the better by them, if we go no further. VVhat is to be done then? it behoueth vs to apply these miracles of God to our owne vse, that it may come to our remembrance after what sort God should be great: namely to the end we may be wholly giuen to obey him: that whatsoeuer he do, we may thinke it to be good: that howsoeuer he dispose of vs, we may agree vnto it, and acknowledge him to be righteous: and that although hee tosse vs too and fro, we may alwayes stand stedfast in beleefe that he sendeth vs not any thing which is not rightfull. Ye see then that the acknowledging of this greatnesse of God, is by graunting him to do with vs what he thinketh good: and not onely with vs, but generally with all creatures. Now we know what it is to confesse that God is Almighty, at leastwise earnestly & vnfaignedly. But yet shall men neuer yeeld themselues to the obeying of God, nor neuer giue him the glory that he deserueth, but by knowing what they theselues are, & what God is. VVhe we haue made this coparison, and perceyued that wee are nothing, and that God surmounteth al that we can thinke, and that he hath an infinite glory in himselfe: I say when we know this: then shal we haue no more the vaine trust to exalt our selues, nother shal we any more play the wilde colts as we were wont to do: but we shall learne to graunt God an infinite greatnesse, & to know that we our selues are nothing. And for the better expressing hereof, Eliu addeth that God answereth not all woordes. This importeth a great substaunce. For Eliu intendeth to shew vs, that we cannot comprehend al things as now, bicause God listeth not to reuele the vnto vs. This is in effect the thing which he met. And it behoueth vs to marke, that God manifesteth himself vnto vs in part, to the end we should not be left vntaught in the things that are good & expedient for vs. Neuerthelesse he knoweth our capacite, & according therunto reueleth his will vnto vs, referuing in the meane while vnto himselfe, the things that we could not comprehend, bicause they passe our vnderstanding. If we beare this lesson in minde, we shall haue profited well for one day: Behold, God hath taken vpō him the charge and office to teach vs, and therefore we must not be negligent in hearing: seing that he is so gracious to vs as to be our master, let vs in anywise be his schollers and giue diligent heede to that which he sayeth. Howbeit let vs marke therewith-all, that whē he executeth the office of a scholematter towards vs, it is not to open vnto vs al things that we would doubt of, or whereof we would be inquisitiue. VVhat thē?

The things that he knoweth to be for our edifying, that is to say, which he knoweth to be for our behoofe. And so it behoueth vs to marke three things. One is, that we must haue our eares opē to receiue the doctrine that God teacheth vs, and not be as brute beasts when he doth vs that honour, but apply our indeuer to profite vnder him. Thus ye see the first poynt. VVee must not do, as the wretched Papists do which would know nothing: O (say they) it is a dangerous matter to inquire of Gods secrets. It is true that we must come to it with lowlinesse & reuerence: but ought wee therefore to haue our eares stopped, or deafe, whē God speaketh to vs? So then let vs alwayes learne to be ready and willing to receyue whatfoeuer is sayd or set forth vnto vs in the name of God. Thus much cōcerning the first point. Secōdly let vs mark that God wil not shew vs all things as now, but we must content our selues with that which S. Paule sayeth in the first to the Corinthians: that is to wit, that as now we know in parte, and see as it were in a glasse and darkely: for as yet we be not come to the day of the full reuelatiō. For although the Gospell be called the brightnesse of the noone day: yet notwithstanding the same is referred to our measure. God in lighteneth vs there sufficiently: we see his face in our Lord Ie-sus Christ: & we behold it to be trāsfigured into the same: but howfoeuer the worlde go, wee see not that which is prepared agaynst the latter day. It behoueth vs to increafe cōtinually in faith: but faith presupposeth that the things are yet hiddē, according as we haue the measure of fayth, as the Scripture sayeth. If we haue it in measure, then is it not in perfection. Thus ye see how wee haue to beare in minde, that the faithfull during this present life, ought to content themselues with some tast of Gods will, and to know some portion of it but not all of it. For if we haue fond desire to say, I will know all things & be ignorant of nothing: that were a mad wisdom, and it were much better for vs to be starke fooles. Therefore let vs marke, that the faithfull must cōtent themselues with that which is reueled vnto them: and that is a far greater and better wisdom, than to be inquisitiue of all things without exception. Marke that for the second point. And the third is, that Gods holding of vs at that poynt, is not for that he is niggardly to shewe vs his wil any further, but bicause he knoweth what is conuenient for vs. And therefore let vs marke well, that God teacheth vs for our edification.
VVhat then is the measure of faith? what is the doctrine of the holy scripture? It is the rule which God knoweth to be expedient for our saluatiō: and men neede not to cōplaine, if they may know the things that are conteyned in the holy Scripture, and haue them declared vnto them daily in Sermons, if men know that: they neede not to cōplayne as though they had not vnderstanding ynough.
For looke whatfoeuer is good and conuenient for vs, our Lord hath declared it vnto vs. So then sith wee see that God hath cōmaunded his woord to be brought vnto vs, and would not hide any thing frō vs which might be for our saluation: we haue so much the more thanks to giue him for disclosing himselfe so familiarly vnto vs, and we 1 Cor. 13. b. 12.

haue wherewith to cōtent our selues, rather than to be curious as wee see many are, which be desirous to be fear-ching out of measure. And the Papists also haue had the same, so as on the one side they sayd, O wee must not be inquisitiue of Gods secrets: & vnder that colour, they reiected al the holy Scripture: & on the other side they had a foolish curiositie in seeking things that appertayned not vnto them: and they were full of fonde dotages, to say, what is such a thing? And how is such a thing done? To be short, nothing contented thē: in somuch as the whole holy Scripture was no better vnto thē than an Apce. For they were not ashamed to spew out this diuelish blasphemie, that when we haue all that is in the holy Scripture, it is not ynough for vs, but we must haue other secret mysteries which God hath reserued to his Church. VVher-vpon haue they forged all this? Like as Mahumet sayde that his Alcorā was to great perfection: so also the Pope sayeth that there be certaine secrets reserued vnto him, besides the holy Scripture. VVhat a shame is this? But yet notwithstanding wee be warned here, that the cause why our Lord hath fitted his doctrine to our capacitie & measure, is for that it behoueth vs to be cōtēted with it, & not bring thither our wādring lustes, to say, how goeth this or that? For what are wee? And therefore let vs heare God speake, & let vs open our eyes and receiue that which he sheweth & telleth vs by his woord. And againe, when we be come to that point: let vs hold vs in quiet. For he sheweth vs after what sort we must put our trust in him: after what maner we must liue: and after what maner we must woorship him. Hath he shewed vs this? well. Let vs settle our selues wholly there, and bee contented with that which he sheweth vs in the holy Scripture: for he knoweth what our vnderstāding can bruck. And also the things which he hath declared vnto vs are not very darke, so we do him the honour to receyue them with all lowlinesse, & be not so mad & ouerweening, as to desire to vnderstand that which he will haue hidden frō vs, & that we will not graunt him to be righteous, except he shewe vs the cause why, according as we see many which wil say: Tush, I beleeue it not, for it passeth mine vnderstāding. Thou vile toade, darest thou blaspheme God after that sort, bicause he giueth thee not an account of al his doings? & disdaynest thou to forbear the thing which is hidden frō thee bicause thou canst not cōprehend it by reason of thy own beastlinesse? So then lette vs not be puffed vp with such pride, as might make vs rush against God: but let vs cōtent our selues with that which is declared here, wayting patiently for the great day, wherein the things which wee know now but in parte, and which we do but tast and behold as it were in a glasse, shall be shewed vnto vs face to face and in full perfection.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgemēt of our faults, praying him to make vs feele thē better thā we haue done, that we may not only craue pardon of him, but also beseech him to renew vs by his holy spirit, & to cleanse vs frō al our fleshy affectiōs: & that forasmuch as there is nothing but vanitie in vs, & we cānot but stray frō the right way, if we folow our nat-urall inclination: it may please him to redresse it and to guyde vs by his hād vnto the end of our life. That it may please him to graūt this grace not only to vs, but also &c.

The cxxiiij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xxxiiij. Chapter.

14. God vwill speake once or tvvice, and men heare him not.
15. In a dreame and vision of the night vwhen sleepe is vpon men, & they are at rest in their bed:
16. Then openeth he the care of men, and sealeth his chastizement vpon them
17. To the end to drayve a man backe from his vvorke, and to hyde the pryde of men.

Here

Ere Eliu goeth forward with the matter which he had begon already in the last sermon: that is to wit, that God yeeldeth no accout of his doings and sayings vnto mortall men. And wee haue to marke here, that whiche I haue declared already:

Esay. 45. c.

namely that Eliu treateth not here of that doctrine of God which ought to be cleere and easie vnto vs. For God (as he profereth by his Prophet Esay) speaketh not vnto vs couertly, nother is it for nought that he sayeth, seeke me. And if his word be darke vnto vs: that cometh not of it self, but of the blindness which is in our dull wits. For the doctrine which God hath set forth vnto vs, & which is contained in the holy Scripture, is rightly named light. Eliu therefore speaketh here of the determinations which God maketh in his owne secrete purpose. For (as it hath bene sayd) God in setting forth his woord vnto vs, hath a regarde of our capacitie which is very slender, and in the meane while referueth the things to himselfe, which wee could not cōprehend as yet, bicause they were not profitable for our saluatiō. Not that God taketh pleasure in our ignorance, but bicause he knoweth what is good for vs: & therefore it behoueth vs to be cōtented with the measure that he giueth vs, and to tary till the day of the full discovery be come, at which time we shal know the things that are now hidden. VVherfore let vs proliue now according as it shal please God to giue vs power, vntil we behold the things opely, which as now are darke vnto vs. Ye see then in effect what we haue to gather of this text: namely that here is no treating of the woord of God which we heare dayly, and which he will haue to be taught vs: but of the secretes which he keepeth to himselfe, & which he wil not haue disclosed vnto men as yet, bicause they are not able to conceyue them. He had sayd heretofore that God will not answere to all woordes: that is to say, that men which are nothing, must not presume to call God to account of his workes, so as he should make thē priuie why he worketh after one sort or other. Now he addeth, that God will speake once or twice and men shall not beare him. It is the worfe for vs, that there be many sentēces cōcerning God, which he sheweth by effect, wherof notwithstanding the reason is vnknowne, and although God speake as it were with his own mouth, yet sometimes he is not heard: that is to wit, when the matter cōcerneth things which mé comprehend not as yet, & which are as it were buried frō them till the latter day True it is that this present sentēce is expounded diuersly: some vnderstād it, that God wil speake once, that is to say, that he will speake the woord & it behoueth vs to rest vpō it: & that two will come against it, & he will not vouchsafe to regard them: and so, that men must not thinke to repeale Gods ordinance for it shal alwayes stand vnimpeached. That is true. But as touching Elius matter, I haue tolde you already, that it behoueth vs to continue the thing which we sawe in the last Sermon, namely that God will not yeeld an account of any of his wordes. And so Eliu graunteth him a libertie to speake & say what he will, yea euen in such wise as men may not carpe at it. There haue bene also which do referre this to that which Eliu addeth, namely, that God speaketh vnto men in visions by night when sleepe troubleth them, and also what he speaketh by chastisements. It seemeth vnto them that here be the two maners of speaking vnto vs which God vseth: so as sometime he reueleth himself by inspiratiōs, and sometimes also toucheth vs with his hande. But this is nothing to the purpose, & it is a cōstrayned sense. Furthermore we neede not to beare our braynes much in seeking diuersities of expositiōs, seing that the naturall sense is manifest vnto vs. Therefore let vs follow that which I haue declared already: which is, that God shal speake once or twice, yea and yet not be vnderstood. Thus wee know what Eliu mēt to say: & now remaineth to apply the same to our instruction. And how? first of all by knowing our own slendernesse: for what is the cause that men take so highly vpō them to seeke & search after such a sort as nothing may escape thē: but bicause they thinke thēselues able ynough to find out al things: but if a mā be thorowly wel tamed, in such sort as he challenge nothing to himselfe, he will be no more so proude & lofty to search Gods secretes to far out of measure. So then to the intent we may take profit of this text specially, first let vs hūble our selues yea euen by acknowledging that our vnderstanding is to small & grosse. Marke that for one poynt. And on the other side let vs cōsider also, that Gods secret iudgemēt is a dreadfull dungeon, that his wayes are incōprehēible, & that it is not lawfull for mē to wade to far in thē, but must cōtent thēselues with that which he declareth. Ye see then that the secōd poynt which we haue to marke, is that whē we thinke vpon the highnesse of God, we ought to be rashed to the honoring of it, & cōclude that we must not take vpon vs to be able to know & cōprehend al that is in him. For whither were that to go? wee creepe here vpon the earth, & we know that he far surmounteth the heauēs. Then seing it is so: let vs honor his secret iudgements, assuring our selues that he will alwayes haue authority to speake & vtter what he listeth, mauer al them that speake against him: yea & that when he speaketh once or twice, that is to say, when he sheweth his pleasure and will: men shall know nothing of it bicause they are to rude to conceyue the things in one woord, which God hath determined in his purpose: but shal dayly see one thing, & yet not withstāding be new to seeke of it, yea & stil dazeled at it, euen at the end of a yeere or ten: & although they haue seene one thing oftē, yet the reason of it shal be hiddē frō thē. VVere it not for the pryde that is in vs, it is sufficiētly confirmed vnto vs by experience, that we neuer come to any reason but by cōpulsion, & that we wil alwayes neede be selfwise, eue though our ignorāce shew it self ynough & to much. Neuerthelesse it is not without cause, that we be warned in this text, that God will haue his determinatiōs as it were buried & hid. VVe see the effect of it dayly, & we know not what to say, sauing that it is a wōderful thing, & that it behoueth vs to bridle our selues, in waiting till our Lord reuele it in greater perfectiō, which shall not be till we be bereft of this mortall flesh. Thus yee see what we haue to marke here. And according to the article which I haue touched already, let vs note also that here is no speaking but of the iudgements which God will haue hiddē, bicause it is not for our behoof to haue full knowledge of thē as yet. It is sayd in the 62. Psalm that god speaketh once, & Dauid protesteth that he wil heare it twice, namely that there is might & mercie in God. There is no treating of Gods wōderful iudgemēt, as there is here. Of what then of the things that we lerne by his word, which are brought to our remēbrāce & set before vs cōtinually. For on the one side God maketh vs to feele his mightie power, to the end we should feare him & walke according to his will: & on the other side he giueth vs his mercy, to the end wee should take cōfort & ioy at it. VVhat lerne we dayly in gods word, but that he is the master to whom it behoueth vs to be subiect, & that we must not line after our own lust, but that God must raigre ouer vs, & his law be a bridle that we may be taught vnder it. Thus the first poynt is to serue God, & to know what he requireth & alloweth. The second is, that wee know him to be our father & Sauior, to the end to put our whole trust in him.

Ro. 11. d. 33.

Ps. 62. c. 12.

And how shall wee know him? By grounding our selues vpon his mere mercie, knowing that there is nothing but death and damnation in vs, and acknowledging that he hath drawne vs out of death through his owne mere goodnesse, for our Lord Iesus Christes sake. Thus as concerning this second poynt, the two things wherein it behoueth vs to be confirmed, are that we must resort to him for refuge: and also that for somuch as his mercie is set before vs daily, wee should not doubt but that he will receyue vs. So then, this texte of Dauids, speaketh not of the things that are kept hidden from our knowledge: but of the things that God intendeth to declare vnto vs and teach vs. Therefore he sayeth, God hath spoken: that is to say, God hath so manifested his will in his speaking, as men ought not to doubt any more, nor to replie agaynst that which he sayeth. I haue heard it twyce, sayeth he. Herein he betokeneth, that it is not ynough to haue heard God at a glance: but that it behoueth vs to minde the things without ceasing which he speaketh. And although he speake but once: yet must we not let his doctrine slip, but settle it throughly in our remembrance, and learne to print it in our hearts, and thinke vpon it early and late, bycause our memorie is short. So then, we see now, that it is the dutie of the faythfull, to apply theselues thoroughly to the hearing of the things that God sheweth them by his woorde, and to set their whole minde vpon it, assuring themselues that God will giue them the knowledge of the things which he telleth and promiseth them for their welfare. Marke that for one poynt. Howbeit, herewithall let vs keepe our selues from seeking any further, and let vs not couet to be wyzer than God will haue vs to be. And how may that bee? By learning in his schoole: and if hereferue any secrete iudgements to himselfe, let vs be ignorant in the things that he wil not haue knowne vnto vs, vntill he haue taken vs out of the world. As for example. It is sayd vnto vs that God gouerneth all things by his prouidence: and Eliu speaketh to the same purpose here. Ye see then that God disposeth of all his creatures, he holdeth all things in his hand, and nothing happeneth in this worlde by chance, but all things according to his will. This doctrine is giuen vs in the holy Scripture, and it behoueth vs to receyue it without gaynsaying. Nowe then if wee inquire howe and why, and would that God (whensouer he worketh) should yeelde vs a reason of his doings, and would enter into disputation to checke agaynst him: we passe our bounds, as wee see these toades do which are full of poyson, and spew out their blasphemies agaynst the prouidence of God, saying: If God dispose all things, then is he the author of sinne: then is euill to be fathered vpon him. Lo here a cursed thing. For it behoueth vs to hold our selues within the cōpasse which the holy Scripture giueth vs: and because wee perceyue not the reason why God doth all things, and therefore do thinke them straunge: it behoueth vs to stay there: like as also when the holy Scripture sayeth, that God choze whom it pleased him before the making of the worlde, and forsoke the rest: it is good reason that we should receiue it with all reuerence, and acknowledge that our saluatiō proceedeth of the free goodnes of our God, forasmuch as he hath chozen vs out of that forlorne and damned lump. Furthermore, if vpon this sayd poynt, we fall to flittering into ouer high speculations: we shall be confounded by it, and that rightly. Why so? For therein we would know more than God hath graunted vs, and that were as much as to fight agaynst him. And thinke we that such an outrage shall scape vnpunished? Thus ye see how wee ought to practize this sentence where it is sayd, that God shall speake once or twyse without being heard: that is to

c. 20.

Rom. 5. c. 11.
Eph. 1. a. 4.

say without being vnderstoode, because the wit of man is to weake. But now let vs come to that: which Eliu addeth. He sayeth that when men be layd downe to sleepe and are at rest and asleepe: God speaketh and openeth their eares, of purpose to withdraw them from their owne workes, and to tame or hyde the pryde which is in men: (that is to say) to calte it downe and to burie it: or els to seeke his discipline or instruction in chastizing them. If he see them hardeharted and that they receyue not the playne doctrine or instruction which he giueth them: then is he fayne to stryke vpon them, and to tame them with his rodde, and to inforce them to be taught in his truth. This is in effect the thing which is treated of here. Truly Eliu speaketh of his owne time, for I haue tolde you already, that he was not of that people which God had chozen to communicate his lawe vnto. For if that he and those whom wee haue heard speake, and Iob himselfe were after the tyme of Moyses, which thing is vncertayne: yet were they straungers frō the Church of God: and the knowledge which they had, was giuen them by an extraordinary manner, in asmuch as it pleased God to inspire them. And this is the cause why he sayeth that God inspireth men, euen by dreames: and that when they are asleepe, God doth as it were plucke them by the eare, and giue them warning to thinke vpon him. True it is that God inspireth vs also, and although we heare his woord to our instruction, and haue his holy Scripture to reade: yet doth he not ceasse to warne vs still, and to giue vs many heartbitings, which are as many summonings to call vs backe to himselfe, when we are gone astray. For we see how men bury the sayd knowledge, and seeke by all meanes to forget God: but God commeth to search within vs. Therefore when we feele any prickings and thoughts that stirre vs vp: let vs vnderstande that God putteth vs in remembrance of himselfe, because we bee inclined to forget him, and to become as it were brutish. Specially in the night time when we be alone, and our wittes gathered to vs, that we wander not here and there: then if there come deepe thoughts that wey with vs so farre as euen to make vs to sweate or tremble, or els if we be in such disquietnesse of minde as though wee were vpon a racke: it is God that worketh in that cace: and he summoneth vs, because he feeth that we are as it were fugitiues, like a yong boy that leaueth his fathers house, and runneth abroade blowyng a feather in the winde. God then, seing vs runne so astray, calleth vs home by visions in the night. True it is that they shall not be such as Eliu, Iob, Eliphaz and the others had. And why? for we haue the helpe which they wanted: that is to wit, the woorde of God, which is preached to vs and wee do heare it. Thus doth God reuele himselfe vnto vs, because we haue his lawe, his Prophets, and his Gospell in our hands, and our eares are continually beaten with the doctrine that he hath willed to bee taught after the manner of those that had nother Scripture nor preaching. Yet neuerthelesse wee see that God worketh now and then after that sort with some men. But to be short, wee haue to marke here, that although God sende vs not such visions as the auncient fathers had: we must not be discontented nor grudge at it. For that were to great an vnthankfulnesse, because it hath pleased God to cōmunicate himself vnto vs by an other meane which is fitter for vs. There are some curiouse folke which demaunde, why God appeareth not from heauen as he did in times past, and why the thing is not performed which he spake by Moyses, namely that he would speake to prophets in visions, figures, and dreames. It is because that at this day we haue his will fully reueled vnto vs. VVere it not a superfluous thing, that God should appeare vnto vs

as he did in former times, seing he hath giuen vs an other meane, and that if we despyse not his woorde which we haue in our handes, we be sufficiently, fully, and perfectly instructed there? So then let vs learne to be contented with this fashion which God hath ordayned to instruct vs by. And further let vs note, that his appearing by visions vnto the auncient fathers, was bicause they had not as yet the lawe written: or else his appearing vnto the Prophets, was bicause it was needefull to haue a larger declaratiō of the things that were yet darke. But now that Gods trueth is cleare and manifest ynough, it beho-ueth vs to take the visions of the time paste for a confirmation of our sayth, knowing that they sprang out of the same fountayne. And therefore let vs walke in the simplicitie which God willet vs to holde. Marke that for one poynt. And for the second, let vs cōsider Gods goodnesse, in that after he hath giuē vs his woord in writing, and raysed vp men to expound it, he still toucheth vs and stirreth vs vp inwardly by his holy spirite, giuing vs remorces and inspirations. Therefore lette vs consider the care which he hath of our saluation, seing he draweth vs so sweetely vnto him by all meanes. Ye see in effect what wee haue to gather vpon this streyne. Nowe when Eliu addeth, that God sealeth his instruction in men by chastycing them with his hand: it is an article well worthy to be borne in minde. For here it is shewed vs, that God muste bee fayne to speake vnto vs with many strokes of hād as they say. And why? for he is so gratiouse vnto vs, as to allure vs gently by his worde: and when he seeth that this gentleness auayleth not, he vseth a greater vehemencie too tame vs: for here he rebuketh vs for our sinnes, he maketh vs afrayde, and he citeth vs to his iudgement, to the end we should beware and restrayne our selues, and be as it were beaten downe vnder him, to confesse our wretchednesse, craue pardon, and be sorie for them, so as hee might clense vs from our faults. But hath he vsed those meanes? that is to say, hath he laboured to bring vs backe to him by the sweetnesse and homeliness of his workes. VVe continue still the same wee were afore, and become wilfull in our hardhartednesse. Therefore he is fayne to lift vp his mightie hand and to runne vpō vs, and to strike vs, as it were with a hāmer vpon an anuilde, when he seeth vs so hardharted and that his woordes enter not into our eares. This is it that Eliu ment to say. True it is that he had sayd heretofore, that God openeth mens eares: (yea truely, for we know well that God worketh by a secrete power in vs when he sendeth vs the inspirations that are spoken of here): But he addeth this as nowe, bicause wee would fayne be so sorted, as there shoulde bee none other life with vs, but to giue our selues to making of good cheere. VVe see how men shunne Gods presence asmuch as they can, and seeke by all meanes to run astray in all vanities. God then openeth our eares, when he toucheth vs in such wise, as wee be compelled to bethinke our selues. A very theefe that is hardened in his wickednesse, and could finde in his heart that all remembrance of Iustice were abolished, shall notwithstanding not fayle to haue prickings and heartbitings to sting him withall. And whereof commeth that? euen bicause God openeth his eares: howbeit let vs marke, that there is a double opening of our eares which God worketh in vs. For sometime he openeth our eares to the ende that wee should bee inforced to perceyue that it is hee that speaketh: but yet for all that wee cease not to be stubborne still, and to refuse the doctrine and corrections which he giueth vs, so as wee receyue no chasticement at his hand to amend vs. There is an other opening of our eares which is better: which is when God softeneth our harts, so as we do willingly receyue his sayings, and giue heede to them, and yeelde our selues wholly to his doctrine. VVhen it is sayd, that God openeth mennes eares: is is not to be vnderstood, that all men indifferently do yeeld themselves teachable vnto him, and that al are disposed to obey him. No: he speaketh as well of the reprobates as of Gods children. For the reprobates shall haue some opening of their eares in so much as they shal be faine to perceyue (spite of their teeth) that God speaketh vnto them. Howbeit for asmuch as they shake of that thought, and thrust it vnder foote: they continue alwayes as deafe. In the meane whyle the good men take profit of it: for they know it is no struiuing agaynst God. And whereas Eliu addeth, that God sealeth his instruction: hee speaketh of suche as are so dull vpon the spurre, and so stubberne as God cannot subdue them by his woorde. Therefore such as do so shake off all doctrine, muste bee forced to heare God speake after an other fashion: that is to wit, God must be faine to beate them, and to teach them with harde strypes, and to shewe them by force, that he is their master. Yee see then how this streyne ought to be vnderstoode. Therewithall let vs marke well the manner of speach that Eliu vseth here: which is, that God signet or sealeth his instruction by chasticements. Hereby he sheweth, that chasticements serue to make the instruction of authoritie, when men reiect it and make no count of it: and that could not be, except the instructions of Gods worde were matched with his chasticements. For if God should but onely beate, without sending any knowledge of his will: what a thing were it? Therefore it behoeth him to teach vs with his beating of vs. And why? for if a father beate his childe, and dragge him about by the heare of his head, and treade him vnder his feete, and yet speak neuer a woorde to him: the childe shall bee vtterly dismayed bicause he knoweth not what his father meeneth, nor why that choller is come vpon him, and so the childe shall bee neuer the better for it. But if his father say to him, thou naughtie boy: see what thou haste done, and therevpon do beate him: the childe perceyueth that his fathers instruction is to his profite, and he learneth too knowe his fault, in that he hath not obeyed him as he ought to haue done. Beholde (sayeth he) bicause I receyued not my fathers single woorde, he sealeth the instruction that he gaue mee. Euen so dealeth God with men. Not that he graunteth all men the grace to haue his truth preached vnto thē, and to reade the holy Scripture: but he giueth them the remorces and heartbitings that I spake of before. For as S. Paule sheweth in the second to the Romaynes, as wee our selues feele sufficiently by nature: there is not that man which hath not an inward record in his owne conscience. So then God reueleth his will vnto men, so farre forth as is needeful to make them vnexcusable. And therewithall, for asmuch as he seeth that men suffer not themselves to be taught at his hande, but do stoppe their eares or else count his doctrine as a trifle, and make a mocke of the warning that he giueth them: forasmuch as meene forget themselves after that sort: it standeth God in hand to seale his doctrine, and to make it of full authoritie, so that when men are scourged, they may acknowledge in themselves and say: very well: Nowe I see that God sheweth mee his power: and bicause I haue not honored it, nor reuerenced his maiestie as I ought to do: therefore I am fayne as now to know him perforce, and to consider his instructions better than I haue done. For what is the cause that I am smitten, and that the mischief is light vpon me ere I thought of it? Bicause I made my selfe beleue that I might scape Gods hand: but now he holdeth mee fast shet vp, and thereby

Rom. 2. 15.

I see that his doctrine is ratified vnto mee, that is to say, is made such, as I am fayne too thinke on him spite of my teeth, and to honour him better than I haue done. So the let vs learne, that whensoever God afflicteth vs, or sendeth vs any chasticements, we must consider, that the same are as it were the scales that he setteth vpon the warning which he had giuen vs afore. If an euidence be vnsealed, men will doubt of it: and if it be alledged, it shall not be credited bicause it is not autentik. But if it haue a seal at it then is it out of doubt, and a sufficient instrument, and must be receiued. VVherfore let vs marke that God worketh after the same maner in afflicting vs: wherby he sealeth his doctrine. For although we had not the gospel preached among vs, nor any lawe, nor aught else but our own conscience as the Paynims and Turkes haue: yet had we sufficient warning of Gods wil, and knowledge ynough of it, if we did not choke it by our owne wilfulnesse. But seing he speaketh vnto vs so familiarly both in his lawe and in his Prophets, and specially by the mouth of Iesus Christ: if we on our side be so hardharted and stubborne, that we will not receiue any thing: Is it any woonder if our Lord strike vs with many blowes, and inforce vs to come vnto him? Now therefore let vs not be ouergreued with our afflictions as many men are, who turmoyle with God afflicteth them, more than if they had neuer knowne the word of God. But this knowledge which we haue must needes be sold the dearlier vnto vs, bycause that God hath spoken so vnto vs, and allured vs to him by his owne holy mouth, and we draw backward from him, and voutsafe not too go forward one steppe. And must we not needes be smitten double, when there is nothing else with vs but kicking and wincing? So then let vs learne to receiue the chasticements that God sendeth vs with a quiet mynd, and consider that his afflicting of vs, is not in vaine. VVhy so? For let vs marke whither his doctrine haue bin of such autoritie amōgs vs as it ought to be, that is to say, whether wee haue ben teachable and meeke to followe our shepherd as sheepe and lambes. As soone as God speke, we ought to print his word in our harts, and to stick vnto it. But we do either go about to wipe it out, or else our eares are deaf, or else it goeth in at the one eare and out at the other. Seing then that one sort of vs haue giuen no reuerence to Gods word, and another sort haue stryued openly against it, and the third do mock at it: seing it is so ill receiued at our hand, God must be fayne to seale it. And how? by afflictions. Ye see the that al the aduersities which god sedeth vs are his seales. Howbeit to the end that the chasticements which are hard & painful vs of nature, may be made amiable vnto vs: let vs marke wel that which Eliu sayth here: namely that Gods intent is too drawe men from their owne workes, and to byde their pryde. Herein he expresth, that God in sealing his doctrine by afflictions, not only respecteth the magnifying of his word, that it might haue full maiestie: but also therewithal procureth mennes saluation. The end therefore, which God ameth at in afflicting vs, ought to be as suger to seazon the bitternesse which otherwise sheweth it self in afflictions. Ye see Gods afflictions are combersome to beare. Yea truly: For we shunne all things that we mislike of. And morouer Gods wrath is a terrible thing vnto vs. Now whensoever God punisheth vs, it is a token that he is angry with vs, and therefore we cannot but be afrayde greued, and distressed. Howbeit God sweeteneth all this, by shewing vs, the end thar he intendeth: which is that he meeneth to frame vs to his owne hand, and that all his seeking is to make vs followe him to obey him. Thus yee see what Eliu addeth in saying, that God intendeth too drawe men from their owne workes.

Now when he speaketh here of workes, he meeneth not generally all things that men take in hand: but the things that they do rashly and of their owne head. For we know that God hath created vs to labour, and that he will not haue vs to be ydle and vnoccupied, but that euery man should apply himself to that which he is able, and that we should consider wherin we may serue both God and our neighbour, and euery of vs employ himself therein according to the abilitie which he shall haue receiued. Therefore when God afflicteth vs he meeneth not too drawe vs from our workes, that is to say to make vs vtterly good for nothing. True it is that whē we be brought lowe with sicknesse, our armes and legges be as good as broken, mē must be fayne to serue vs, the world must be combered with vs, and we are able to do no seruice: but yet doeth not God drawe vs vtterly from all worke: For patience is a worke that good esteemeth aboue all other things. So then (to be short,) God draweth vs not from al workes by afflicting vs: but the workes that are ment here, are the foolish enterprises that men take in hand. For if God let vs alone and lay the bridle in our necke, how bold are we to practise this or that? Nothing can stick with vs: inso-much that we would remoue heauen and earthe. I must do this (say we) & I haue such a way to go. VVe see now adayes that Princes take such enterprises vpon them, as if they had all things in their hand, and would as it were make new worlds. And the pride which sheweth it self in those greate men, sayeth not to be also in the lesser sort: For these play the scorpions which wrythe with their tayles to cast abroad their poyson. There is none of vs al, be he neuer so meane, but he vndertaketh things at auēture. Therefore it is needfull that God should bring vs back after that maner: that is to say, that he should pluck vs back from our rashe doings, by sending afflictions vnto vs. And so (as I sayd) we haue good cause to be of good comfort whē God afflicteth vs. For seing we are so stubborne of nature, as we neuer come to him of our own free wil: what would become of vs, if we should not be restreyned by force? Therefore considering that men do of their own nature go cleane contrary to the will of God, and sling abroad like wild beasts: let vs vnderstand that God hath neede to repress vs. And sith we know it, let vs giue him glory for that he suffereth vs not to runne like wild colts, but doeth continually brydle vs vnder his obedience, yea and also tame vs by afflictions when he seeth there is too greate headinesse in vs. Lo what we haue to beare awaye in this strayne. But let vs marke that which Eliu addeth for an end: namely that God intendeth to byde the pryde of men. For herein he sheweth the wellspring of al our enterprises, which is the pride that is in vs. VVhat is the cause the that mē do leape after that sort, and sling theselues in the aire, and make such kicking and wincing? Euen their foolish ouerweening which blindeth them. For if men knew themselues, they would be tame ynough. But they take themselues to be maruelouse wights. They knowe not that they are borne and created to obey God. The vtill such time as pride be abated in vs, surely we will be ouerbold to run astray: and therefore if God intend to with draw vs frō our enterprises, it behoueth him first of all to cure this disease of pride which reyneth too much in vs. And here is expresse mention made of hyding our pride, not that it is ynough to bury it to the end it may not shew it self: but Eliu vserb here the same similitude which wee oftentimes vse towards men, to make them ashamed as if a man should say, go hide thy self like a velleine, to one that made greate countenances in a brauery, and should deface him with such reproches as he durst no more shew himself, but should be faine as it were too bury himself in his howse.

howse. Lo after what sort his pride is as it were hápered. And after the same sort doth God work towards vs. For whereas we would faine play the wise men: our folly bewrayeth it selfe, and God suffereth not our pride to be alwayes concealed, but it bewrayeth it selfe. VVel then, whē this is perceiued, what doth God? he afflicteth vs to the intent to meekē vs: howbeit he doth it to our shame: that is to say, he buffeteth vs, and therewithall worketh vs such reproche, as we perceiue our owne dishonestie, and are faine to go hide ourselues like lewd lozels that went about to exalt theselues beyond measure & reason. Ye see then what Eliu ment. Therefore God couereth not the pride of men, but sheweth that he beateth it downe and thrusteth it vnderfoote, yea euen in such wise, that men are ashamed of it whereas they had erst ben to bold, thinking themselues able to work woonders. So then let vs marke now, that God sheweth vs a singular fauour whē he speaketh to vs, seing that we should be but as wretched brute beasts, if we were not taught by him. Againe he sendeth vs hartbitings to nip vs to the quick. If they do vs no good, and we be afterward afflicted by his hád: let vs assure our selues, that that is bicause we be too hard and stubbornē, and therefore must be tamed as wild beasts. Yet notwithstanding let vs consider, that they are all of thē God seales, wherby he healeth and ratifieth the warnings which he had giuen vs by his word. And therefore let vs make much of thē and receiue them paciētly, seing that by that meanes he procureth our welfare and saluatiō. And so let vs desire nothing all our life long but to shewe ourselues true children towards him, and too giue ouer ourselues wholly to his obedience and seruice.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledging of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them better than we haue done. And forasmuch as he hath chozen vs to be of his household: let vs desire in any wise to be guided by his hand in all simplicitie and reuerēce, and that forasmuch as he hath kinded the light of his word amongs vs, we may be gouerned by it vnto the end, and our mynds mainteyned in such purenesse as they ought to be, so as we may from daye to day growe and increase in the knowledge of his word, vntill we come to behold his glorie fully and perfectly, and be transfigured into the same: and that although it behouē vs as now to passe through many battels, and to feele vnto what wretchednesse we be subiect in this world: yet notwithstanding we may be vphild alwayes by his power, to get the vpper hand of all temptaciōs, to the intent that his goodnesse may strengthē vs more and more to walke in his obedience. That it may please him too graunt this grace &c.

The cxxv. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the xxxiiij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the xvj. and xvij. verses, and then vpon the text which is added here.

18. He plucketh back his soule from the graue, and his life that it should not come to the svvord.
19. He chastiseth man vvith greef vpon his bed, and breaketh his bones vvith chastifements.
20. So as his soule refuseth bread, and his life the pleasaunt meate.
21. His flesh is consumed so as it is seene no more: and his bones also vvich are not scene, do clatter.
22. His soule dravveth to the graue, and his life vnto them that followe at death.
23. If there be an eloquent messenger (one among a thousand) to shevve a man his righteousnesse.
24. That God hath pitie of him, and sayeth, deliuer him, to the end he go not dovvn intoo the pit: I haue found attonement.
25. His flesh shal come againe more freshe than a childes: and she shal returne to the dayes of his youth.

WE sawe yesterday that God must be faine to draw vs by force from our foolish enterpryses: bicause that naturally we be so presumptuouse, as there is nothing but we would bee meddling with it. If God should but only warne vs to bee mild, and not to thrust forth ourselues ouerhastily: it were not inough. For there is a foolish boldnesse in men which cannot be held in awe but with greate violence, as if a man shuld tie vp a wild beast with cheynes. God therefore must be faine to deale with vs as is shewed vs in this text: that is, that mā wil neuer turne away frō his own enterprises, except God subdue him by mayne blowes. And what is the cause therof? Euen pryde, as hath ben sayd alredie. Therefore vntill the pryde which is in mannes nature be beate[n] downe and thrust vnder foote: they will needes be alwayes roysting and starting out on the one side or the other, yea and sninging away like wilde beasts. And so let vs marke well, that the cheefest thing which we haue to do in our afflictions, is too learne to humble our selues, that we bee not so foolish and ouerbold, as to take more vpon vs than God giueth vs leaue to doo, but that wee walk vnder his gouernement, asking counsel alwayes at his mouth, holding ourselues til to that which he cōmandeth, and not challenging aught at all to our own strength and power. Ye see then a lesson which it behoueth vs too remember early and late when God afflicteth vs. But Eliu expresseth yet more the thing which I haue touched: that is to wit, that God procureth our welfare by the sayd meanes of humbling vs. And how is that? Bycause it is the destruction and vndoing of mē to be so puffed vp, and to exalt themselues more than is lausful for thē. Therefore there is no other meanes too drawe them out of the ditch, and to kepe them frō stumbling into a deadly fall, but that God do hold them back by afflictions. And so ye see that the cause why wee fall not intoo the graue, is that God afflicteth vs. But therewithall Eliu sheweth vs how harsh the medecyne is, in that he sayeth that is consumed our flesh, so as we haue no more the shape of man, but are like vntoo dead men that are taken out of the earib, and our bones do clatter without, and wee cannot somuch as take breathe, but are in continual torment so as wee haue no release, but God persecuteth vs with such extremitie as we can no more. Thus he sheweth that God cannot at the first blowe win that thing at mannes hand, which

which were to be desired: that is to wit that they should know theselues wretched and full of infirmities, and ther vpon stoupe vnto him, but that they must be fayne to be ouercome with strong hand and continuall torments, or else they will neuer yeeld and submit them self vnto him. Behold the twoo points which wee haue to marke. And as touching the first, let vs learne to beare our afflictions patiently, sith we see that they serue vs for medicines and salues. Is it a small thing for vs to be drawn out of the graue? These words concerne not only the bodily death which passeth away: but also (by a similitude) the euerlasting damnation is termed here a graue or a pit. Then are we ready to fall not to breake our armes or our leggs, no nor only to breake our necks: but also to perish for euer, and to be wyped out of the booke of life, and to be cut of from the kingdome of heauen. Lo to what state our pride bringeth vs. For so long as we flicker after that sort in the ayre, and think wee haue any strength of our selues, and build therevpon after our own fancie: I say so long as we be possessed with such foolish presumptiō: we are alwayes redie to stumble and to perish. But God hauing pitie of vs, sendeth such remedie as he knoweth to be conuenient: which is, that he afflicteth vs and beateth vs with his rodde. If we grudge and cannot be paciēt when God doeth so chastise vs: Is it not an extreme vnthankfulnesse, not to suffer God to remedy our destructiō & to draw vs fro it? So then let vs marke well, that here the holy ghoſt mēt to make Gods chasticemētts sweete and amiable to vs, to the end we should beare the quietly when they be sent vs. Marke that for one point. Verely this will seeme straunge to fleshly reason. For [our fleshly reason will say] could God prouyde no better meane for our welfare than by tormenting vs after that sort? Behoued it him to send vs to death that he might call vs vnto life? Surely it is an incredible maner of proceeding if a man debate it according to his owne reason: and he will thinke it but a foolishnesse that God should kill vs in pardoning vs. For what are afflictions? Signes of his wrath: and wee knowe that all diseases are the messengers of death, and that all the sorowes which we conceiue, are drownings of vs. But our Lord sendeth vs sorowes, sicknesses, and torments, and holdeth vs in them as vpon the rack, till we can no more, and till wee faynt in such wise as our life draweth to the graue. For these words concerne not the small afflictions wherewith we are accustomed: but they cōcerne Gods sending of vs to so greate extremitie, as there remaineth no more hope in vs. And how is that? must God cast vs into the bottome of death, to the end to draw vs out agayne? But so worketh he, and we must not pleade against him, for we shal always haue the worse end of the staf. And out of doubt, that is the cause why the holy scripture sayeth, that it is his ordinarie maner to kill before he quickē, and to bring to the graue before he rayse to life. Then let vs vnderstād that God intendeth here to exercise our obedience, by trying vs to the vntermost so as we can indure no more, no nor somuch as drawe our brethe, but seeme to be vtterly choked. Therefore when our Lord bringeth vs too that point, it is to the end to knowe whether we be wholly his, and whether we can abyde to be gouerned by his hand or no. Howsoeuer the world go, when we be tempted in our troubles and greefes, let this sentence come to our mynde to comfort vs withal: behold it is sayd that God in bringing mē to their graue, intēdeth to drawe the out agayne: and that in cōsuming their fleshe he mindeth to restore it again: and that in tormenting the with extremitie, he purposeth to comfort them and to bring the to rest. Seing it is so, let vs take hold of this comfort, and let it suffice vs to asswage all our sorowes: let vs not be out of hart although it seeme that we be vtterly forlorne: let vs alwayes passe further and further in the strength of this doctrine: and let vs learne to rayse vp our selues by it, euen when we be cast downe into hell. Thus ye see what we haue to bear in mind. And afterward whē Eliu maketh so long a descriptiō of Gods chastizemētts: it is to shew vs how dreadful his wrath is. And this also is a very profitable lesson for vs. For which of vs thinketh of the greatnes of Gods wrath as it is spokē of in the holy scripture? It is sayd in the song of Moyſes, who knoweth the greatnesse of thy wrath? And vndoubtedly although Gods wrath be a fire that consumeth all things: yet notwithstanding we think not vpon it, but ouerpasse it. It is told vs in Sermons, and we reade goodly texts of it: but we are not touched with it, nother doeth any man rest vpon it. Forasmuch then as we make no account of Gods iustice, and take it to be but as a sport: we ought to marke well the counsell that is giuen vs by the holy ghoſt: like as in this text it is sayd ibat God breaketh memes bones: that is to say, vseth so greate violence, as there remaineth no strength at all in them vnconsumed. Their flesh wasteth & cōsumeth away, so as there remaineth but an image of death: and a man is so continually tormented, as he is like a deade man. It is not without cause that all this is set afore vs: but it is to the end to waken vs, and that when God vttereth his iudgements against vs to make vs feele our sinnes, we should the better bethink vs that those torments are more terrible than can be expressed. According also as wee see how the holy scripture vseth many cōparisons in that behalf. VVhy doeth it liken God to a liō that breketh & broozeth things with his teeth, and plucketh them in peces with his pawes? It is not to attribute such a crueltie vnto God as is not cōueniēt for him: but to humble vs by cause wee bee dull, and knowe not what it is to feare God, or to stand in awe of the punishments which he sendeth vpon such as lift vp themselues against him. To the end then that wee may not be any more possessed with such dulnesse, the holy scripture setteth forth God in the likenesse of a lion that commeth vpon vs with his teeth and his pawes, to make vs vnderstād that when he intendeth to shewe himself contrarie vnto men, there is no terror aboute it nor comparable to it. Yee see then to what vse wee ought to apply the things that are sayd here, and that such warnings ought to serue vs afore hand. Also sometymes when we be in trouble and that God falleth so vpon vs: It behoueth vs to put the things in vre that are spoken of here, to the end we may knowe that we are not the first [which haue ben so delt withal. Yea and vndoubtedly it is a notable place where it is sayd ibat God consumeth all a mans fleshe, that he broofeth and breaketh, that he swalloweth vp, and that he killeth men. And why? to quicken them. And so although his anger be dreadful vnto vs when he visiteth vs with rigor, and that we be driuen to feele the things that are contained heere: yet notwithstanding he cheereth vs with the hope of saluatiō, which is the only meane to bring vs vnto life. VVherfore seing that our God, giueth vs hope, and that we be not the first that haue bia so delt withal, but that he hath handled his seruants after that sort in all tymes: let vs suffer our selues too be as it were swallowed vp of sorowe and to be set there as in a gulf. And truly wee see that Eliu following that which hath ben shewed in the foresayd song of Moyſes, speaketh not so without cause. Marke then how this sentence ought to serue vs to double vse. The first is, that when we be in rest, we must take tyme too bethink vs how dreadfull Gods wrath is, to the end we may walke in feare and carefulnesse nesse and submit our selues vnder his hand. And the second is that we must not be to much afrayde when God visiteth vs so roughly, knowing that he hath delt after the same sort towards those whose saluation he hath procured. Then let vs not thinke it straunge that he should deale so with vs, but let vs learne to fashion ourselues like vnto those, which haue wayted to be fully comforted at Gods hand after they had bin in heauinesse, yea euen after they had bin swallowed vp of sorowe. And therewithall let vs marke also the long continuance of our afflictions, whereof Eliu speketh here. For he sayeth not that Gods afflicting of a man in such wise as he shall seeme to be utterly forlorne, shall not be only for one brunt, and to releue him againe by and by after: No, but contrariwise when he layeth his hand vpon those whome he intendeth too afflict, he maketh it heuier and heuier, in somuch that if a poore creature be sore tormented to day, it shall be double to morowe, and afterward be so increased, as it shall seeme to haue nother end nor measure, and it shall continue so long, that he shall passe through a hundred deaths, before God shall seeme to releue him. So litle then shall we bee deliuered from our afflictions immediately when we haue felt them: that they must be increased more & more. For it is the good pleasure of God, that we should fight against many deaths. Truely this seemeth right hard vnto vs: howbeit let vs marke that a rough horse must haue a rough rider, and that forasmuch as wee be rough wood, it behoueth vs to haue hard wedges & hard strokes with a beetle. True, it is that we think not our selues to be rebels against God: but if we consider the thing as it is, without flattering of ourselues: we shall find that the nurishing of wilful stubbornesse in vs, is no smal nor common thing. Some chawe vpon the brydle in such wise against God, that although their afflictions increase, yet they ceasse not to gnashe their teeth still, and to play the wild beasts. And another sort pretend some token of humiilitie: but what for that? They bee so sickle, that too day or to morowe it is quite out of their heads. So long as a man is hild at a baye, he wil vndoubtedly say I haue offended my God, it behoueth mee to turne a newe leaf: and he will not only make countenance afore men thorough hypocritie that he is willing to amend: but he wil also think himself to bee utterly changed, and that there is no more any wicked affection in him. But what? if God deliuer him to morowe morning, he wil become worse than he was, or at least wise as bad. See in what plight we be. And therefore let vs not think it straunge that God should so increase his strypes. If he see that we cannot be woon, but that there is such a sturdinesse in vs as he must be faine to correct vs a long whyle, it behoueth him to worke more roughly. Like as when a disease is rooted, peradventure the diseased person will think himself to be rid of it, as soone as he hath taken but some sirup, our some pille, or hath bin let blood: I say it will seme vnto him that he is throughly whole: but the roote of the disease is not yet plucked vp, & therefore he must be faine to take some very harsh and bitter medicines, and bee kept to a diet, and abide vnder the Phisitians hand a moneth or twayne, yea or a whole yere. Euen after the same maner must God purge vs by diuerse remedies, and make it long ere he cure vs, by cause this vyce of pride is rooted ouerdeeply in vs, and is entred euen intoo the marree of our bones, so that all is infected, and there is no soundnesse in vs, but all is corrupted till God renewe it againe. Thus ye see why here is mention made of the long continuing of our afflictions til we can no more: yea and that God must be faine to vse diuerse remedies, not afflicting vs alwayes after one fashion, but sending vs some tymes one kind and sometymes another, which thing let vs assure ourselues that he doth not without great cause: for he taketh no pleasure in the tormenting of his poore creatures. VVe knowe it is his nature to make vs feele his goodnesse: howbeit in the meane whyle, forasmuch as he seeth that wee are not fit to receiue it: it is good reason that he should change, and after a sort transfigure himself, to the end to conforme himself vnto that which hee seeth fit for vs. And that is the cause why it is sayd that he chastizeth man with grief vpon his bed. VVhe Eliu speketh so, it is to shewe vs that if God punish vs in good earnest, there is nother release nor truce at all. For his meening is, that though we seeke rest we shall find none, if God bee our enimie, that is to say, if we take hold of his wrath. For when the scripture sayeth that God is our enimie, and is angrie with vs: it meeneth not that he is so in deede, but that he pretendeth to be so by cause we haue neede to be put in feare, that we may be sorie for our sinnes. So then let vs mark wel, that when a man is so tormented, he is forced to haue warre without end, and if he seke to haue rest, he shall find none. For the hand of God is to long: we shal not be able to scape from it, till wee be reconciled to him. This is the thing that ought to bee vnderstoode in this sentence. And if God giue vs any release, let vs assure ourselues that he beareth with our infirmitie & the same ought to serue to our singular confort. For although God examin vs roughly, and bring vs euē to the pits brimme: yet notwithstanding he giueth vs still some tast of his goodnesse with it, that wee may take breathe againe. It is sayd here that he hath not graunted this grace vnto all men, but that he persecuted some in such sort as they had no reit at all. And what meeneth he by saying so? He speketh not of the reprobats only, but of those whom he had chozen, and whose saluatiō he had procured and furthered by that meanes. So then let vs vnderstand, that when God suffereth vs not to be afflicted ouerfore, but giueth vs only some litle strypes: he hath a respect to our febleness, by cause he seeth we are too weake. Furthermore, when he sayth that a man forsaketh his meate, in somuch that he findeth no tast in pleasant meates, and would fayne be out of the world: It is to shewe vs that when we be touched with the feeling of Gods wrathe, and haue conceyued it too the quick: wee can find no tast in any thing. VVhat is it then that giueth vs tast of all the benefits that wee receyue at Gods hand in this world? It is his grace. True it is that the heathenish sort, as the despyfers of God which are saped in their sinnes, and are become utterly brutishe, and feele no more sting of grief: doo finde tast ynough in their pleasures: yea euen in their beastly pleasures: For they haue not yet conceyued the wrath of God. But as for those that feele God against them, they must needes mislike all things that are desirable of their owne nature, yea and utterly lothe them. And why? For they cannot take pleasure, euen to liue. Although this life bee full of much wretchednesse, and is as it were a Sea of all miseries: yet must we set store by it, by cause God hath set vs in it, and preferueth vs in it, to the intent we should knowe him to bee our Creator and father, according as indede the end why we were created, and why we be mainteyned in this transitorie life: is that we should know how it is God that interteyneth vs here, and that we should feele his fatherly goodnesse, in that it pleaseth him to haue a care of vs and to gouerne vs. So then our life ought to be deare vnto vs in that respect: and when he sheweth himself angry, our life must needes be bitter. For it is impossible that a man should not desire too bee fardon when he feeleth Lu. 23. e. 30. that: according as it is written that they shall say too the Apo. 6. d. 16 mounmountaynes,couer vs. Thus ye see to what point we are come. And therefore let vs learne to find tast, first of all, in the goodnesse of our God, to the end that the rest of his benefites may be pleasant vnto vs, and that we may finde fauor in them. I say let vs learne to tast the goodnesse of God: that is to say, let vs not be so giuē to worldly things, as that our cheef marke should not be to say, let vs seeke to obey our God, and to submit our selues quietly vnder his hand. Ye see then, what we must desire. Haue wee so doone? whensoever we inioy the benefites that he giueth vs, whether it be in eating and drincking, or in the rest of our life: let our reioycing be in such wise, as it may be wholly referred to the acknowledging of the fatherly goodnesse of our God, to say, behold God doeth well shewe the care which he hath of our welfare, seing he voutsafeth to feede our wretched bodies. Behold, they be but deade carcases, and yet God voutsafeth to nourish them. Ye see then that it behoueth vs to eate and drinke in such sort, as wee may thinke continually vpon the goodnesse of our God. Furthermore when all things be out of tast with vs, and that we be so ouerpressed with anguise as our very life is hatefull to vs: let vs consider from whence the same procedeth. And that is by cause God hath hidden his cōtenaunce from vs, & we feele no more his fatherly goodnesse which should make vs too find tast and fauor in all his benefites. So then if wee mourne and bee in perplexitie and anguise, let vs pray God to make vs feele his goodnesse which as yet is vknowne to vs. And when we feele that, let it serue vs not only to take breth by, and to set vs in rest: but also to restore vs in such wise, that whereas we were vterly dismayed afore, we may gather newe corage and come againe to the floure of our age, according as it is sayd here by and by after. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in mind. To be short, it is sayd that the flesh of a man shal waste away, so as it cannot bee sayd any more that he is aliue. Now if it be so that we must be brought as it were to nothing, and that God doth vterly disfigure vs: let vs looke to arme our selues with patience, and not enter into disputation, although we come to the sayd extremitie. And why? For it is sayd that God handleth his chozē after that sort. Here is no speaking of those whom he intendeth to ouerthrowe and destroye, but of those whom he hath ordeyned to saluation, which are in his hand, and whom he giueth. Euen those doeth he disfigure in such wise, as a man would take them to be vterly forlorne. Seing it is so, let vs pray him, that although we become like deade mē, yet he will kepe our life kēddē in his hād. And very needfull it is that he should do so. For although all men be not afflicted so roughly as Eliu speket of here, and that God vse not such rigor but where he listeth: yet notwithstanding generally it behoueth our life to be as it were a kind and shape of deathe as saint Paule sayeth. And as we see that in wynter tyme the trees haue nother floures nor leaues, nor any freshnesse in them, but their life is drawn into them. Euen so must our life be hidden in the hand of God. And when we haue done him the honour to put him in trust with it, we shall find in the end, that he hath ben a good and faithfull keeper of it. And therefore if it please him to bring vs to such an afterdeale for a time, as we shall perceiue no token of his fauor, but shall seeme to be quite alienated from him: let vs tary his lezure, and mourne till he giue vs againe the cherefulness that is spoken of here. Now after that Eliu hath treated of the afflictions which God sendeth to the faythfull, and shewed that they must first bee cast downe before God set them vp: he addeth that when God intenderh to make them feele his goodnesse & fauor, he vseth his word towards them. Here yee see the meane wherby God quickneth those which be as it were alienated from him: that is to wit, he sendeth the such a messenger as is hardly to be found amongs a thousand, and he shal bring him a message of righteousnesse: [that is to wit] he bringeth him word that God iustifieth the sinner, and receiuet & accepteth him into his fauor. Ye see then after what sort we be restored when we haue bin as good as dead. And here is a goodly and excellēt sentēce, to shew vs that when God sendeth vs tydings of his goodnesse, and that his promises are declared vnto vs: it is al one as if he reached vs his hand to drawe vs out of our graue. VVhat would we more? So then let vs marke well how it is sayd here, that a man shall gather new strength if he haue assurance of Gods goodnesse. And how so? For as I haue sayd already, our Lord hath giuen that propertie to his gospel, that by giuing eare to the promises that are conteyned in it, we take comfort in him, and are assured that he calleth vs to him. Truly this is hard for men to do: For of all the battels that wee haue to fight agaynst the temptations of our flesh, the greatest battel is agaynst vnbelief: and specially when we feele any of Gods chastisements, then be wee as it were in darknesse, insomuch that our sorowe dimmeth our eyes, and although Gods promises be set afore vs, yet notwithstanding we cannot apply the to our vse, but there seemeth always to be somewhat betwixt vs and them, and that they belong not to vs. Lo in what plight we be: and euery of vs ought to feele it by his owne experience. Vndoubtedly Satan commeth to intermedle himself in that case. True it is that we will not denie Gods promises: but wee will stand as it were in aammering and say, I heare well this promis, which is so goodly a one as it ought to cheere vp a whole world. But what for that? I linger still in vayne, by cause I perceyue not that the same ought to pertayne vnto mee. Somuch the more therefore ought we to marke well what is sayd here: namely that whē God sendeth vs a man which certifieth vs of his goodnes, it is al one as if he reached vs his hand and sayd vnto vs. Lo here I am, hitherto I haue afflicted you: and although the same hath bin with great rigor, yet haue I not done it as a iudge that intended to punish your misdeeds according as you deserued, but as a Phisition to heale you. True it is that you felt it not at the first, I was fayne to vse searing, corzyng, serching of the bones, and other very violent remedies: but in the meane whyle I procured your helth by it: and therefore consider you of this my goodnesse. Thus yee see that whensoever God giueth vs the holy scripture into our hand, and wee find there any promis of his mercy, or if he send vs a man that is able to warrant vs the forgiveness of our sinnes: it behoueth vs to cōclude thus: howsoever the world go, my God will pitie mee, and indede he sheweth it by sending me this record, and specially by this benefite, that the gospel is preached vnto vs. For wee knowe that the vse of preaching is to vnbind vs vpo the earth to the intent we should be vnbound in heauen. The chief end for which God will haue his word ministred vnto vs, is that forasmuch as we are hild prifoners vnder euerlasting damnation: those that are ordeyned to be ministers of Gods word, should vnbinde vs and release our sinnes, that is to say, warrant and beare witnesse vnto vs of it. VVe knowe it is the peculiar office of God to forgiue sinnes: It belongeth not to men: but our Lord Iesus Christ ment to expresse the power and workfulness that is in preaching, by saying that therethrough our sinnes are forgiuen vs, yea euen by mortall men. And that is the cause why saint Paule sayeth expressly that the message which is committed vnto vs is the message

of attonement or reconciliation. Then if we be in a Christiā church, and the gospell be preached there purely: let vs be sure that God hath committed the keeping of the keys of the heauenly kingdome, vnto the men that do so beare abroade his word. And to what purpose? To the end to open vs the gate of saluation. Let vs assure our selues that he hath giuen them authoritie to breake our bands according as it was foretold by the Prophet Esay, that Iesus Christ should be sent to preache deliuerance to poore prisoners. Hee hath not done this in his owne person only by accomplishing the sayd promis: but hee doeth it still also daily by his ministers. True it is that Iesus Christ is the partie that hath let vs looce from the bondage of sin and euerlasting damnation, wherein wee were by nature: But yet hath he committed the same charge to all shepherds of his church. Yee see then that the thing which wee haue to beare in mynd when Elin sheweth vs the meane wherby God restored those whom he had sent as it were vnto hell, and which were as good drowned: is that he sendeth them a messenger that is able to warrant them righteousnesse. And he speaketh purposely of ryghteousnesse, not bycause those which ought to comfort vs should vse flatteries to make vs beleue that wee be ryghteous, and preache vnto vs our owne vertues and merites: no: but the righteousnesse which he speaketh of here, is that God is made at one with vs. And how is that? Bycause he imputeth not our sinnes any more vnto vs. Then are wee righteous, not in our selues nor through our owne vertues, but bycause it pleaseth God to forgiue vs.

And it is a point which wee ought to marke well. For when the world seeketh ryghteousnesse, it is by bringing mennes owne deserts vnto God, and it imagineth that although they haue done amisse, yet they are able to make him some amends. Behold the common vse or rather abuse wherewith men deceyue themselves. For if they bee combered with any hartgrief, by feeling the vengeance of God, they fall to considering with themselves, How now? Haue I not liued well? Haue I not serued God as I ought to do? And though I haue committed some fault: is there not some meanes to recompence it withall? Yes: And I haue done this and that. Behold I say how men would euer put some barre in Gods waye, to the end he should haue no vantage of them. Thus seke they their righteousnesse in their owne merits. But when God intendeth to giue vs a ryghteousnesse wherby wee may stand before him, he vseth a contrarie kind of speche, which is: that he admitteth vs and accepteth vs for ryghteous, by couering our sinnes. VVheron then shall our ryghteousnesse rest? On the free mercy of our God, bycause that when he hath once scoured away our spotts with the blood of his sonne, and discharged vs from death and damnation by the raunsome which our Lord Iesus Christ paid vpon the crosse, he wypeth out our sinnes, and layeth not our offences to our charge. Thus the ryghteousnesse which is preached vnto vs by Gods messengers, is that we be iustified or accepted for ryghteous.

And it is not without cause that the holy scripture vseth continually the word iustifie. It might well be sayd that wee find fauour or grace when God pardoneth vs, according also as it is often sayd so: but the holy Ghost thought it not ynough to vse such words. And why? For so long as wee bee sinners, God must needs hate vs: wee knowe that he is the wellspring of ryghteousnesse, and there is no agreement betweene him and vnryghteousnesse. Therefore so long as we be sinners, wee be lothly in Gods sight, and he must needs reiect vs: and (to be short) we haue no enteraunce vnto God, til wee be iust and righteous. Now then, how become we righteous? It is bycause God regardeth not our sinnes, but burieth them and hydeth them, and clenseth vs from them. So then our sinnes are wiped out in the death and passion of our Lord Iesus Christ, insomuch that we be taken for ryghteous, and God findeth no more fault with vs, whē he accepteth vs after that sort for his sonnes sake. This is the ryghteousnesse that is spoken of in this strayne. Furthermore, wheras it is sayd expressly, that the messenger which recomforteth vs, is one among a thousand: It is to make vs set the more store by the benefite, wherof wee sildome make accout: that is to wit, of the meane of our attonement or reconciliation. Then is it declared, that the same is no base nor common thing. It cannot at all tymes be stumbled vpon that we should haue a man sent of God to warrant our saluation, or to be the meane of our attonement with him: and therefore it is no such thing that we should cast it vnder our feete. And that is the cause, why the Prophet Esay sayeth: how beautiful are the feete of them that bring glad tydings of peace? Now by the feete the Prophet meeneth their comming and presence, as if he should say, if the world knewe what a benefite it is when God declareth his mercy vnto it, it would loue and esteeme those that preache the gospell, and it would acknowledge that God hath committed such a treasure vnto them, as surmounteth all the goods that wee can wish. Sainct Paule also alledging the same text, applieth it to shewe that the preaching of the gospell is a singular gift of God. Then let vs not thinke that the same commeth of men: but let vs be fully assured and resolued, that God seeketh vs when his gospell is preached vnto vs. God must be the builder therof, such goodnesse must procede from him: and therefore if wee father it vpon men, it is to great vnkindenesse. VVherfore let vs beware that wee deface not the goodnesse of God: and when the church is in such order that we haue preaching and all other things: let vs assure our selues, that it is all one, as if God came to seeke vs, to bring vs to saluation.

And therewithall let vs knowe, that he graunteth not that grace and priuiledge to all men. In good sooth there are countreyes which we esteeme, and also (to the world warde) are to be more esteemed than we: which yet notwithstanding haue not the message of saluation. Let a mā go through the whole world, let him serch all nacions, yea euen those which haue bin most excellent in times past, let them go seke in Greece where all sciences of the world were inclosed, as it seemed: let him go into Italie, into Fraunce which now is in some estimation, or let him go into Spaine: And what shall he find, but vtter desolation? For there, not only those which ought to be the messengers of saluation are vtterly dumme, but (which worse is) yee shall heare mastie dogges barking out blasphemies against God, and yee shall see wretched soules led to destruction, and the diuell hunting euery where after his pray. For vndoubtedly looke how manye preachers go vp into their pulpits, so many dogges are there too hunt and ferche in the game, and to bring it into Satans toyles, that the wretched soules may go too damnation. But here wee haue Gods promises preached vnto vs, to leade vs to saluation. Therefore wee see it is not without cause sayd, that a faythfull messenger of Gods grace, is an odde man among a thousand, and so rare a benefite, as wee ought too esteeme highly. Howbeit this is not sayd too make vs esteeme the persons, but to make vs too receiue the benefite which is ministered vnto vs by them with the greater reuerence, that that isto say to make vs receiue the grace of God, forso-muchas it pleaseth him to draw vs to him, and to iustifie vs of his fatherly loue, shewing vs that although we bee wretched and miserable, and that there bee nothing in vs but death and damnacion, yet he will not leaue vs there, but deliuer vs by the meane of our Lord Iesus Christ.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, praying him so to make vs feele our faults, as wee may mortifie all our lusts more and more, and bee with-drawne from the corruptiōs of this world, and from our selues, to seke vnto him: and that forasmuch as in this mortal life we be subiect to much wretchednesse and misery: It may please him to reache vs his hand from aboue to deliuer vs from them, after he hath once taken vs from the gulf of death. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only too vs, but also to all people and nations &c.

The cxxvj. Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the xxxiiij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the xxiiij. xxxiiij. xxxv. verses, and then vpon that which is added here.

29. He shal pray God, and appease him, and behold his face in triumphe, and a mannes righte-ousnesse shal be restored vnto him.

WE sawe yesterday that whē God af-flicteth vs, he procureth our saluation by that meanes, although it seeme not so to vs. True it is that the wicked shall bee afflicted too: howbeeit it doeth but make them hardelaited and chafe against god: and so litle fare they the better by their affliction, that it doth the more bewray their wickednesse, and bring thē to the full measure of it. But when God afflicteth his chozen, he ouermaylreth and mortifieth them in such wise, as they tremble before his maiestie, and become vtterly dismayed and like men half dead, insomuch that there is no more hope of life in them in respect of themselues and to the worldward: and finally, there remaineth nothing for them but that God should haue pitie of thē.
And Eliu setteth out the meane wherby God maketh his chastizements auaylable towards the faythfull: that is to wit, by comforting them through his goodnesse, and by telling them that he is redie to forgiue their sinnes. For although afflictions be for our profit, and serue vs for medicines and salues, as was shewed yesterday: yet notwithstanding it appereth not so, but by the end. Now the end is shewed vs here: which is that God reacheth vs his hād, assuring vs that he will be mercifull to vs howsoeuer the world go, notwithstanding that he haue handled vs roughly. Then let vs marke wel, that the life of our soules constisteth in the woord of God, wherby he giueth vs assurance of his mercie and goodnesse towards vs. And to the intent we should esteeme his benefite as it deserueth: it is sayd that he which is the warranter of the remisison of our sinnes, is as an odde man among a thousand, so as he is not to be found at aduventure, but is a treasure which God re-serueth to those whom he thinketh good. Besides this, I haue told you that God in promising men the forgiuenesse of their sinnes, giueth charge and commissiō too the ministers of his word, to drawe them from death, according as it is expressly said, that the keyes of the kingdome of heauen are committed to those with preach the gospel. Too what end? To forgiue sinnes: not of their owne authoritie, but to the intent that the wretched sinners may be the better assured of their saluation, and not doute but God receiue them to mercie. Therefore the ministers tell them in his name, that they be quit before his iudgement seate. And this is the cause why it is ex-pressely sayd, that God will haue mercy of a man when he sendeth him a good and faithfull teacher, and giueth his appointed ministers the sayd charge and office of rescuing and deliuering the wretched creature that was in 20 way of damnation. Howbeit too the end that all these things may bee the better vnderstood: here are three points to be marked. The one is that Eliu sheweth vs the cause and foundation of the forgiuenesse of our sinnes: namely that God is mercifull vnto vs, and of his infinite goodnes will not haue vs to perish. That is one point. The second is, that the office of such as preache the gospel, is to drawe wretched soules out of death, and to set them at libertie. And the third is, that the same is not done, but by expresse commissiō giuen of God: according also as it belongeth not to a mortall man too take vpon him so hygh a thing, which is aboue our abilitie. Then as touching the first point, we see that the holy ghost bringeth vs here to the wellspring of the grace which wee obteyne of God. VVhē he forgiueth vs our sinnes, why is it? Not for that we are worthy of it: not for that we are able too bee before hand with him: not for that we bring any thing that ought to procure his fauour towards vs: but bycaue he looketh vpon vs with mercy. To be short, the holy ghost fathereth the remisison of our sinnes vpon the only free goodnesse of God, for wee be so wretched as there is nothing but damnation in vs. Behold, it pleaseth God to succour vs, and he doeth it not for any thing that he findeth in vs, saue only infinite miseries: but of his owne goodnesse which moueth him therunto. This then is a point which we ought to marke well, to the end that when we come to obteyne forgiuenesse at Gods hand, we may not imagin to appeaze him with our owne merits, nor to be particaufers of the remisison of our sinnes: but looke vpon that which is told vs here: that is to wit, that when God will haue pitie of vs, he receiue vs to mercie out of hand. And so Eliu ment to aduertize vs, that God doeth not alwayes make vs to feele that goodnesse: but that although he loue vs, and bee minded to prouide for the things which he knoweth to be profitable for vs, yet doeth he not alwayes giue vs that feeling, but hydeth it vtterly from vs: as when God afflicteth vs, it is sayd that he turneth his back to vs, or else that he voutsafeth not to looke vpon vs, ore else that his countenance is louring towards vs, and that wee be not able to behold it. Then let vs marke well, that the faythfull shal now and then be dismayed, and seke God, and not be able to find him: not that he hath forgotten them, or reiected them, but bycaue he will not as then make them to feele his loue. And that is the cause why Eliu sayeth expressely that God is mercifull to vs when he sendeth vs witnesse of the forgiuenesse of our sinnes by his word: not that he was not so before, but bycaue wee are then sure of it by experience, and do as it were take possession of his

of his goodnes which was vnknowne vnto vs for a time.

The second point was, that the office of such as preache Iob. 20. e. 23 the gospel, is to forgiue sinnes. And it is a notable point : For without that, we were vterly forlorne : and past recouery. There is none other meane to giue vs hope of sal-uation, than by assuring vs that our sinnes are forgiuen afore God, and wee quite and cleane discharged : For (as it hath bene sayd) that is the ryghteousnesse wherby we are acceptable vnto him. So long as our sinnes are imputed vnto vs, God must needs hate vs : and what else is the being of Gods wrath vpon vs, but a bottomlesse gulf of all cursednesse ? Againe, when wee be reconcyled vnto him, the gate of paradise is opened vnto vs, he ac-knowledgeth vs for his children, and the heritage of heauen is already prepared for vs. And how may that be obteyned ? By hauing good and faithfull teachers too preache the gospell vnto vs. For the end wherat God ameth, is attonement or reconciliation with vs, according 1. Co. 5. d. 18 as Sainct Paule declareth, where he expresseth that the proprietie of the gospell is, to be a message of attonement betweene God and man : which is, that Iesus Christ who knewe no sinne, but was the vnspotted lambe, did put himself vnder the curse of our sinnes, to the end that wee should finde the ryghteousnesse of God in him, that is to say, after wee are washed in his blood, and haue put ourselues vnder the sacrifice which he hath offered, wee bee taken and reputed for righteous, bycause the sayd sacrifice had the power to put away all faults and offences. Lo what it behoueth vs to marke in this place. Therefore whensoever we reade the holy scripture, or come too a sermon, when any promis of Gods goodnesse is set afore vs : let vs assure our selues that then God warranteth his loue towards vs, to the end we should be deliuered from death wherin we were plunged. And although wee heare but a mortall mā, and that his voice be but a sound which disperseth and vanisheth in the aire : yet must we beleue, that God will worke in such wise by his power, that the sayd doctrine shall bee sufficient to deliuer vs from the damnation wherin we are, and from the bondage of sin, so as we shall passe out of the bonds of Satan, and bee set clere before God, and this saying (namely whatsoever you lose in earth shall be losed also in heauē) cannot fayle vs. And so wee see of what importaunce this word is where it is sayd deliuer the sinner or set the sinner free: For when God giueth expresse charge to such as speke vnto vs, to drawe vs out of the gulf of death, that wee myght enter into paradise, it is all one as if his voyce sounded from heuen. And in very dede sainct Iames speaking of priuate persons, sayth that he which warneth his brother, shal saue a soule that was lost. If this take place in al those that bring men into the good way when they were out of it : what shall it do seing wee haue the speciall seale which our Lord Iesus Christ hath giuen to his word, at such tyme as the same is preached to vs by the shepherds of his churche : that is to wit, that their office is to release and forgiue sinnes, (as I haue alledged already out of Sainct Iohn.) and to bynd and vnbynd (as I haue alledged out of sainct Mathewe.) To be short, we see what the power of the gospell is, when wee receyue the promises of it by faith: namely that it is as much as if god shuld reache vs his hand from heauē, to pull vs out of the dungeons of death. And herewithall let vs marke for the third point, that this is not done, but by Gods ordinance : and it serueth for a difference betweene the gospell, and the blasphemies of the Pope. For the Pope vpholdeth, that he & his Chaplens haue the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, and the office of forgiuing. But what commission can they shewe for it ? For they tye the forgiuenesse of sinnes to shrift. And where did God euer tell men, that it behoueth men to shriue them of all their secrets in the care of a mortall man, to obteyne mercie ?

 God declareth, that if the sinner sighe for his sinnes, he will be mercifull to him. But behold a mortall creature presumeth to make a lawe, and to shet men out of Paradyse if they obserue it not. Is not that a notorious vsur-ping of Gods power ? Besides this, the Pope hath his Bulles, indulgences, pardons, and such other things, too ground the forgiuenesse of sinnes vpon : and therewith-all he minglet the blood of martyres, as he that meeneth expressely to deface the vertue of the death and passion of our Lord Iesus Christ. And yet notwithstanding, in the meane whyle he hath no promis of the gospell, he hath nothing but toyes, ceremonies, force-ries, greate crosses vpon the backe, and such other trash which in conclusion are nothing but Satans gewgawes.
 But contrariwise it is sayd, that there can be no forgiuenesse of sinnes without Gods message, that is too say without preaching and doctryne. VVhen the Pope for-giueth sinnes, he is dumme, he bringeth not one iote of Gods word, nother hath he any thing but charmes and forceries as is sayd afore. Moreover he layeth tyrannous lawes vpon mennes necks, to ouerthrowe the meane which our Lord hath ordeyned: again he abridgeth God himself of his libertie, and there is no let in him to disa-point God that he should not receyue sinners to mercye.
 Ye see then that the popes churche is the diuels syna-goge, destitute of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, and consequently damned, so long as it holdeth it self to the traditions of Antechrist : For it is imposible that it should be reconciled vnto God. But on the contrary parte, wee say that mennes sinnes are forgiuen them by receyuing the message of the gospell, and that the same hath not to do with the ceremonies that men haue deuised, nor with the lawes which they haue inuented at their owne pleasure, but only that we must followe the order and rule which our Lord Iesus hath stablished, who hath the remi-sion of sinnes in his hand. He hath giuen vs a meane wherby he will haue it done : which is, the preaching of his gospell, and the receyuing of it with assured fayth.
 Therefore if we sticke to that simplicitie, we may be sure that the comission commeth from aboue, and that men take not ne vsurpe not any thing vpon them of their owne brayne. Thus ye see what we haue to marke vpon the word where it is sayd, that God will pitie him and de-liuer him. Then must euery whit of it come from aboue, and none but God only must worke in this behalf by his free goodnesse, according also as he himself protesteth by his Prophet Esay saying, I am hee, I my self am he which wipeth out thine iniquities O Israell. Then must such a benefite needs procede from him : For it is not in any creature to giue it vnto vs. Now wee see what substace there is in this text, so it be wel vnderstood. And immediatly after it is sayd, to the end that his soule should not enter into the pit. VVee haue seene already heretofore, that the wretched sinners are neere to the graue, and that they are as good as dede and consumed, so long as God pursueth them with rigor. But now Eliu addeth, that God preuenteth that mischeef by sending the said message of the release of our sinnes, so as wee fall not into the graue, that is to say, we perishe not. For the case here standeth not only vpon temporall death, but vpon damnation : wherin we should be vterly ouerwhelmed if God did not preuent it, and pr. serue vs of his infinite goodnesse. The let vs marke, that whyle we be afflicted, wee be couered with the darknesse of death, and it seemeth to vs that there is no getting out of it : but yet notwithstanding, euen in that time God so stayneth vs as it were in couert: and although wee perceyue not that wee rest vpon him, yet notwithstanding he sheweth vs that fauour. For without our knowledge, it behoueth God to worke in that behalf, although wee cannot conceyue it. And vndoubtedly when wee begin to take hold of his goodnesse by fayth, we must not lay the first point of our saluation there: but wee must moue vp hygher: namely that he choze vs before wee were borne, and that frō thenceforth he continueth his goodnesse alwayes towards vs. So then let vs marke, that God of his owne goodnesse choze vs after a secret maner incomprehensible to our naturall vnderstanding. Agayne when it pleaseth him to manifest his goodnesse vnto vs, (which thing he doeth when his gospel is preached vnto vs) he sheweth vs that he is willing to haue vs deliuered from the graue. Therefore we perceiue our deliuerance and saluation when we tast of the promises of his gospel: not that it is done throughly at the first, but God giueth vs some small taste of it, confirming the same more and more in vs, vntill we see the gate of Paradise wyde open, and that we be deliuered frō the graue. Lo what we haue to marke vpon this saying. Furthermore when Eliu sayeth that God hath found reconciliation: let vs marke that he intendeth here to expresse yet better, the thing that he touched euen now. VVhich is, that we must father the attonement which God maketh with vs, vpon Gods owne free goodnesse, and that it is hee which worketh, yea euen before we could haue any thought or mynd to come vnto him. For he must be fayne to seeke vs when we be gone astray and haue forgotten him, according to the saying of the Prophet Esay. True it is that we are often commaunded to seke God, and to turne vnto him when we haue offended. But what for that? It canot be done except he teach vs inwardly and touche vs so to the quicke, as we may be inforced to mislike of our sinnes. Agayne who is he that giueth vs any hope, or that causeth vs to runne vnto God for refuge? Is it not he himself, by inlyghtening vs with faith? So then it is not without cause that Eliu addeth, that God found reconciliation. And why? For when he afflicteth vs, he prepareth vs aforhand to receyue the grace that he intendeth to giue vs. For so long as we be puffed vp with pryde, Gods goodnesse hath no entrance into vs: So long as we be hardened in our sinnes, we beate back the sayd grace a greate way from vs: And so long as we be saped in our fithinesse, surely we cannot tast of the reconciliation which is made by our Lord Iesus Christ. Therefore God must be fayne to worke here, & the work must be altogether his. And how worketh hee? First by bringing vs to the knowledge of our sinnes by the hart-byting which he giueth vs, according as it hath bin sayd hertofore, that he sendeth vs inward feare, as if he sounded a trumpet to summon vs to his iudgement. Ye see the that God calleth vs home to him by secret inspirations, when he seeth vs gone astray and distraught. And besides this, he appointeth men to warne vs, and to reprove vs. And surely that is another greate benefite, when we haue good and faythfull teachers that shewe vs our sinnes to the quicke, and threaten vs with euerslasting damnation. Furthermore if this suffize not, (as we see that wee are dull vpon the spur, and God had neede to kick & prick vs more roughly) he addeth the corrections of his hand, and afflicteth vs. And here ye see how wee must profit ourselues by corrections, to the end we be not like stiches to beate back the strokes. Neuertheless it is only Gods working, who to bring that to passe, giueth vs harts of flesh, and softneth the hardnesse that is in our cursed nature. VVell the, hath God made his corrections to take place. Then is it hyghe tyme for him to manifest his mercye vnto vs, and to make vs to tast it. So then we see well that it is he which findeth reconciliation, and that we on our side can do nothing afor hand, but rather wee still drawe back from him. VVhen God teacheth vs, in what plyght wee are? And if he let vs alone, are wee not as it were drunken in our lustes without thinking vpon him at all? And although he send vs good warnings, and that we be conuicted of our euill: yet notwithstanding we labour still to burie it, to the intent it should not bee seene at all. Other some grind their teethe and chafe when God sheweth them their sinnes, and they can so litle abyde it, as they do nothing else but byte and kick. Other some become as it were vtterly senselesse, and there is such a dullnesse in them, as there followeth no amendment for all that euer a man can say: and therefore it behoueth God to worke in that behalf. And againe when hee shall haue afflicted vs to the vttermoste, yet shall there not be a ryght obedientnesse in vs: yea and when we be euen confounded, we shall be still like wretched mad men, according as we see it happened to Cayn and Iudas. Lo in what plyght wee should bee if God wrought not in vs, And therefore if wee haue not this message of saluation, what shall become of vs? Although wee were throughly tamed, and did nothing else but sighe and grone: yet notwithstanding al would turne but to despaire in vs. So the, it behoueth vs that the acceptable tyme come vnto vs, according as it is sayd in another place of Esay, behold the acceptable tyme, behold the dayes of saluation. And why doeth he terme the time of saluation an acceptable time? Because God hath choze it of his owne mere goodnesse. And that is the cause also why it is said in another place of Esay, Comfort ye, Comfort yee my people, shall the Lord say. Thus is it his doing to comfort vs in our afflictions, or else we should be swallowed vp with sorowe. And therefore he addeth, that he repenteth him at the hart, that he had scourged his people, and telleth them that the tyme of comfort is come. Herin we see a more certayne declaration of the thing which is touched briefly here, which is, that it is Gods peculiar office to find reconciliation. Neuertheless Gods wil is to do it by his ministers. And so, as oft as the promises of the gospel are offered vnto vs, wherein God calleth vs to him, and sheweth himselfe fauorable for our Lord Iesus Christs sake, giuing vs the grace to tast of that goodnesse, and assuring vs that he is ready to receyue vs to mercye: let vs assure ourselues that then is the conuenient time which he hath appointed for our saluation: Then let vs humble ourselues, and be sure that we haue not preuented him, but that he hath sought vs. And therewithall let not vs be behind hand vpon such occasion. According as saint Paule in alledging the said text of Esay which I haue touched, sheweth vs that we must bee ready to come when our Lord calleth vs, and that wee must not driue off from day to day when reconciliation is found out and offered vnto vs. And here vpo Eliu concludeth, that a man being so comforted by the message that God sendeth him, becomes as a yong agayne and is restored, and his flesh becomes as fresh as a yong chyldes. VVherin he sheweth the true meane of confortyng vs. VVhich is not to forget God, and to seeke fond vanities to sette our selues withall: but to bee certified of Gods goodnesse. And it is an article which we ought to marke well. VVee see after what sort men labour too comfort themselves: namely, by forgetting God: For it seemeth to them to be a melancholik matter to think vpon him. And in good sooth, how many are there which will say stoutly ynough, that they be Christians, and yet notwithstanding when they intend to be to be mery, they dryue away althought of God and of eternall life: and not only so, but also offend God of set purpose. And why? For they cannot be mery, but in doing euill. Seing then that the nature of men is such, and that we be atteynted with that disease: let vs looke well to our selues, and be sure that our mirth shall not be blisfed from aboue, except we be assured of the remisſion of our finnes. Therefore if we haue Gods fauour so as we can call vpon him, as Eliu will by and by adde: therein consisteth our true gladnesse which is allowed of God, & is lasting, and will bring vs to saluatiō. But so long as we know not in what cace we are with our good God, ne seeke to be reconcyled vnto him, but lie rouring stil in our own filthinesse: the more we desire to be mery, the more wee kindle Gods vengeance against vs, the more we increase still the fire of his wrath, and wee plunge our selues the deeper into the bottomlesse pitts. Yee see then how it is more than needfull that it shold be shewed vs how much it lieth vs in hand to be wel assured of Gods mercifullnesse towards vs. And that also is the cause why the holy scripture (when it treateth of giuing ioy and comfort vnto vs, doeth alwayes set before vs the fauour of God, saying: Behold, your God is mercifull to you, and therefore be glad. Behold, your redeemer seketh to ioyne you and knit you to God his father, and therefore be ye glad, he ye quiet, and be yee at rest in your consciences. Herby wee are admonished that we must needs be in trouble and vquietnesse, so long as we knowe not in what cace we be with God. True it is that the wicked will seke meanes ynough to make them selues mery: and in good fayth, they ruffle it out (as you see) in despizing God: but howsoeuer the world go, yet doeth God send them such prickings and torments of mynd, as they be sore distressed, and if they daunce, it is after the fashion that is spokē of in Moyses: namely, that yet neuerthelesse sin is at their dore, and there wayteth for them like a dog that wayteth for his maister. Ye see then that the wicked may ruffle it out, but yet can they not go out of their dores without gnawing of their conscience, and God must stil hold them at that bay. Therefore somuch the more ought wee to think vpon this doctrine, that is to wit, that wee turne not our backe vnto God, ne bury not our finnes whē we would haue peace: but that we alwayes haue some promise of God to comfort vs. And when wee see that God allureth vs to saluation, let vs be glad of that: For the shall our gladnesse be blessed. And if wee haue the taste that God is our father, it will sanctifie all our ioyes: but without that, we must needs quayle, and there is no way for vs to reioyce. Marke that for one point. And for the second, we haue also to marke, that the only grace of God ought to suffice vs though we haue neuer so many sorowes mingled with it, according as God will exercise vs. For he will not send vs full ioye, so as we myght laugh with open mouth as they say. Yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs to be contented with this certeyntie that wee haue him to our father, and that we shall find mercy with him. Then if we haue this priuiledge of abilitie to call vpon our God, and can assure our selues that the gate is open to vs, and that we shall haue good accesse vnto him in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ: I say, if we can haue that boldnesse (not through our owne rashnesse, but for that he hath vnto us opened his holy mouth to witness his loue vnto vs (which thing he doeth when his gospel is published) let vs assure our selues that we must rest wholly therevpon, and though we haue neuer so many sorowes and incombraunces. Yea and it behoueth vs to passe further, and to surmount them all, and to reioyce in our miseries and tribulations: seing that Gods loue is printed in our harts by his holy spirit: that is to wit, seing that God vnto us saith to be our father and sauour, and hath shewed the same not only by his word, but also in very dede in the person of his only Sonne whom he hath not spared but giuen too the death for vs. Thus yee see what we haue to marke where it is sayd that a man shall gather new strength, and be restored againe, and that his flesh shall become as fresh as a yong childs. For it serueth to shewe, that although wee feele many miseries in this world (as it is certayne that we must haue many aduersities in passing through this transitory life:) yet notwithstanding we shall not cease to haue a ioye that shall ouercome and get the victory of all things, if our Lord comfort vs in his goodnesse. And this is it which Sainct Paule meeneth when he sayeth, that the peace which passeth all mans vnderstanding shall get the vpper hand in our harts. VVhen he speaketh of this peace of God, he meeneth the gladnesse which is giue vs through the remisſion of our finnes. And further he sayeth, that the same peace passeth all mans vnderstanding. And afterward he addeth, that the same getteth the vpper hand or victory in our harts. His meening is that whyle we liue in this world, we shall haue many troubles and griefes, yea and be in danger of death at euery blowe: and yet notwithstanding, that the sayd peace of God getteth the vpper hand, and maketh vs conquerers in fighting. And vndoubtedly syth wee see that our Lord enlighteneth vs: it ought to suffice vs, according as it is said in the fourth Psalme, that at the welth of the world cannot make them so glad which are fleshly, and desire these worldly things making sporte & mirth when they fare well, so as they haue good store to eate and drink. True it is that you shall see them very mery: howbeit if God make his countenance to shyne vpon vs, our ioye must needs surmount all the things that the worldlings are wont to desire. Now when Eliu hath spoken so he addeth immediatly that a man shall pray vnto God and appease him, or finde him fauorable. Behold here yet one point more which importeth very much: For without this calling vpon the name of God, we know not rightly the frute of the ioy that is spoken of here. For wherin consisteth all our welfare? Euen in that wee may boldly come vnto God, and haue leaue to rest as it were in his lappe when wee be afflicted, so as wee knowe that he will be mercifull to vs as he hath promised. This (say I) is the souereyne welfare of men, so long as they liue in this world. For vndoubtedly prayer is the thing wherby we come vnto god. It behoueth vs to walke here by faith, and God is absent from vs as in respecte of eyesight. And although he dwell in vs by his power, and make vs to fele his grace: yet notwithstanding we be as it were separated from him, to outward appearaunce. Neuerthelesse, by prayer we mount vp into heauen, and present ourselues before his maiestie, and (to be short) are ioyned vnto him. Ye see then that here is a band of familiaritie betweene God and men, in this libertie which he giueth vs to call vpon him. But yet can we not pray vnto him as we ought to do, except we knowe his goodnesse, according as it is sayd in the fifth Psalme, Lord I will worship in thy temple, euen vpon the multitude of thy mercies. Vntill such time as our God hath certified vs that he is our father, it is not possible for vs to dare come vnto him: our mouth is shet, and our hart is locked vp, and to be short, wee are vtterly excluded from the priuiledge of calling vpon him. And that is the cause why it is sayd that the holy ghost sealeth our adoption, to the end wee may crye Abba father, wherby we are sure that he wil hear vs. And in another place sainct Paule sayeth, that by Iesus Christ wee haue beleefe in God, and this beleefe in goddeth trust, to the end wee may come boldly before the throne of God to pray vnto him. Ye see then how it is shewed vs here, that when a man is so comforted by the promises of the gospel, by and by he calleth vpon God, & findeth fauour at his hand. And so let vs marke first of all, that all the prayers which men make without the tast of Gods goodnesse, are but dissimulation, yea and starke abomination.

True it is that wee cannot be so sure of it as were requisite, and although we pray vnto God, yet haue wee not a perfect faith: but yet if we haue not this full purpose in vs to go vnto God as to our father, because he calleth vs and we be grounded vpon his promises, we do but dishonour his name with our praying, and all our prayers shal be turned vnto sinne. And hereby a man may see how cursed and wretched the state of the Papists is: And wee ought well to thinke vpon it, to the end we may bee sory for their destruction, and magnifie Gods goodnesse so much the more, in that it hath pleased him to draw vs out of such a dungeon. The Papists thinke they pray to God deuoutly ynough: yea, but in the meane while they hold this for a principle, that a man must alwayes doubt of Gods fauour: yea and they haue no tast at all of Gods promises, but go to it at all aduerture. And that is the cause why they make so many windlasses, seke so many patrones and aduocates, and deuise so many meanes to go vnto God. For they do him not the honour to submit themselues to his word, and to trust fully to it. So then ye see that the Papistes are alwayes in doubt, yea and they will needes be in doubt: by meanes whereof they are so farre off from the priuiledge of calling vpon God to be herd at his hand, that they are rather continually beaten backe. For as sainct Iames sayeth, if a man come doubting too require any thing of God, he must neuer thinke to obteyne ought. And why? For our prayers must be grounded vpon Gods word. And therfore wee see, that it is not without cause that Eliu sayeth here, that the man which is so comforted will pray vnto God. But now let vs marke that we can neuer be disposed to pray, vntill we knowe that God calleth vs. There is one generall reason which it behoueth vs to hold, according to that which is sayd in the Prophet I will say, you are my people, and you shall answer mee: thou art our God. God must begin and thunder vnto vs if we will be sure of our saluation: there shall be no good melody, except God haue first thundered into vs, that is to say except he haue giuen vs boldnesse by his promis to answer vnto him as to our God. And therefore as oft as we pray, let vs begin at the promises which are conteyned in the holy scripture, and consider that God calleth vs to him, that he promiseth to heare vs, and that we may boldly go vnto him. Yea, but yet let vs not ceasse in the meane while to walke in feare, but let vs consider that we come to present our selues before the maiestie of our God: let that (say I) leade vs to humilitie and reuerence, according as it is sayd in the text which I haue alledged out of the fiftie Psalm, namely, Lord I will enter into thy temple and worship in feare. So then let vs consider the maiestie of God, that wee may bee afrayde and floupe and submit ourselues with all lowlinesse: and yet notwithstanding let vs not cease to take courage continually, and to become bold. And why? Because it hath pleased our good God too call vs vnto him, and too promise vs that our comming too him shall not bee in vayne. Yee see then how wee haue too marke, that although wee haue conceiued an assurednesse of Gods good will, and do fully beleue that he will receyue vs: Yet notwithstanding wee must not ceasse too humble our selues too him with all lowlinesse, knowing that wee shall alwayes find him a pitifull and mercifull father towards vs, if in seeking him wee hold the ryght may as he sheweth it vs.

2. 2. 23.

Ps. 5. 8.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so to put them away, as wee may not doubt, but that he will accept vs as ryghteous for our Lord Iesus Christes sake: and to graunte vs the grace that our comming to present ourselues vnto him, may be, not only to be discharged of the burthen of our sinnes, but also to be so clenfed, as he may dwell in vs, and so gouerne vs by his holy spirit, that wee may walke in all obedience too his lawe and to his holy commaundements which he hath giuen vs. And so let vs say, Almighty God our heavenly father, we acknowledge and confesse according too the truthe, that wee bee not woorthye too lyfte vp our eyes too heauen, too present our selues before thee, nor too presume so farre as that our prayers should be, &c.

The cxxvij. Sermon, which is the sixth vpon the xxxiiij. Chapter.

26. He shall pray vnto God vvhich shall be fauorable to him: he shall see his face vwith ioy, and he vvil render (or returne) a man his righteousnesse.
27. He vvil looke too wards men, and say, I haue sinned: I haue turned avway from goodnesse, and it hath not profited mee.
28. He hath redeemed my soule, to the end it should not go doovne into the graue: and my life to the end it should see light.

According to that which was declared yesterday, here Eliu sheweth vs that when men are reconciled vnto God, they may call vpon him with a quiet and stedfast conscience. And it is the true siute of faith to haue such a quietnesse as we may be sure that God loueth vs, and flee to him for refuge. For without that, wee were in cursed case. And vndoubtedly although we had all the goods of the world, we should not be sure to inioy them one minute of an howre, except

God maynteyned vs in the possession of them. Moreover let vs put the case that a man myght continue in ease and pleasure all the tyme of his lyfe. Yet should all Gods benefites turne to his destruction and damnation, vnlesse hee vsed them purely, and were sure of the sayd fatherly loue of God. VVee see then that if wee cannot call vpon God with such certainty that he will heare vs, and accept our prayers: it is pitie of our life. So much the more then behoueth it vs, to marke well the order, that is shewed here by the holy ghost: which is, that when God shall haue certified vs of his

goodnesse towards vs, we knowing that therein he will be fauorable to vs, & pardon our sinnes, may seeke vnto him and boldly present our selues before him. And that is the cause why it is added in the text, that God will shew him his face, and that his righteousnesse shall retorne vnto him by that meane: or else that a man shall see the face of God. But wee must not greatly stand vpon the words, seeing that the meening is euident. Therefore it is all one as if it were sayd, that so long as men are accused in their owne conscience, they cannot think vpon God but with al terrour, so as they could find in their harts neuer to perceiue any thing of him, nor that any man shuld speake to them of him, nor that they might haue any inckling of him. And out of doubt we see that so long as sinners are asleepe in their euill, they desire nothing so much as to forget God. And if any mention be made of him: it is an intollerable torment to them, as if an offender were brought before his iudge. Yec see that as long as wretched creatures are buried in their sinnes, they cannot thinke vpon God but to their greate greef. But when we haue assurance of the forgiuenesse of our sinnes: then we come boldly to God, we are glad to think vpon him, wee are willing to heare of him, yea and it reioycest vs to behold his face. And this is it which Sainct Paule meeneth by saying, that we finde peace to Godward when we be iustified by fayth. Also by that saying he meeneth that the wicked haue no rest, but when they be fallen asleepe, or rather dulle in such wise, as they thinke not vpon God. Thus yee see how the heathenish sort and such as seke to feede them selues in their vices, do labour to forget God, and settle themselues therevpon: But when God bringeth them to their remembrance, then they wake, yea euen too their sorowe.

Contrariwise, if we be certified that God receiueth vs to mercy (wherof fayth is a good and sure warrant) wee go boldly vnto him, and haue peace with him, and the neerer that we come to his maiestie, the more trust haue we of our saluation, forasmuch as he desireth nothing, but too bee our father, according as he hath shewed in deede. And the matter which was treated of yesterday, is confirmed yet once againe in that it is sayd, that righteousnesse shall be restored vnto a man. Eliu had sayd heretofore that if a wretched creature be in trouble, so as he feele Gods wrathe and vengeance, there is no way to comfourt him, and specially to restore him to life, except the gospel be preached, and that God send him some man to tel him his word purely, wherby the wretched sinner, that was ouerwhelmed, may knowe that the gate of paradise was opened vnto him: In discourfing herevpon, Eliu sayd that the preacher of the gospel should declare to him that was so afflicted, his righteousnesse. And what is that righteousnesse? I haue declared already, how it is not that men are righteous in themselues, or that they are able to stand before God: but that this righteousnesse is, that God burieth their faults and imputeth them not vnto them, but clenseth them of his owne free goodnesse. For the blood of Iesus Christ is the spirituall washing of our soules, namely when they be watered by the holy Ghost as sainct Peter sayeth. And there yee see also the vnderstanding of this text, that a mans righteousnesse shall be restored vnto him or retorne to him againe. For so long as God pursueth vs as a iudge, and summoneth vs to yeeld vp our accout: we be ouerwhelmed by our sinnes, and there needeth no other processe nor witness agaynst vs. But whē God calleth vs to himself, and sheweth vs that there is good remedie for vs to be discharged of the bond of death, wherin we are bound: (which remedie is to put our whole trust in the death and passion of our Lord Iesus Christ, and to receiue and imbrace the promises of saluation which he giueth vs) that is the returning of our righteousnesse vnto vs, which had bin erst alienated frō vs, and wherof we had bin vtterly bereft. So then let vs learne, not to nurrih our sinnes in our boosome any more. For we shall gayne nothing by laying playsters vpon our sores to hyde them: the rottenesse of them will increace the more, and we must needs drop asunder in the end, and be altogether infected. Then is it not for vs to flatter ourselues and to seke wayne startingholes, but we must come right foorth vnto God, and suffer our selues to be reprov'd by him. And when wee feele any remorse of conscience, let vs receiue it humbly and be fory for our misdoings. If we haue profited little by the warnings that God hath sent vs: at leastwise let vs not be past amendment when he chastizeth vs. And when we be beaten with his rodde: let vs be so cattedowne in ourselues, as we may seke nothing but his mere mercy, considering that we are vtterly vndone if he helpe vs not. Yee see then how it behoueth vs to deale. And by that meanes let vs not doubt, but that our righteousnesse shall be restored vnto vs, according as it is sayd by the Propheet Esay, that when we bee imbraued with the blood of our sinnes, in somuch that the stayne of it is soked into vs, God will make vs as whaye as snowe, if we retorne vnto him with a pure hart. But let vs not thinke herevpon, that God pardoneth our sinnes to let vs fall asleepe in them: but to the end wee should seeke to him, and make the priuiledge which is giuen vs auaylable, that is to wit, be bold to call vpon him as our father, and assure ourselues, that he will heare vs. Eliu hauing spoken so, addeth: he wil loke towards men and say I haue sinned, I haue turned away from goodnesse, and it hath not booted me: be hath deliuered my soule from the pit. This text is expounded by some men as though Eliu spake of God, saying that it is he that looketh so towards men, and that if any man say I haue done amisse, then wheras he had bene in the darknesse of death, God deliuereth his soule from the pit, and restoreth to him the light of life. Howbeit forasmuch as word for word it is set downe thus, he will looke towards men and say I haue done amisse, I haue turned away from goodnesse and it hath not stooed me in any stead, or was not meete and conuenient for mee: a man may see and easily gather, that Eliu goeth on still with his matter, shewing that they which are brought so lowe as to feele their sinnes, and to be euen at deathes dore, if God shew them the fauour to cal them back againe, and giue them hope of life, and specially cheere their harts, so as they are able to call vpon him in true assurednelle of faith: do afterward turne themselues to men, and declare their miseries, to the intent to magnifie the infinite goodnesse of God which they haue felt. And so the second frute of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, is that when the wretched sinner knoweth that God hath not shaken him off, but as yet openeth him the way and giueth him accessē to come vnto him: like as he rested therevpon to call vpon God and afterward made the frute of faith auaylable: so also it behoueth him too confesse the sayd goodnesse of God before men, and not to be ashamed to shewe the misery wherin he was vntill God had deliuered him by his mercy. To be short, like as when God hath sent vs the promises of his gospel, wee ought to acknowledge the, and to seeke vnto him: so also it behoueth vs, to mourne before me. For it is not ynough that euery of vs shuld pray to God priuily by himself: but it behoueth vs also to set forth his glory, and to induer to prouoke our neighbours to the same, so as one of vs may be edified by another: and he that hath felt how good and mercifull God is, must shewe it vnto others, that they may take example at it: And when there is such an agreement amongs vs, we must also preache Gods praises together, according as euery one of vs is bound vnto him, and there is not any man which may not iustly confesse, that God hath a hundred times plucked him out of his graue and quickned him. Ye see the in effect what the meaning of Eliu is. Howbeit, that we may the better profit by this sentence: let vs marke that it behoueth vs first to enter into ourselues, and the to go vnto God, & afterward to go vnto our neighbours. Thus ye see three things which we haue to marke, and it is an order which we ought to kepe well. The first is, that men should examine their owne consciences, & haue an eye to their whole lyfe. And why? To be ashamed of their sinnes: For vntill we haue well perceyued that wee be worse than wretched, how will we haue recourse vnto God? VVe will not be moued to seke him, nor to desire forgiuenesse. So then it is requisite for vs to begin at the sayd point, namely too feeble our sinnes how greuouse they be, and also to feele and conceyue the wrathe of God, to the intent wee may be as it were forlorne, and behold hell as it were gaping vpon vs to swallowe vs vp, and be so vtterly astonished, as we may be driuen to say. Alas, what is to be done? So that we may haue no rest in ourselues, but languishe so in our miseries, as we may come with an earnest zeale too seke the Lord. Thus ye see the first steppe that wee must begin at. The second is, that we must come vnto God, and seeing hee taryeth not till we seeke him, but of his infinite goodnesse preuenteth vs, in somuch that he inspireth vs to the end we should seke him and flee for refuge vnto his mercie, & there rest: whē we haue any promises of his goodnesse set afore vs, seeing that he seketh sinners to bring them from death to life: wee must take those promises and apply them to our vse, saying: euen so my God, thou shewest that thou art willing to receiue sinners to mercy: behold I am one, yea and I am so forlorne, as I wote not any more what too do. Therefore I doubt not Lord, but thou wilt make mee feele thy grace and goodnesse. So Lord, there will I rest, and although I be hemmed in with many troubles and sorowes which were able to turne me from thee: Yet will I rest vpon thy promises, and therewith call vpon thee, assuring myself that thou wilt strengthen mee against all Satans temptations. Thus ye see how it behoueth vs to deale. The third point is the conclusion that Eliu maketh here: which is, that we must declare Gods goodnesse to our neighbours so farforth as is needful to their edifying, that hee may be praised with one accord, and that all men may confesse, that there is no welfare but in his mercy, and that we are all damned, if the only goodnesse of our God remedy it not. These (say I) are the three degrees which it, behoueth vs to keepe. But I told you that we must begin at ourselues. And why? VVe shall see many which wil blase a-broade Gods praises with full mouth, but they haue not well foremynded the in their hart. There are which think themselues discharged when they haue sayd, O my God, haue pitie vpon mee, I haue bene such a one, I haue done such an euill deede. True it is, that such men haue some feeling in themselues, and speake not altogether through hypocrisie: But yet notwithstanding there is much wind in them, and their mouth is larger than their heart. For scarcely haue they tasted of Gods mercy: and yet they would haue men to thinke that they haue felt it throughly, and that they be full fraught with it. But there is vanitie and ambition in such men, when they voyden their mouth after that sort to speake well, and in the meane while haue not mynded Gods grace too feeble it accordingly, that it myght be well inprinted in their consciences, and they themselues bee ryghtly nurished with it. That is the cause why I sayd, that before wee speake, it behoueth vs too haue considered well what wee haue soone afore: that is to say, to haue examined well our selues, to haue bene diligent in serching how wretched wee be, and to haue bene come too the verie point to haue bene swallowed vp into the dungeon of hell. And afterward when wee haue bene brought to that after-deele, to imbrace Gods promises, and to haue such a lyuely feeling of them, as wee may call vpon him with a full trust. True it is, that this cannot bee doone perfectly, but yet must wee go towards it, yet must wee creepe neerer and neerer to it, and wee must strayne ourselues to come at it. Verie well, haue wee made such profers? Then is it tyme to open our mouth and too prayse Gods goodnesse, that other men may bee drawne to him by our example, and that all men may know, how there is none other hope of saluation, than in his only infinite goodnesse, when it pleaseth him to make the death and passion of his Sonne auaylable to take away our sinnes, so as we may be washed cleane from all spottes and vncleannesse, and bee accepted for ryghtuouse before him.

And this matter concerneth not the shrift of the Papistes, but the confession of a Christian, which ought too be put in vre among vs, and is not. I haue told you heretofore, that one of the cursed blasphemies in the Popedome, is to tye the forgiuenesse of sinnes to the Shrift that is made in a mannes eare: for God neuer requyred it. And in good sooth, it is vnpossible that euer any men should knowe the hundredth part of their faults, I meene euen of their grossest faults. And how shall they doo then if they go about too number the offences which they haue doone vnwittingly? Therefore the Shrift that is among the Papists is as a gulf of hell. But there is a Christen confession which is allowed by the woord of God: which is, that wee should generally confesse our sinnes, and when any of vs hath giuen any cause of stumbling, hee should acknowledge his fault to amend the cuill. That (say I) is the thing which we haue to do when God shall haue afflicted vs, and afterward remedied our aduersties. It is not ment that wee should go blowe in a mannes eare, to tell all our offences there: nor also that wee should mount vp vpon a scaffold, to tell particularly the faults that wee haue committed, and after what maner wee did them. No: wee neede no more but too confesse our defaultes in general, and therewithall too consider that our Lord hath bound vs to him exceedingly, in that he hath giuen vs a happie and wished end of our troubles, which would haue ouerwhelmed vs if he had not reached vs his hand, and set vs vp again.

Also when wee haue offended our neyghbours by giuing euill example, wee must acknowledge our faults, and not bee ashamed to confesse them with fornesse in our harts. I sayd that this latter confession is ill practized among vs: for we see the pryde that is in most men. True it is that they dare not say, that they be ryghtuouse: how bee it when they confesse themselues sinners, it is but a cloke of hypocrisie: they say that all men are so: and so wheras euery man ought to feele his owne misdoings, wee fall to couering of them with the mantle of other men. And that is a playne mocking of God. So then, if wee intend too confesse vnfeynedly that we be bound vnto God, and to humble ourselues before him: let vs speake according to the feeling of our owne consciences; and the miserie wherein we haue bene plunged, and the deadlienesse wherout of God hath made made vs way. Marke that for one point. Also there are other some, who when they haue committed any offence, do fall to blaspheming of God: when a whole streete is infected with whoredome, if a man reprove them for it, they will aske him whither they bring him backe to popishnesse or no, bycause they be told of their faults. As who would say, that God would haue stumbling blocks nurrished, and that the partie which hath troubled the church, should fare the better for his hardnesse and wilful stubbornnesse. So then let vs marke, that when God discouereth our sinnes, it is to the end that if wee haue caused any trouble or offence, wee should labour to amend it, and not be ashamed to open our mouth to confesse what we haue doone. And that is the thing which is shewed vs now: namely that when the sinner wil seeke vnto God for pardon, and afterward come familiarly to him to take him for his father, trusting in his mercy: he must also turne himself vnto men. He must not only pray in secrete, nor only say in his hart I haue sinned, and after that sort aske forgiuenesse, and returne vnto God: but he must also turne vnto his neighbours. And wheras erst he went aboute too deceiue God, and would haue rocked his owne conscience asleepe: he shall conceiue such a grief and confuzion in himself, that God shal be glorified by it, & such as were as it were asleepe shall awake: those whose mouthes were out of tast shall find some fauour in the grace of God: such as were swallowed vp with sorowe shall knowe that God opened them the gate to come vnto him: and (to be shorr) such as were in despayre shall recouer hope of life and saluation. Ye see then that the holy ghost ment in effect to declare in this text, that when we haue prayed vnto God euery man secretly by himself, we must likewise offer him a generall sacrifice before men, in acknowledging how much we be bound to his goodnesse, and in humbling our selues in our sinnes, considering how we had bin damned creatures if he had not pitied vs. Therefore it is sayd that he will haue an eye vnto me. And it behooueth vs to mark the order, wherof I haue made mention already. For Eliu began not at that point, but sayde at the entraunce, that the sinner shal be wakened: namely, for that God shal send him remorse of conscience: and if he receyue not that, nor become the better for the warnings which are giuen him, nor be afrayd of Gods iustice for all the threatnings that are made vnto him: he shall feele his hand so hard and heuie, as he shall be inforced to perceyue his owne confuzion, and to be greued at it, and to become as a dead mā. And afterward when he shall come to quickening, God shall cause the gospell to be preached and the promises of saluation to be offered vnto him: and he shall receyue them to his benefit. Herevpon he shall call vnto God and conceiue such a confidence, as he shall without any doubting go vnto God as vnto his father, and say. Seing that God hath adopted mee into the number of his children, I may well take this libertie of coming vnto him: and seing he allureth mee so sweetly vnto him, I must not doubt but he will receyue mee. This doone, it is tyme to looke towards men. If wee should looke first vnto men, and make fayre confessions before we haue bene sorie and throughly greued within: it were a peruerting of the order of nature. But when wee haue once felt well the greuoufnesse of Gods iudgements, and afterward are able to receyue the promises of the gospell, and to call vpon God with trust in him, and to rest vpon his mercie and fatherly goodnesse by feeling him fauorable too vs, and that he is redie to help vs: when wee haue doone all this: then is it tyme to looke towards men, that is to say to edifie our neyghbours. This then is an inferior thing to that which hath bin declared afore. And what is to be done in looking towards men? we must say I haue sinned, I haue turned aside from goodnesse: I haue bene a wretched man. Here then it is shewed vs after what sort God ought to be glorified by vs: that is to wit, we must acknowledge that he only is righteous, and that there is nothing but iniquitie in vs, as S. Paule sayeth in the third to the Romaynes. For whē he sayth there, that God is iustified: Rom. 3. 4. 5. he meeneth that we ourselues must first be condemned. If God should be counted ryghteous, and wee ryghteous, what a thing were that? Then should he haue a ryghteousnesse that were common and intermedled with men: but when we be vtterly conuicted and no mā dareth exempr himself, but contrariwise, we willingly yeld ourselues guilty and resort to the only goodnesse of God, knowing that it belongeth to him only to iustifie vs, bycause he is the fountayne of all righteousnesse: that is the ryght acknowledging of him to be righteous. VVherfore let vs learne to do as is shewed vs here: For it is a generall rule for all the faythfull, and it is not giuen by a mortall mā, but by the holy ghost. Are we then desirouse to publish Gods goodnes which he had shewed vs in forgiuing vs ou sinnes. It behooueth vs to make this confession with the mouthe, to our saluation: according also as Sainēt Paule sayeth in the tenth to the Romaynes, that our beleuing with the hart maketh vs righteous, and our confessing with the mouth maketh vs safe. And sainēt Paule is a good and faythfull expounder of this presente text. For (as I sayd: fore) if wee begin at the mouth, al wil be but wynd and smoke. Therefore we must first beleue with the hart, that is to say, we must gather ourselues vnto God, and enter into our owne consciences, and therewithall bethinke vs of his promises, that wee may flee vnto him and vnto his mercie mercy for refuge. This done, the mouthe must followe next. And the confession of the mouth will then bee to our saluation when we shall haue so beleued with our hart vnto ryghteousnesse. Yet notwithstanding these twoo things must bee matched together, according as we see that they are inseparable. Now wheras it is sayd I haue sinned, I haue turned away from goodnesse, and it hath not profited me: The holy ghost sheweth vs that our confession must be pure and freeharted, and that we must not speake by halues as the hypocrites do which say. O it is true that al the world is sinfull and all men are faulty: and so (to their owne seeming) they are well quit. Surely there is no dallying after that sort with God: but we must set foorth our sinnes to the vtermost: that is to say, we must feele them too bee an intollerable burthen: according also as wee see that Daniell doeth, sayng: Lord we haue sinned. Is that all? no: but he addeth, we haue delt wickedly, we haue trayterously transgressed thy lawe, and wee haue bene wilfull and froward. For what cause doeth Daniell pack so many words together and make such a heape of them? It is to shewe vs, that such as will discharge themselves so lightly to Godward with speaking but a word of their faults and away, are but hypocrites, and neuer felt what their offences are. Dani. 9. 4. 5.

So then let vs marke well, that there is no superfluitie in this text, where Eliu, (after he had shewed that the sinner which is quit at Gods hande, will confesse his fault,) sayth not only, I haue sinned, but also addeth I haue turned away from goodnesse. VVherin he doeth vs to vnderstand, that a man must not stick to confesse his default, and to say, I haue bene vtterly froward and malicious, I haue bin giuen to al wickednesse I haue strayed quite & cleane from the waye of saluation, I haue sent my self against God, and I haue giuen myself wholly vnto Satan as much as was in me. Thus ye see how wee must deale: [that is to wit,] not for countenance sake, but so as the hart do speke before God, and then the mouthe also agree with it, to confesse before men what we haue felt within ourselues. And this is in effect the thing which is shewed vs here. But now let vs apply this to our selues, & cōsider what entraunce we giue vnto God, to lay forth the treasures of his goodnesse towards vs. For a man shall see nothing through out but hardnesse of hart, & shamelessenessesse. How many are there in these dayes that humble theselues? Nay, cōtrariwise al are wild beaſts, and those which be most faultie are least ashamed to mainteyne their wickednesse, and to set vp their bristles against men whēfoeuer they go about to amend thē: and yet notwithstanding these men cease not to vaunt themselues of the goſpell. As for reformation it is nothing worth with thē, and yet it is the Apcee of the christians: And what is the first lesson that we ought to beare in mind, but only this: namely that we may be inlightened, to knowe the wrath of God, & to feele how haynouse our sinnes are, so as we may be sory and vtterly ashamed of them: and that we may embrace Gods mercy and take hold of it, to the end to be reconciled to him for our lord Iesus Christs sake, & by the meane of his death and pafsion: And finally, to cōfesse our wretchednesse before men, to the end that the whole prayse may bee yeilded vnto God, as meete is it should be.

Beholde I saye wherevntoo wee ought to invre our selues. But what? as I haue touched afore, when men haue done amisse, and that not lyghtely but greuously, so as one becommeth a drunckard, another a whoremaster, a third a swearer, the fourth full of malice and crueltye, & another a beater of him that seekes nothing at his hand: If a man shewe them their faults, what shall he see? wild beaſts which cā by no meanes be tamed, and which make but a skorne of all the warnings that are giuen them. For scarcely is there one amongs ten which hath such lowlinesse and modestie in him, as to confesse his fault when he hath done amisse. Seing it is so, do we not shet the gate against our God? do we not reiect the grace which is offered vs by the goſpell? To be short, we cā not abyde that God should forgieue our sinnes. And so we see that the preaching of the goſpel vnto many men, must be to bereue thē of al excuse, & to drown thē in the deepe of hell bicause they could not make their profit of it. Neuerthelesse the holy ghost prouoketh vs to receiue the exhortacion that is made vnto vs here. VVherfore let vs fight against the pride and hypocricie that are in vs. For they be the two things which keepē vs from humbling of ourselues before God, and from confesing of our faults before men. Hypocricie maketh vs to labour continually to cloke our sinnes, & to pretēd to giue ourselues vnto goodnesse: when in the meane whyle our hart is farre frō it, and we go the cleane contrary way. And againe, pride maketh vs to desire always to be in good reputation. Alas we seke to be esteemed among men, or at leastwise to kepe ourselues from reproche, and although we know our owne sinnes, yet are we loth to be told of thē, and in the meane whyle behold our condemnacion increaseth and doubleth before God and his Angels. And therefore let vs learne to tame this pride vntill it be fully subdued, so as we may come to our God with all humilitie, and not only cōfesse our wretchednesse before him, but also indeuer to edifie our neighbours. If a mā demand for what cause we should speake so before men. there are two reasons. The one is that God might be knowne to bee only righteous as I haue sayd, and that his grace might appeare and shyne forth. Although God could forbear our confession: yet notwithstanding he will haue it openly and manyfestly knowne that we are in his det. And we see it is impossible to knowe his goodnesse towards vs, if we be not vtterly cast downe, and euen at the point of dispaire. Thus ye see the first reason. why wee ought too confesse before our neighbours, the goodnesse that we haue felt at Gods hād, in that he hath deliuered vs frō death, and frō the destruction wherin we were plunged. Also there is a second reason, which is, that other men should be edified by our example. I haue bin exercisid in affliction, and God hath bin so gratiouse to deliuer mee out of it: It is good that other should knowe of it, that when God shal afflict them, they may think with themselues, behold Gods hand is vpon me, and he summoneth me: And why? For I was as it were drunckē in my sinnes, I was as a stray beaſt, and now I see that he intendeth to drawe me home, and to set mee into the waye of saluation again. Therefore it is good that men should be warned of Gods working which we haue felt in our selues: according as we see in very deede, that the confessions: which the faithfull haue made in times past, do serue at this daye for our learning. If we had not the example of Dauid in the greate numbers of afflictions which he felt and ouercame. As soone as wee felt any smal aduersitie, we should forthwith be at the poynt of dispaire. But when wee see that the illēwe was good and profitable vnto Dauid, and that he confesseth it to the b. 67.

 have bin a necessarie thing for him to be so afflicted and chastized at Gods hand, wee also do trust in God, and flee vnto him, assuring our selues that it is his office too raise men out of the graue when he hath cast thē into it. So then whē we confesse our sinnes, & report how God hath visited vs with rigor for a time, and afterward quickened vs againe: it serueth to instruct our neighbours, that they may not bee nouices nor thinke it straunge, when God shall visit them in their turne: and that (as I haue sayd) they may know themselues to be wretched sinners, and seke the remedie of it by putting their trust in the death and pafsion of our Lord Iesus Christ: and be more and more stirred vp to serue and honor him, when they shal haue felt his goodnes and grace by experience, in that he hath receyued them so to mercy. Thus ye see that the thing which is shewed here, is not vnprofitable. For a hūdred are edified and instructed by the example of one man. And therefore let vs learne to put away retchlesnesse when our Lord shall haue shewed vs any fauour, so as we may magnifie his goodnesse before mē, and the same may be preached with one commō accord. And afterward it is said for a conclusion, he hath deliuered my soule from the pit, and my life from entering into the graue. Truly this cannot be thoroughly dispatched as now, but it must suffice vs, to haue a short abridgement of it, as neede requyreth for the ioyning of this parte to that with I haue declared already.

Discourse hath bin made of the confesing of sinnes, how mē ought not to be ashamed to cōdemne theselues, & that afterward it behoueth thē immediatly to adde the praise of God in that they haue knowne his goodnesse. And therefore it is said, I haue sinned, I haue turned away frō goodnesse, yea, and It hath not booted me at all: But my God hath drawne me out of the pit. Thē as soone as the holy ghost hath taught vs to acknowledge our wretchednes & to be ashamed of it: he wil haue vs immediatly to preache gods mercy, according as we haue felt it, how he suffred vs not to perish, as we must needs haue don if he had not helped vs. And let vs marke wel how it is sayd here vnto sinners, that it shal not boore thē to resist their maker. Then what shal we gaine when we hyde our sinnes and think not vpon thē, but rather nourish them by fond selfelyking? Alas, alas,

alas, it is alwayes to our greater destruction. But when God discouereth our iniquities, and maketh vs to feele them, the doth he procure our profit. For therein he prouoketh vs to resort vnto him. Thus ye see the first point that we haue to marke in this streyne: and further lette vs marke also, that when God shaketh vs off and layeth our wickednesse to our charge, there is no remedy but wee must be forlorne, vntill our God be pitifull to vs, and receyue vs to mercie. And therefore whensoever God forgiueth our sinnes, it is all one as if he rayfed vs frō death, so as wee must conclude, that when wee be so reconciled vnto God, then hath he wrought a resurrection in vs. VVe were dead, and there was no hope of lyfe in respect of our selues, and he reacheth out his hand to make vs a liue agayne, and to drawe vs vnto him. So then lette vs learne to magnifie the grace of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, acknowledging that God doth rayse vs to life: as often as it pleaseth him to receyue vs to mercy. And forasmuch as we see that Satan ceaseth not to thrust vs from so great a benefite, let vs be so much the more inflamed and prouoked to exalt it highly as it deserueth.

Now lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgment of our sinnes, praying him so to excercise vs in his iudgemēt and in the knowledge of our wretchednesse, as we may alwayes learne to serue and honour him, and to yeeld our selues to him with true humility, that we may be strengthened more and more in his mercy, to trust therevnto & to settle our selues wholly vpon it, and that thereby we may learne to cōfesse before men, howe gracious our good God hath bene vnto vs in receyuing vs to his mercy, to the ende that the prayse of our saluation may be yeilded vnto him alone as to whom it is dewe, and that we may be so ashamed and abashed in our selues, that he onely may be exalted, and all of vs be humbled vnder him, to yeeld him his due honor and homage. And for the doing hereof it may please him to rayse vp true and faythful ministers of his woorde, which seeke not. &c.

WE haue seene heretofore how God provideth for our welfare. For in as much as we are wretched creatures, he on his parte must be fayne to remedy our vices, or els there will be no hope of vs. Yee see then, that we be vtterly forlorne and vndone, if God haue not pitie vpon vs. And the meane hath bene declared vnto vs: namely that he teacheth vs to receyue his grace, sometimes by the chastisements which he giueth vs, and sometimes by afflictions and great stripes of his roddes. And if he see that we be dull and slowe, he striketh the harder, so as we are cōpelled to come vnto him, because we be vtterly quayed and can holde out no longer. Herevpon he comforteth vs in such wise, as we may come vnto him, and call vpon him, and feele him fauorable to vs, and hauing felt such grace, acknowledge the same in the sight of men, and both be the more cōfirmed our selues, and also confirme our neighbours in it. Now then Eliu hauing treated of all this, addeth that it is not for one time onely that God iustifieth vs after that sorte, but that he reneweth the sayde instruction oftentimes. And why? for somuch as wee be not so good schollers as to profite sufficiently at the first day, God is fayne to hold on in mortifying the affections that are in vs, that he may draw vs to him by humbling and comforting vs agayne. Nowe if this were done but once, wee would by and by forget it, and returne to our owne nature, and there would be no such strength in vs as to walke as becommeth vs. Thus haue we the meening of Eliu, or rather of the holy ghost. And it is a very necessary doctrine for vs. For besides that in the pacie men haue as it were buried the righteousnesse that commeth of free gift, whereby God saueth vs: there haue bene also somewhat more modest men, who haue darkened and intangled his doctrine in such wise, as they haue thought it ynough to say, that God iustifieth vs of his goodnesse, howbeit they say that the same is but one, & that when we be so reconciled vnto him, thenceforth it lieth in vs to deserue and keepe possession of the grace which we haue receyued. But this is the meane to bring a man to vtter despayre. For if our Lord reach vs his hand but for once, and do but onely set vs in a good way: I pray you how shall we be able to hold out to the end, considering the fraylty that is in our flesh, whereof we haue to much prooffe? Also the grace of God were vnauayleable to vs, if it continued not with vs to the end, and renewed not from time to time as neede requireth. Furthermore we see our flesh isto lustie, that although we haue bene tamed for a while, and wee seeme to be thoroughly disposed to beare the yoke, seeking nothing but to obey God, so as we wonder how wee should be changed in any one thing: yet notwithstanding, the rebelliousnesse which is hid within vs, auunceth it self, and Satan who knoweth the meanes howe to thrust vs out of the way, commeth to beguyle vs with his flights. VVhat should become of vs the if God should correct vs but for once, & euer after let vs alone to our selues? what should become of vs, if he should cōfort vs but for one day, and euer after let vs shift for our selues with the comfort that we had receyued? Surely it would euery whit fade away, yea even out of hand. And so it is more than needefull, that God should begin new agayne at euery instant, considering how we returne to our maughtinesse, and that his roddes are not so wel printed in vs, as to make vs remember them as were requisite, and that we are not earnest to call vpon him, but had leuer gad aboute, and wander away in our owne vanities, and in steade of seeking our saluation, wee be harried here and there, and our wittes are so wauering, as they cannot rest where they should, and therefore do continually roue abroad without ceasing. And whereas Eliu setteth here Three tymes: he meeneth many times, after the maner of the holy Scripture. VVhich is, not to determine any certayne number, but to shew that it is for our profite that God should afflict vs after that sort. For we be to variable and inconstant, and therefore it behoueth him to returne vnto vs againe and againe, or els the things which he shal haue done wil serue to no purpose. And he cōfirmeth the matter which he delt withall: which is, that whē God hath deliuered our soules from the graue, and quickned vs with the light of life, it is a sweetening of the rigor of the chastisements which wee feele at his hand. For we cannot but shun them to the vttermost of our power, because they be cōtrary to our nature. VVee would fayne that God should handle vs after our owne liking, that hee shoulde neuer bee rough to vs, that wee might neuer be disquieted in our mindes, that we might alwayes liue at our ease, and that he would alwayes mainteyne vs in mirth and rest. Yea verily, but (according to that which I haue sayd) it is not good that God should handle vs after our owne fancie, but that he should vse his own discretion, and send vs whatsoeuer he thinketh expedict for vs. So then let vs haue an eye to the end and issue of our afflictions; that they may be a cōfort to vs: that is to say, that they may serue for salues & medicines: marke that for one poynt. Therefore although they be bitter at the first sight: yet let vs receyue them at Gods hand, knowing that they be recordes of his loue, and that hee hath a care of vs to worke our saluation. Beholde (I say) the thing that ought too appease all our grudgings, so as we should not be impacient when God chastiseth vs. And why so? For it is for our profite that it shoulde be so. Neuerthelesse, it is not ynough to knowe that afflictions serue vs for medicines: but it behoueth vs also to consider for what disease, and then will wee like the better of them. If a man be sicke but of some small, light, or cōmon disease: yet will he like well of the thing that shall remedy him. But if he be wholly giuen ouer, and taken but for a dead man, and yet recover: then will he fet the more store by the remedy that was giuen him. Euē so is it with the thing that Eliu sheweth here. For he sayeth that God in afflicting of vs doth not only remedie our vices, but also fetch vs from the graue and quickē vs. Hereby he sheweth, that we be vndone and vtterly drowned in destruction, except God plucke vs backe vnto him euen by violent means. And sure it coulde none otherwise be, considering our hardhartednesse, or rather that we be so marked in our sinnes, as we cānot easily be wōud out of them. Seing then that God rayseth vs agayne, (according as was treated more at large yesterday) lette vs assure our selues that wee cannot sufficiently esteeme the goodnesse that hee sheweth vs, when it pleaseth him to chastize vs. That therefore is the second poynt which we haue to marke. The third is, that wee muste needes passe that way. For in that he sayeth, to the intent to draw backe: he betokeneth an inforcing necessitie. True it is, that God could well saue vs without this meane: but here is no disputing of Gods mightie power: and Eliu hath respect to our state, which also is the poynt that wee muste rest vpon. And therefore let vs learne, that if God should deale gently with vs, and lette vs alone in quiet, that wee might sleepe in our sinnes without waking: it would be the cause of our destruction. Then is it needefull that we should be handled with such rigor as we oftentimes are: yea and if he bare not with our frayltie and feeblenesse, he should be fayne to vse a farre greater roughnesse towards vs. Therefore howsoeuer a man be afflicted, he ought to beare it paciētly, assuring himself that God doth it not without cause, no nor euē without a necessary cause. Also therewithal we haue to marke the cōparifon which is set betwene the graue, & the light of life. VVhat is it whē God withdraweth vs backe from death? And why doth he bring vs to the light of life? ye see on the one side an extreme misery, yee see also on the other side a fouerayne benefite. And therefore let vs learne, that if God suffer vs to follow our owne lustes, we make hast alwayes towards the graue: that is to say, we do nothing but plundge our selues into vtter destruction, out of the which we can neuer get out againe. Lo what mā would do, if God should giue him the bridle. And hereby we haue good cause to mislike of our selues, cōsidering the frowardnes that is in vs. True it is that euery one of vs will say he is desirous to go vnto God, and to attayne to saluation: but in the meane whyle, what do wee? looke vpon our lyfe, looke vpon our thoughts, looke vpon our whole doings: and it will seeme that we be madde in seeking our owne destruction. For wee cease not to prouoke the wrath of God, as who should say, wee could neuer come soone ynough to the depth of our misery. Seing then that we be so giuen to all euill by nature, as though wee were desirous to perishe wilfully: lette euery man learne to know himselfe, and to mislike of himselfe, and therevpon suffer God to gouerne him, seing our owne guyding and gouernment is so wretched and vnhappy: and let vs forgette all the foolishhe presumptions wherewith the worlde is so fotted, that euery man thinkes himself wise ynough, if he may haue his owne free will. Lo how men deceyue themselues in making themselues beleue that they haue great store, both of wisdome and strength. But contrarywise we see that God had neede to correct by force this cursed affection of desiring to know more than is meete for vs. Therewithall on the other side let vs cōsider wher vnto God calleth vs, when he draweth vs backe from the graue into the light of life. He setteth vs not in some middle state, to say, ye shall not be starke dead, ye shall but languish: but he calleth vs to the light of life, that is to wit, to that newnesse whereby wee are regenerated to the incorruptible and heauenly life. The matter then concerneth not Gods deliuering of vs onely from death: but also his bringing of vs to his euerlasting kingdome. And although we walke in many corruptions here bylowe, and are beset round about with them, yea and that they dwell in vs and are euen in our bones and marce: yet will God guyde and gouerne vs, euen till wee come into his kingdome. Thus ye see a cōparifon which cōfirmeth yet better the infinite gracious goodnesse of our God, to the end we should be the more stirred to seeke him: & when he shall haue brought vs into the right way, indeuer our selues to go forwarde from day to day: and when hee shall haue drawne vs backe, suffer him to teach vs, and desire him to continue his teaching still. And herewithall let vs marke also, that we must not be discouraged though we do oftentimes fall backe & seeme to clyue asunder. And when God hath set vs in a good trade, and that we be as it were thoroughly tamed, if the vices of our flesh happen nowe and then to get the vpper hand of vs, so as wee be driuen from him, and our infirmitie groweth into mistelefe, so as we be couered with darkenesse: let vs not therefore be out of heart. And why? For it is sayd, that God will worke many tymes in a man, to the intent to bring him into the light of lyfe. Therefore when we be come vnto God, and haue had had a sure hope of saluation: if now and then we fall into trouble and anguish, so as a suddayne storme seemeth to ouerwhelme vs: let vs not therefore cease to trult in God. And why? For it is sayd that he will beginne his worke new againe in vs: not that we should giue our selues the brydle, (lette vs beware of that,) but that in the meane while, we should put in vre the saying of the Prophet Esay, which is, to strengthen the quaking legges, and to cheere vp the faynting hearts. If a man be strong in despising God and in making no account of his grace: hee had neede to feele Gods iudgements, and to bee smitten hard, and to be wounded to the quicke. But if we be feeble and trembling, so as our knees quake, and we haue no more strength in vs: it is the proprietie and nature of the Gospell to strengthen vs againe, according as it is sayd in the Prophet Esay, where all such as haue charge to teach in the Church, are commaunded to strengthen the weake legges, to chere vp the faynt hearts, and to cherish vp the trembling knees. Seing it is so, it behoueth vs to followe the same order, according also as the Apostle applieth it to euery faithfull man. The Prophet Esay had spoken it but to such as had publike charge to teach: but the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, sheweth that euery man ought to be his owne teacher in that behalfe. So then let vs looke to our selues, and if we be astonished at Gods iustice, let it not caste vs into wicked imaginations, nor make vs to fall into despayre: but if wee feele that our knees tremble, and that our armes and legges be as good as broken, & that we be so afflicted as we know not what to do: yet lette vs not therefore cease to strengthen our selues from day to day. Eliu hauing spoken so, addeth: Iob beare me, giue good eare, at least wise if thou haue no matter agaynst mee: for I stoppe not thy mouth, speake, if thou haue wherewith to iustifie thy selfe: if not, hold thy peace, and beare mee speake, and I will teach thee wisdom, for I desire to iustifie thee. As if he should say, I would fayne that thou shouldst be quit. If thou haue good and auayleable defences, bring them forth: if not, lette thy mouth be shet. Here nowe againe we be warned in Iobs person, to keepe silence when Gods truth is set afore vs, and not to reply agaynst it. And it is a very profitable warning, considering the hardnesse of heart and the pryde that is in men. For it is exceeding harde for vs to submit ourselues vnto God. VVe see that there be alwayes stryings in vs, and that our mindes are not framed to such lowlineesse as they ought to be. For if a man alledge vs a good and holy thing: we are not so mylde as to receyue it: but we haue such a pryde, as wee are loth to bee subiect to any other thing than our owne will. Yee see then that the nature of men is to lift vp themselues agaynst God, and alwayes to kicke agaynst his woorde. Sith wee be subiect to such a wicked and cursed vice, lette vs marke well the warning that is giuen vs here. VVhich is, to bee teachable when God causeth men to teile vs his truth. And this is it which S. James meeneth when he sayeth, that it behoueth vs to receyue Gods woorde with a meeke spirit. It is not without cause that he hath expressed this meane. VVould we then shewe how wee profite in Gods woorde? It behoueth vs aboute all things to haue a meeke and gentle spirit. For if wee be of a fierce courage, surely wee shall turne all to euill, and neuer finde taste in Gods woorde, but ouerthrow all goodnesse, and our light shall be turned into darkenesse. VVhat is to be done then? VVe must keepe silence when God speaketh. Neuerthelesse wee muste not looke that he shall shewe himselfe visibly from heauen: but as often as his woorde is preached and set forth vnto vs, we must hold it for true and good, assuring our selues that it proceedeth from him. And if we reply agaynst it, we make not warre agaynst a mortall creature, but we aduance our selues with diuelish presumption agaynst the liuing God. Therefore it behoueth vs to hold our peace that we may be taught. Finally the whole and true wisdom of men, is to yeelde themselues teachable vnto God, and to submit themselues wholly to that which is shewed them in his name and authoritie. This is the first point which we haue to marke in the exhortatiõ which Eliu maketh here vnto Iob. For his speaking vnto that man is in such wise, as that vnder his person all of vs are warned of their duty as I haue sayd already. But aboute all things let vs marke, that it behoueth vs to keepe silence when we are spoken to of Gods iustice, & reproued for our sinnes. Thus yee see a circumstance which we haue yet to marke ouer and besides that which hath bene sayd already. VVhat is it that Eliu treated off hitherto: he shewed vnto Iob that God is righteous, yea and after such a sort, as men ought to be wholly gouerned by him, and that it is in him to draw them backe from the graue, and to bring them vnto life, holding them continually in his mighty hande, till he haue brought them to their perfection. But therein do men most of all beguile theselues. VVhy so? Men cannot glorifie God and take all shame to themselues: they will alwayes challenge somewhat to themselues, and although they ought to know their own lewdnesse and to be ashamed of it: yet notwithstanding they are alwayes puffed vp with some presumption, and dazeled with some vayne fancie, saying: haue not I this? and haue not I that? and although I be not perfectly righteous, yet am I not vtterly destitute of all goodnesse.

Thus yee see how men are desirous to reserue somewhat to themselues, and cannot yeeld vp al vnto God. And that is the cause why wee cannot fully receyue the doctrine of free iustification: which sheweth vs that God receyueth vs of his owne mere mercy, and that his accepting of vs is not for any respect of our owne workes which are altogether sinfull, but bicause it pleaseth him to washe vs and clenze vs in the blood of his onely sonne, and to holde vs and acknowledge vs for his children, notwithstanding that by nature there is nothing in vs but wretchednesse and cursednesse. For this cause Eliu hauing shewed how much we be bound vnto God for all things which wee haue, in so much as the honour ought to be yeelded vnto him as to the beginner and performer of all: he addeth that all men should giue eare to it, & hold their peace, according also as S. Paule sayeth in the third to the Romanes, which I alledged one of these dayes past. Now when Eliu sayeth, that he is desirous to haue Iob quit: thereby he sheweth that he went not to it of a fierce and contentious mind, (as me are wont to do when they will maintaine a contrary part) nor of purpose to grieue the man. No, but he would faine that Iob could haue mainteyned his righteousness: & sith he hath not wherewith to do it, he would haue him to humble himselfe before God. And let vs marke that Eliu speaketh here, as the intrument of gods spirit. And hereby let vs take warning, that whicfoeuer god thudereth agaynst vs in the holy Scripture, he couereth not our destruction by bereeuing vs of the thing that belongeth vnto vs, as though he enuied vs for something which wee had that were woorthy of prayse: no, for what is it that can hurt him? should God be any whit diminished by our hauing of some truthe on our side? No: but forasmuch as it is for our behoofe to bee vtterly throwne downe, bicause wee can not receyue the benefite which hee offereth vs, vlesse we be quytte and cleane voyde of all presumption and vanitie: therefore he bereueth vs, first of all vayne-glory, and sheweth vs that wee haue nothing but shame and reproch in vs, and that we be infected, and as it were rotten in our filthinesse. God (say I) is fayne to bring vs to that poynt: not for that he is greued at our righteoufnesse (for it is well knowne that there is no fault in him) but bycause it is for our profite. So then what remayneth for vs, but to humble our selues, and to receyue the promises which are giuen vs of our saluation. And for asmuch as the Diuell eggeth vs to stray from the obedience of our God, and from harkening quietly vnto him: let vs brydle our mindes, yea & let vs brydle them short, and say, yet muste thy God raigne ouer thee and be thy mayster, and thou must be his scholler and receyue whatsoever is deliuered thee in his name. Lo here in effect what we haue to remember, concerning the exhortation that Eliu maketh here vnto Iob. And herevpon wee may also gather that which I haue touched already: namely that we shall neuer profite, till wee haue learned to holde our peace. And what is this holding of our peace wherof Eliu speaketh? It is that wee should not be to wyse in our owne conceyte, nor subtle to reply against God, to say how is this, or how is that? For wee muste be contented with that which God sheweth vs: bycause obedience pleaseth him best of all things. And so yee see that the chiefe poynt of fayth, is to be quiet to Godward. For whē men are so presumptuous as to take vpon them of their owne reason to conclude vpon the things, which they ought to stande vnto: surely God will blinde them, and he must needs punish such pride. VVhat is to be done then? wee are commaunded to keepe silence: that is to say, to beate downe all the pryde that is in our nature, so as we may not thinke our selues to haue any wisdom of our owne: but may seeke it at Gods hand, and suffer him to teach vs that we may profite. Now let vs come to that which Eliu addeth in generall. He sayeth, heare me ye wise men, giue eare to mee ye men of vnderstanding: for the mouth iudgeth of meates whether they be sauery or no, and the eare tryeth woordes. Here Eliu doth first of all tell vs and aduertise vs, that this doctrine is not onely for the rude and ignorant, but also for all men: and therefore that noman muste holde skorne of it, as though hee were learned ynough already: for the wisest may be more confirmed here, and finde that they loose not their time in harkening to that which is sayd and contayned here. And vndoubtedly if wee knew what is in vs, wee would be more attentiuē to heare the doctrine that is dayly preached vnto vs. And first of all, is it not a thrusting away of God, if wee take skorne to be taught, as though he had ordeyned an vnprofitable thing?

Beholde, it is Gods will that the Gospell should be preached, and that mennē should heare it and giue eare vnto it. But hath he sayd that that ought to be done but onely of the ignorant, and of such as are still as it were in their Apcee? No. It is spoken to the whole bodie of his Church, in somuch that he will haue both great and smal to followe that rule. And S. Paule sheweth that we must continue in this order till we be come to the perfect age, euen to the age of our Lord Iesus Christ. But where shall we finde this perfect man? He is not to be found in this mortall lyfe: wee must be bereft of this mortall body, and God muste haue taken vs home to himselfe, before wee can come to this perfection. So then seing it is Gods will that the whole body of his Church should be taught, yea euen the perfectest and excellentest sorte: shall it not be to lewde an ouerweening, if we beare men in hande that the doctrine is superfluous for vs, and that wee haue no neede of it? lette vs looke vpon the example of S. Paule who was a mirrour of Angellike holinesse, and yet notwithstanding he sayeth that he indeuered still to go forward dayly. VVhen he was neere death & had foughten valiauntly for the honour of God, yet still he forgate all that he had done afore. And although hee had serued God faythfully and suffered many things for his names sake: yet notwithstanding he had his eye alwayes vpon that which was remayning, and sayd, I must not regarde that I haue done one thing or other, and in the meane while fall asleepe and not indeuer my selfe to passe further: but I must keepe on forwarde and streyne my selfe to come to that which remayneth. Herein (say I) S. Paule sheweth vs well what wee haue to do. So then lette vs marke, that wee muste not be to nice to shake off the doctrine which is set afore vs, as though it could serue vs to no purpose, or as though we were learned ynough already. For here the spirite of God exhorteth the wyse men, and men of most vnderstanding, to heare and receyue the things that are sayd. Therefore wee see that Gods wisdom is so infinite, as it can neuer be thoroughly comprehended. So long as men liue in this world, it is ynough that they haue some tast of it, and profite dayly more and more in it. On the other side, let vs marke well, that when we haue learned any thing, wee keepe it ill, and forget it out of hand: and therefore wee had neede to be put in minde of it: and God is so gracious vnto vs, as to set his mercie afore vs, to the end we should not be vtterly as it were desperate and past hope of trusting in him. For the vnderstanding of a thing in our brayne, is not all that wee haue to do: but it must morcouer be printed in our hart. This doctrine is not speculatyue or a gaze, (as men may terme it) as humane sciences be, (for in them it is ynough to haue conceyued what they be): but this must be rooted in our hearts. Now let vs consider whether we haue such a beleefe of Gods will, as we neede not to be dayly put in minde of it, and shewed it. And so it is to be concluded, that the wise men and men of vnderstanding are counseled here to herken and giue eare: and thereby (as I sayd) all loftinesse must be layde downe, and wee must intend to be taught of God. And so much the more must we follow the rule that is giuen vs here, bicause wee see that the world findeth no tast in Gods woord. The ignorant (bicause they know not what it is) do shet it out of their dores, and are loth at any time to come to good doctrine. The fickleheaded (as soone as they heare but some woorde at a glaunce) thinke themselues to be so great Clarke, as they haue ynough of it, and therevpon ouerpasse it, according as we see too much experience of it in these dayes. Howe many are there that haue their eares stopped, and which, although the woorde of God do dayly founde forth, so as they might be partakers of the doctrine of lyfe and saluation, yet notwithstanding make none account of it? And why? For they haue no taste of it. There are some to be seene, who hauing vnderstoode some small thing of the Gospell, do beare themselues in hand that they are so great clarkes, as they neede not to heare any more. VVhat a number of these fantastical and lighthheaded Christians are there which say, as for me I vnderstood the truth, it is thus many yeeres ago since I knew the Gospell. And what knowe they of it? That a man may well eat flesh vpon the frydayes, and that a mā is not bound to shriue himselfe: and therevpon they fall to babbling, and mingle cursed blasphemies with the slender things which they know I wote not how. And why? For they hilde skorne to be taught in Gods schole. For somuch then as we see that God doth so punish mēs negligence: wee ought to take the more heede of this doctrine, and to marke well how Salomon sayeth, that the wise man shall grow continually in wisdom by hearing. Prou. 1.4.5. Now if God so punish the negligence and oversight of men: what shall become of their pryde, when they shet

the gate wilfully agaynst all good doctrine, and conceyuing a disdayne against it, do swell like toades, so as they will not in any wise be taught? After that Eliu hath exhorted the wise men and men of vnderstanding to heare, he addeth the reason: For the mouth (sayeth he) doth serue to tast meates, and the eare to trie and iudge woordes. Hereby he betokeneth, that such as disdayne to giue eare to God and to his truth to be taught by it, and seeke not to be confirmed more & more in the things that they haue heard already: peruert the order of nature, and become as it were monsters, and worse than brute beasts. And why? For a beast followeth his owne kinde: but behold, a man which shall call himselfe wise, hauing reason and discretion, and which was created after the image of God to be inlightened in all truth, shall notwithstanding giue his minde dayly to eate and drinke, but not to profit in Gods woorde. He hath that point comon with the brute beasts: for they be nurrished with foode and seeke no further. And a man, who would be more excellent than the Angels of heauen, doth notwithstanding giue himself wholly to eating and drinking like a beast, and in the meane season vouchsafeth not to vse his eares, which he hath receyued to a more noble and precious intent than eating and drinking. For these serue but to maynteyne vs in this transitory life: but the other serue to giue vs hope of the euerlasting life and saluation. Then if a man will not vse such a gift of God: must he not be esteemed as a monster agaynst nature (as I haue sayde) or as a double beast? Now we see what Elius meaning is: for he sayeth to vs, my friends, if any man refuse to be taught, marke what he doth: for when God created vs, he gaue vs a mouth to tast meates, to the intent we should receyue foode dayly at his hand. And the same is a benefite which we ought to esteeme, in that our Lord nourisheth vs by it, but that is not the principall benefite. For he gaue vs eares also. And to what purpose? For to be taught by. They are not to communicate one with another onely about the buying of bootes, shooes, cappes, bread, and wine: the vse of the tongue and of the eares is yet more noble: that is to wit, to leade vs into truth by the meane of Gods woord, that we might know how we were created incorruptible, and that when wee be passed out of this world, there is an heritage prepared for vs aboue, and (to be short) to bring vs vnto God. Fayth commeth by hearing as sayeth S. Paule. Seing then that God hath ordeyned our eares to so excellent an vse as to lift vs vp to heauen to beholde our God, and to behold him as our father, and to witnesse vnto vs that he receyueth vs as his children, and to sowe the seede of the incorruptible life in vs in the middes of the corruptions that are in vs: seing (I say) that wee may obtaine such a benefite by the eare, should wee play the deafe men, or stop our eares when men speake vnto vs & tell vs of the truth which we know to be for our saluatiō? Is it not an ouer great beastlinesse to do so? Then muste not a man boast any more of perfectnesse, wisdom, and vnderstanding, if he cannot abide to be taught. But contrarywise he is worse than all the beasts in the worlde as I haue shewed before. And although this sentence of it selfe haue no neede of long exposition: yet notwithstanding wee haue neede to bee quickned and stirred vp to know it. For wee see in what cace wee be. Every man is busie ynough about the things that concerne this present lyfe: but as for our own saluation and the glory of God, a man cannot bring vs to thinke vpon them. VVee are carefull ynough to eate and drinke, not onely to dresse it three or foure houres aforehand, but also to make prouisiō a long time afore, yea euen for foure liues. For men haue so greate care to compasse transitorie goodes, to the end they may neuer haue want, that they are euer in hād with them. And although they haue ynough to finde thē during their life: yet they beare themselves in hand that they should want euen after their death. Yee see then how wee be giuen to the transitory things of this worlde, without cōsidering that God hath not created vs as brute beasts, but hath giuen vs a more excellent thing than our body, which is the hope of the eternall life that we looke for. Seing then that of very nature we be so brutish: we haue so much the more neede to marke that which is shewed vs here: that is to wit, that seing God hath created and fashioned vs, and that there is no parte of vs nother in our body nor in our soule, which is idle: but that ought to be applied to some vse: wee ought to make all those things auayleable which God hath giuen vs. Seing also that we are so buzied in our earthly cares, that some marre themselves with eating and drinking, and are alwayes at their gluttony and riot: and other some are busie in pintching and gathering, and desire nothing but to heape vp more and more: and other some followe their whoredome, and other some their ambition, to get them estimation and credit in the worlde, let vs bethinke our selues better. Seing then that we be hilde so fast here beneath, what is to be done? Let vs indeuer to turne away from all these pluckings backe, and consider wherfore our eyes are made. Is it but onely to beholde the things that may serue for this life, and to luit after them, bicause our flesh liketh well of them? No: but the chiefest cause is, that we should behold Gods workes, whereby he calleth vs to him. And wherfore were our eares made? Onely to haue intercourse one with another about our worldly matters and businesse? No: but to the end, wee might be taught to come vnto our God, and to sticke wholly vnto him, and to atteyne to his heauenly glory. Seing then that in the middes of the corruptions of our body, our Lorde hath set meanes to bring vs to the sayd incorruptible benefite, namely by giuing vs the sense of hearing: ought we not to put it to that vse? if wee do not so, surely wee shall haue no excuse. Nother must we alledge that which many menne caste forth: namely, I can no skill of Gods woorde, for it is to high and darke for mee, and I cannot fasten vpon it. Yea but in so doing wee distrust God, that he giueth vs not witte and discretion to receyue the thing that is for our saluation. For he hath promised vs that he will teach the lowly. And therefore let vs distrust all our owne senses, and confesse that wee are wretched beasts, and he will inlighten vs by his holy spirit. Let vs trust in the promise that he hath giuen, namely that he will be the scholemaster of the humble and meeke, to instruct them to saluation, so that if we suffer our selues to be gouerned by him, he will bring vs into the right way, and when he hath once set vs in it, he will make vs go forwarde more and more: and although wee be nowe and then thrust out, yet will he fet vs in agayne: and although wee fall, yet will hee lift vs vp with his hande. Thus yee see still what wee haue to marke in this texte. For it is not sayd onely that the eare shall heare, that is to say, that it is created but only to heare: but it is also sayd, that it shall iudge of wordes or matters: as if Eliu should say, that our Lord hath not giuen vs the opening of our eares to receyue the doctrine that is told vs, as a poyson; but to the end to receyue the doctrine that serueth to the spirituall feeding of our soules: like as when we receyue bread and wine, we are not afrayde to eate and drinke, as though we wist not whether it were poyson or no. True it is that wee must beware of poyson, and pray God to preserue vs frō it: but are mēso foolish to starue themselves and to forbear eating and drinking, for feare least their foode bee poysopoysoned? No: for they can skill of meate to discern whether it be poysoned or no. So then let vs vnderstand, that our Lord hath not giuen vs the vse of our eares, to the end we should be afrayd to receyue the doctrine, because we thinke it to high and darke for vs: but it be-houeth vs to pray God to giue vs the spirit of discretion and iudgemēt, to the end we may apply that thing to our profit, which shall be declared to vs out of his worde: and therewithal so to gouerne vs by his holy spirit, as we may be skillfull to discern the thing that is good & profitable.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may learne to be sory for them, and to withdraw our selues from these earthly things, and be cōtented to be visited by his hand after any maner of way, acknowledging our selues to be so wretched and miserable creatures, as we deserue well to be vterly ouerwhelmed by him, and yet not forbearing to resort to his mercy, assuring our selues that he is ready to receyue vs into his fauour, and therefore desiring him to make vs cōtinually to tast his goodnesse more and more, to the ende that in passing through the afflictions of this world, we may not cease to be comforted and to reioyce in him, and to blisse his holy name, sith that he hath once shewed himself a father and Sauour to wardes vs. That it may please him to graūt this grace not only to vs, but &c.

4. Let vs chooze a iudgement, and consider among our selues vwhat is best.
5. For Iob hath sayd, I am rightuous, and God hath ouerthrowen my right.
6. I also am a lier in my right: mine arrowe is greuous vwithout any sinne.
7. VWhat man is like Iob vhe drinketh skornfulnesse as vvater.
8. He vvalketh vvith those that vvooke in iquitie, he vvalketh vvith the vvicked.
9. For he sayeth, a man shall not please God in vvalking vvith him.
10. And therefore ye men of vnderstanding heare ye mee, God forbid that there should be vvickednesse in God, or any naughtinesse in the Almighty.

When the case standeth vpon yeelding of accōt of our life, wee must not looke to have any other iudge than God, who (notwithstanding any appeale,) will giue sentēce of vs according to his owne knowledge, and then will it be in vayne for vs to repne, for wee shall gayne nothing by it. Howbeit forasmuch as men are rebellious, and cannot finde in their hearts to confesse that God is rightuous, except they be compelled to it: God vseth a maner of speech in the holy Scripture, that he is cōtented to go to lawe with vs, and that there shall be as it were some meane iudge agreed vpon betwixt him and vs. Not that any such thing can be done, but to the ende that we should be the more reproued and conuicted, in that although wee might go to lawe with him, yet would it not auayle vs awhit. And he speaketh after that maner in his Prophet Esay. Lette vs chooze men (sayeth he) to iudge betwixt you and mee. True it is, (as I haue sayd) that there is no reason why God should abace himselfe so lasse. His meening is no more but to shewe, that although wee had libertie to cye him and to pleade our case agaynst him: yet should we alwayes be overcome. After the same maner doth he deale here in this text when Eliu sayeth, Lette vs chooze iudgement, according as hee had protested heretofore that hee would not be afrayde to speake. Forasmuch then as Iob had complayned that God abashed him with his maiestie, and that he had no hearing: Therevpon Eliu sayeth, Go too, I will not so fray thee that thou shouldest colourably alledge that there is no reason for thee: but I will come peaceably to thee, and it shall be lawfull for thee to speake as thou listest. If thou hatte any thing to defend thy selfe withall, alledge it, bring it foorth, and lette it bee debated. Nowe that wee haue the naturall sense of this texte, let vs see how wee can apply it to our instruction. Firste of all then wee haue to gather, that although God haue all power ouer vs: yet notwithstanding hee iudgeth vs with such vprightnesse, as there is no fault to bee founde in it: and although wee had leaue to pleade our case, yet should wee be put to shame. And this is it which hath bene handled sundry times heretofore: namely that God vtereth not his power agaynst vs after the maner of a tyrant which putteth no difference betweene good and badde, but intendeth to trie the vtermoste of his power: no, God hath no such lawlesse power (as yee might terme it): but as his power is infinite, so are all his doings indifferent and rightfull. True it is that wee do not alwayes perceyue the reason of his woorkes, nother ought his rightousnesse to be inclozed within so small a measure as our vnderstanding: but yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs alwayes to be fully perswaded of this poynt, that God is in such wise mightie, as hee dispozeth all things with iustice and vprightnesse. Furthermore lette vs not presume to call him to the lawe, but lette vs assure our selues that wee muste before all things yeelde our selues guilty. And herewithall let vs marke also, that if we had liberty to pleade, it would not be for our profite: for wee should alwayes be founde guilty: and although that he iudgeth vs not, yet would our owne cōscience condemne vs. And therefore let vs learne to humble our selues before God, & to know that he hath such power ouer vs, as he may iustly cōfound and ouerwhelme vs, yea and that with such rightfulness, as we shal not haue one worde to answer, which he cannot disproue if he list. But let vs now come to that which Eliu treateth of chiefly here. He findeth fault with Iob for complayning that his plague was greuous, and vnderferued on his part, and that God had so peruerted his right, that he was driuen to be a lier although in very deede he had wherewith to iustifie himself. Ye see here in effect what things Eliu chargeth Iob withall. But let vs consider whether Iobs meening were so or no. I haue declared heretofore, that Iobs meening was not directly to blaspheme God, howbeit that he exceeded measure in his passions. Herken then wherin Iob did amisse. He knoweth himselfe to be a sinner: he confesseth himselfe to be so, nother sayd he that God had no cause to punish him: but yet in the meane whyle he compared himselfe with others, and thought that God handled him to roughly. Thus the chiefe thing wherein Iob over-shotte himself, is that he conceyued such a rigor in God, as he thought him to be ouerfore, and that he ought not to haue pressed him so harde, considering that he was but a filie poore creature, and that his life and strength were nothing but smoke. But herein wee cannot excuse him. For I haue tolde you afore, that in handling of a good cace he followed not a good order. Like as his aduerfaries dealing in an euill cace, vsed good arguments and substanciall reasons. Therefore as concerning Iob, although he had a rightfull cace, yet did he misguyde it. And why? For although he were patient, and determined to submit himselfe vnto God: yet did he not restrayne his passions from all excesse: like as when a Christen man indeuereth to tame himselfe, and to hold himselfe prysoner vnder the obedience of God: he cannot do it with such perfection, but that in the meane while he shall feele that the fleshe fighteth against the spirite, and that wee do not the good which we would do, as S. Paule sayeth. In which place he speaketh not of those that are fleshly, and which giue themselves the brydle in all euill: but of such as haue beste zeale to serue and please God. And surely he setteth forth himselfe for an example, saying that although he enforced himselfe as much as was possible for a mortall man, to frame himselfe wholly to the will of God: yet was he not able to bring it throughly to passe. For when the temptations are great and violent, as they were in Iob: it is impossible that wee should be so constant, as not to be shaken, and that wee should not bee tickled nor suffer much infirmite in the battels which we haue agaynst our flesh. VVee see what happened to Iacob: he wrestled with an Angell, and therefore is called Israell: that is to say, preuailing with God: but yet notwithstanding he halted, and was fayne to haue a lame hip as long as he liued: to the ende he might feele, that hee had not gotten that victory in suche wise as there was no feeblenesse in him. And that is an example and patterne for vs, that although God strengthen vs by his power, so as wee overcome our temptations: yet the same is not done without some markes of our infirmity. Euen so happened it vnto Iob: and Eliu doth iustly reprove him here. Yet neuerthelesse Elius meaning is not, that Iob intended to accuse God directly of vnrighteousnesse and crueltie: but he sheweth that he did not so glorifie Gods righteousness, as he ought to do. Truely he speaketh roughly, and seemeth to wrest Iobs wordes & to make them worser than they were: but let vs marke that it is good reason that the holy ghost should bewray the vices that are in vs, although they seeme not greate vnto vs. As for example: Iob confesseth here generally that God is righteous, yea and he knowledgeth him to be such a one euē in his own person: but yet was he tossed so roughly with his passions, that it slipped from him, to say, why doth God punish mee after this sort? There is no reason why he should do it: and if I might pleade my cace, I would shew how I haue not deserved that he should be so violent against mee. Such woordes scaped frō Iob without knowing what he sayd. Howbeit if a man examine his meaning: it is not of the worst sort. Onely he was carried away with his panges, and it could not bee that he should not be so turmoyled with his passions, as not to skirmish against God. VVhy then doth Eliu reprove him nowe with such rigor? Because the least doubt which wee can haue of Gods righteousness, and the least disputing that we can make with him, is blasphemie though it seeme not so to vs. Lette vs marke well then, that here the holy Ghost discovereth the malady that was as it were hidden, to the ende wee should vnderstande, that whensoever any fancies come in our head to darken Gods righteousness, or to deface his glory by any meanes, although we purpose them not: yet are they horrible faultes, and wee cannot condemne them ynough, nother are they veniall sinnes as the Papistes make them. For they say, that if a man doubt of Gods righteousness, yea and haue many cursed imaginations running in his minde: yet are they in deadly sinne so he consent not to them. But this is to beastly a doctrine, and yet among the Papistes menne holde it for a certayntie. Contrarywise lette vs marke well, that here the holy Ghost thundereth agaynst the conceyts that come in our thought, although wee knowe them not to be so contrarie to Gods glory: and moreouer that although wee minde not directly to accuse God, yet when wee be so intangled with wicked thoughts, and our passions tuffe vs too and fro, so as wee are not peaceable to glorifie God, and to obey him in a l respectes: wee cannot be excused, but do deserue to be reprovod, as if wee had intended to iustifie our selues and too make God guilty in respect of vs: or as if wee had charged him with iniquitie, & purposed to maynteyne our selues as though there were no fault in vs. And this ought to warne vs, to yeelde our selues alwayes guiltie without any disputing when we haue to deale with God. For although our shittes might bee allowed of menne, and that we be wont also to fall asleepe in them: yet in the ende wee shall spight of our teeth, feele that God can in one woorde ouerthrowe all our long replies, and all the fayre colours that wee shall pretend. And therefore if there come any wicked thought to diminish Gods glory, and to make vs to doubt of his righteousness: lette vs learne to knowe, that wee are already entred into blasphemie, and that we are greatly to be condemned, yea though those thoughts passe away out of hand, and that our mindes rest not vpon them.

Agayne if wee haue any thought which tendeth not to any purpose of accusing God, but onely to some intent to iustifie our selues agaynst him: it is a blasphemy. VVhat is to be done then? Let vs learne to confesse that God is righteous, and condemne our selues. For they are twoo things which cannot match together, that men should go about to cleare the miselues, and therewithal be able to glorifie God as becometh them, as he is worthy. God then neuer hath his whole right, except we be confounded and all things quite and cleane dashed, so as wee haue no defence against him, nor any thing left vs, but only to hang downe our heads. Lo what we haue to gather in the first place of this text. Neuerthelesse to the ende that this thing may be the better imprinted in our hearts: lette vs marke how Eliu sayeth here, that Iob had walked with the wicked. As now? doth Eliu accuse Iob to haue bene a despyser of God, and a man of disordered life, seing that heretofore he had protested that he had walked in suche perfection, as it was harde to finde a man like vnto him? For wee haue seene that he was the eye of the blinde, the feete of the lame, and the father of the fatherlesse, that his had had not bene shet to the poore, that he had not suffered the sides of them that were acold to curse him, that his house had alwayes bene open to such as had neede, that he had bene frendly to strangers, that although he had had credite, yet he neuer abused it, and that although he might haue bene borne out in place of iustice, yet had he walked simply and oppressed not any person. How then doth Eliu now accuse him to haue walked with the wicked? This is according to the matter that he hath taken in hand: namely that when a mā replieth agaynst the iudgement of God, he walketh not with him. Therefore lette vs marke well, that although a man be nother whoremonger, nor theefe, nor drunkard, nor murthurer, nor quarrelor: yet notwithstanding he sayleth not to be accessory of the greattest wickednesse that can be, if he glorifie glorifie not God, but haue any poynt of pryde in him, so as he cannot submit himselfe to Gods iustice, righteoufnesse, and goodnesse. Then if wee yeeld not God his due honour, wee be wicked in so doing, although the reste of our life were Angelicall. And it is a poynt which we ought to marke well. For (to our seeming) a man is righteous, so he cannot be charged to the worldward, and haue led a vertuous life. But in the meane while, think we it is no sinne, if a mā serue not god in such humility as he ought? VVhen wee haue yeelded our neighbours that which is their duetic, and God is disappoynted and robbed of that which is due to him: must we therefore needes be righteous still? No: for if I be faultie for robbing of any man, and deserue euerlasting death for the value of siue shillings: Then if I rob God of his honour, and go about to diminish his maiestie, is not that a much more haynouse crime, than all the robberies, all the whoredomes, all the murthers, all the poysonings, all the periuries, and all other things in the world? So then let vs marke well, that whereas Eliu chargeth Job, too haue walked with the wicked: it is not ment of the vices that are apparant to the worldward, as that he were a whoremonger, or a sheefe: but that he had not glorified God in acknowledging him to be righteous, but rather had contrarywise intended to condemne him: howbeit, not that he did it directly, but that he murmured agaynst God, by reason of the torment of his misery: and that although the sayde impaciency were mingled with pacience, yet notwithstanding it was to bereiected as a blasphemy, and Job was to be condemned for it as an euill doer. And hereby wee be warned, that our liuing without anoyance, and without working any deceyte, harme, or wrong to our neighbours, must be in such wise, as in the meane while our cheef regard must be of God, to walke before him in such humilitie, as his prayse may alwayes sounde both in our hearts and in our mouthes, that we may glorifie him (say I) both with heart and tong alike: and when any heartburning or incomberance commeth in our mindes, lette vs yeelde our selues guilty out of hand, and not tary till we be condemned of others, nor till God sende vs iudges to pronounce open and solemne sentence agaynst vs: nother let vs tary till he thunder from heauen, but lette eery of vs acknowledge the euill that is in himself, and mislike euen the least and slightest thoughts that can enter into our imaginacions: assuring our selues, that they be horrible and deadly sinnes. Herewithall let vs marke wel, that God will not fayle to receyue vs to mercie, sobeit that wee also be ready and willing to condemne our selues. But as for those that deale stubbornely, and will needes dispute and checke with him: they shall finde in the ende, that their wilfulnesse shall serue them to no purpose, but to put the to double cōfuzion. And so we see it is not without cause that God hath distinguished his lawe into two tables, to shew vs that the seruice and honour which we owe him, goeth foremost: and that then followeth the duety which wee owe to our brethren. The seruice of God therefore must be as the foundatiō of our whole life, so as we must glorifie him, knowing that it is the ende wherevnto hee hath created vs, and for the which he maynteyneth and nourisheth vs in this worlde. And afterward according as we are bound one of vs to another, wee muste indeuer to helpe and serue our neighbours, without hurting of any man. Ye see then what we haue to remember in this text. And now also let vs consider the maners of speach which are contayned here. VVhereas Eliu chargeth Job with this saying, I am righteous and God hath ouerthrowne my iudgement. It is not ment (as I haue tolde you afore) that Job intended so flatly and shortly to accuse God of overthrowing his right. But lette vs marke, that when a man doth so precisely maynteyne his owne right, he cannot do it without derogation to God, and without aduancing himselfe agaynst his righteoufnesse. And therefore it is a poynt well woorthy to be marked. For it will be founde, that there is not any of vs which sometime or other is not so bold as to say, that god hath ouerthrowne his right. And herewithall let vs marke well, that we would fayne be righteous when wee enter into that extremity: according also as when S. Paule speaketh of the glorifying of God, and of confessing him to be righteous, he will haue all mouthes to be stopped. So long then as men reply, and and whet their tungs to maynteyne their owne righteoufnesse: they must needes haue God to be their aduersary. And looke whensoever God afflicteth them, if they cannot yeelde to cōfesse that he is righteous in so doing, surely they aduance themselues agaynst him. Ye see then what we haue to do, if we will not haue God to set himselfe agaynst vs, and to condemne vs as guilty of lifting vp our selues agaynst him, and of accusing him of vnrighteoufnesse. VVee may well protest that wee had no such meening, but yet the thing is so in deede: and what shall we gayne by denying it, seing the holy Ghost hath giuen his determinate sentence vpon it? Thus much cōcerning the first speach that is contayned here. And whereas it is sayd, I am made a lier in myne owne right: Thereby he signifieth, that he was not admitted in his owne defence: which is al one, as if some Iudge were vnreasonable and cruell, and would oppresse some good and rightfull case by their authority. Lo how Eliu doth here vprayde Job with his blaming of God: [as if he had sayd] oh see I pray you, I must be taken for guiltie: And why? Bicause God will haue it so, for he will not heare mee in mine owne defense, he presseth mee, and my mouth is stopped, and if I alledge any reason, it shall not take place, nor be admitted. But Job ment not to steppe so far out of his boundes. Howbeit herewithall let vs beare in minde what hath bene sayd: that is to wit, that if wee acknowledge not our duetic simply, it is all one as if wee would say that God vseth a tyrannicall power ouer vs, and procedeth not by reason and equity, but disposeth things off and on, bicause we be at his pleasure. Although then that our mouth vtter no such woordes, yea and that our heart quake at the thinking of them: yet notwithstanding if we do not fully conclude that there is no defense for vs, and that we be guilty: we do still enter into pleading agaynst God, and wee must be condemned as defacers of his righteoufnesse. As touching that it is sayd immediately, but Job dronke skornefulnesse as water: it is ment that he was so dilled, as hee perceyued not that the woordes which he had vsed, were vncomely and woorthy to be reiected, and that he had deserued to be skorned as a witlesse man. Yet notwithstanding wee haue seene that Job spake many excellent sayings, yea and that he was the instrument of the holy Ghost, so as wee may gather great learning of the things that he spake. Seing it is so then, why is it cast in his teeth, that he dronke skornefulnesse as water? It is bicause that when a mans passions are so inflamed that he knoweth not what he speaketh, it cannot be but that he must be caried away after that sorte. Now if this befell vnto Job: I pray you what shall become of vs? His pacience is set downe for a rule, and I haue tolde you that the end which he had, sheweth that there is nothing better for vs thā to abide the good pleasure of God in all the chastisements which hee sendeth vs: whatsoeuer they be. And yet for all that, he is accused as a shamelesse person that drinketh lewōnesse as a fishe sucketh in water. If this be layd to his charge, and rightly: I pray you what what shall become of vs, when we see our selues a hundred times impacienter than hee, and that there needeth no furtherance to make vs chafe and fret against God? Ought we not too thinke that wee are worse than dull? So then we see in Iobs person that the holy ghost ment to shew vs what we be whē aduersities comber vs ouerfore, and that our frailtie and feeblenesse are so mingled with them, as we know not where to become, but gnash our teeth and chaw vpon our brydle, and are so straught, as we keepe neither way nor path any more. This is it then which we haue to marke in this streyne. Now let vs come to the sentēce which Eliu addeth. He accuseth Iob to haue sayd, that it profiteth not a man to haue walked with God. This walking with God importeth that a man so giueth himself to the seruice of God, as he thinketh continually to giue an accōut, and acknowledgeth in himself after this maner. he that hath created & formed me gouer-neth and guideth me, I cannot shun his hande nor scape his iudgement, and therefore I must be present before his eies, so as he shall see, not only all my works, but also my thoughts. Lo what it is to walke with God. And the holy scripture doth purposely vse that kind of speech, because mē are like Coliers sacks (as they say) which make one an other black. And experience sheweth, that when we walk without having an eie vnto god, ther is none of vs, but he taketh libertie to do euil, vnder the shadow that other are as bad as himself: and in the meane while also giueth occasion to other of his neighbors to do euil: in so much that at this day, there is not any of vs, but he giueth euill example by some meanes or other, through the vices which all of vs haue of our owne. And therefore when we walke with men, we walke in horrible confusion: all our life is like a hotchpotch, or a darke dungeon, so as nothing can be discerned in it. Behold (I say) what it is to walke with men. But what is to be done? Seeing that in walking after the worlde, we become worse and worse, and euerie man draweth his neighbors vnto euil, and he himself followeth them as fast too: Is it not a peruerting of all order? Then there remaineth nothing for vs, but to gather vs vnto God, and to frame our selues wholly vnto him. It is sayd that Enoch walked with God. And why? Because he was not peruerted, and although the whole worlde was at that time as corrupt as might be, yet notwithstanding Enoch continued vncorrupted. And wherof came that? Because he gathered his wits to him, and gaue not himselfe the bridle to deale disorderly: but although iniquitie was as a waterflood vpon the earth, yet he knew that it behoued him to walk as in the presence of God. Furthermore, this importeth also, that wee must not regarde too haue some faire shewes, as many do which think it ynough to be prayded of men, & to absteyn from euill to the worldward, and that if they haue cleare hands to outward sight, it is ynough for them. But it is nothing worth except we haue our hart pure before God. And therefore let vs mark well, that when the holy scripture speaketh of walking before God, it meeneth that it is too no purpose to haue framed our outwarde life in such fort as our vices may not appeare: but that oure consciences also muste agree therewithall, so as we be cleane rid from all wicked and frowarde affections. Thirdly, our walking before God, must be to frame our selues wholly too his lawe. For if our lyfe bee allowed of men, and that we flatter our selues with our good intents: what is it? Nothing: according as wee see in the Popedome, that suche as imagine themselves to be most deuoute, thinke that God is very muche in their dette: but yet for all that bycause they despise the holy Scripture, and leane too their owne inuentions which they haue buylded at aduenture, all is but trash and filthinesse. And therefore let vs marke, that if we will liue well, and haue a right and certaine rule, it behoueth vs to walke with God, that is to say, too walke vprightly: we must frame both our thoughts & our dedes vnto his cōmandement, & not vnto mens deuices, nor to our own imaginations. Thus much concerning this saying. Now let vs come to the principall point. How is it ment that Iob shoulde say that it shall stand a man in no stead to haue walked with God? It is bicause he was as it were astraight in his torments, and knewe not that God assisted him for that he had serued him, and conformed and ruled his life in all righteousnesse. True it is that Iob knew generally that God was righteous, & that we must not esteeme or measure his righteousnesse by the present state of the world, and the things that are seene with our eies. For ye see also that the controuersie which he had against his friends, was that the good men are afflicted and troubled in this worlde, and that the wicked do prosper, and so that God hath a higher iudgement which hee reserueth to himselfe, and therefore that we must not restraine our vnderstanding to the things that we see presently, nor thinke that God doth in this worlde render euery man that which is prepared from him: for it were too much brutishnesse to haue any such thought. Iob the hath discussed this cace alreadie. But what for that. In the meane while he ceased not to be as it were dazeled whē he came to thinke vpon his afflictions. He was so caryed away, that he asked, where am I? What haue I woon by giuing my self so to the obeying of God? Forasmuch thē as Iob was so disinayd, & started aside: he is iustly vpbroyded with the vttring of this blasphemie, that it shall not boot a man to haue walked before God. And hereby we be warned to bridle our selues, whē we behold the things that are done in this world: and not to fall into imagination to say, why doth God dissemble thus? Why doth he suffer his Church to be turmoyled so? Why are there so great outrages done? I say let vs bridle our selues short. And why? for if we do but imagin that any of these things are straunge, it is asmuch as if we blasphemed God. True it is that our lord imputeth not that blasphemie vnto vs: howbeit, that is of his own goodnesse: neuertheles we are guiltie of it. And here in the person of Iob the holy ghost reprobeth vs, to the ende we should mislike of such blasphemie and abhorre it, and that as soone as there cometh any euill imagination in our thought, we should put it away, knowing that the same would leade vs too a greater blasphemie if God withhild vs not. Furthermore, let vs marke, that it behoueth vs to be so much the warer in that behalfe, because we see that Gods seruants haue bin so tossed with that tempest. True it is that when Ieremie asketh why the wicked prosper, & why God fauoreth thē, (as it seemeth) he protesteth that god is righteous, & that his iudgements are rightfull, & he vseth this preface for a bridle. Lord (saith he) I know that thou art righteous: but yet for al that he escapeth not vnshaken. VVe see what Abacuk sayth in the same respect. Abacuk doth the like, & therein he sheweth that he was restrayned with the fear & reuerence of god, but yet was he troubled in his mind. David cōfesseth that there hapned much more vnto him. For we see how he said, then haue I washed my handes in vaine, & my giuing of my self to al righteousnesse, & my indeuering to serue God hath bin but lost time. Seeing that David came to that point, I pray you what shall we looke for? And so it is true that he reprobeth himselfe, and therewithall confesseth that his foote was vpon yee, so as he was readie to fall. And afterward he addeth, Lorde I am a beast, I am no more a man, nor worthe to be called a reasonable creature, but am become vtterly brutish like an Ass or an horse, and therefore Lord thou must holde me with strong hande, or else I am vndone. Seeing that Dauid confesseth that hee was not exempted from such temptations: I pray you how shall we do, as I said afore. And this is the cause also why Esay vttereth this saying, Isa. 3. b. 10. (say ye there is a reward for the righteous) not as a common saying but as a singular one. He exhortheth the faithfull to conclude, & fully to resoue themselves, that there is a reward for the righteous: that is to say, that they shall not lose their labor in seruing God. This seemeth too be a common saying, and yet notwithstanding the Propheet Esay maketh a singular one of it. And the reason is, because things are out of order in the world, as they shall be at all tymes, and therefore the faythfull are (to their owne vnderstanding) vtterly dismayde, saying: why doth God afflict vs with such rigour? VVe be readie too murmur immediatly, yea and wee should fall too blaspheming of God, were it not that he holdeth vs backe, and declareth vnto vs, that the things which he doth are not in fauor of the vnbeleeuers. So then although hee seeme to haue forgotten vs, yet notwithstanding wee must assure our selues that he will pitie vs, and that in the middes of his rigor he will assuage his stripes, yea and that we shall be discharged at his hande: for we should be ouerwhelmed a hundred thousand times, and vtterly perish, if he preserued vs not by his infinit goodnesse. Thus much concerning this poynt, wherein Iob was condemned for saying that it shall not boot a man at all to haue walked with God. It is not for that he was throughly perswaded it was so: but because he was amazed in his sorowes, and considered not Gods guiding & ordinance, as he ought to do. True it is that he alwayes knew it in part: but yet is he condemned, because hee hilde not himselfe so quiet and peafable as he ought to haue done. Then are we a hundred thousand tymes more to be condemned than he, if wee learne not to be our owne Iudges, to the ende we may be acquitte before God. Nowe it is sayde for a conclusion, God forbid that euer there should be iniquitie in God, or vnrighteousnesse in the Almighty. Here wee haue to note, what the summe of Elius wordes is, that we may take profite by the whole discourse that we shall see in this Chapter. It is, that it behoueth vs too glorifie God as righteous. That then is the summe of the whole Chapter. Surely this seemeth verie common, and that it is no neede at all to speake of it, bycause that (too see too) no man dareth denie that God is righteous. But yet notwithstanding a man shall hardly find one amongs a hundred, that acknowledgeth Gods righteousnesse as he ought to doo: but that euen they which doo it best, do fayle in some poynt. I say that euen the righteousest shall be tempted too the doubttes which I haue spoken of. What shall become then of the worldly and brutish sort, which are not acquainted with the magnifying of God, nor haue giuen their minde to it? And therefore let vs assure our selues that whosoever shall haue borne away this doctrine of confessing that God is righteous, and be throughly perswaded in it: shall haue profited greatly, not for a day or twaine, but for a hundred or a thousande yeares, if he liued so long in the worlde. Howbeit it behoueth vs to consider after what sort wee should confesse God too be righteous. Truly this matter cannot as nowe bee treated of at length, but yet must I speake a worde of it, to open a gap to that which shall followe. After what sort then do we confesse God too be righteous? It is when his onely and single wyll counteruayleth all reason with vs, and that wee be fully perswaded that all things which God doth are good & rightfull, although we know not the reason why he doth them. For if a man will acknowledge God to be righteous, no further than hee himselfe is able to conceyue in his braine: what a thing were it? Should God not be subiect vnto vs? But wee must fully conclude in our selues, that God is righteous. And why? Because his will is the rule of all righteousnesse, insomuch that whatsoever proceedeth of him, it behoueth vs too honour it, although we finde it straunge to our imagination. And although it seeme to vs that it ought not to be so: yet notwithstanding let vs be restrayned with such reuerence, as to confesse that forasmuch as God is the fountaine of all righteousnes, it behoueth vs to think all his doings good. Thus ye see in the first place what we haue to mark. And againe let vs acknowledge this rightfulness in all things that come to our imagination, in such wise as we may alwayes beare in mind, that God is righteous. As how? VVe see the wicked reigne, and haue their full scope, and that greueth vs, and too our seeming God is all that while a slepe in heauen: and when he remedieth not things at the first dash, we thinke he doth not his dutie. But yet neuertheless it behoueth vs to confesse, that God is righteous in all these things. Againe when wee be troubled and afflicted, one while in our goodes, and another while in our persons, and we see that the whole Church in generall is trampled vnder foote, and subiect to the tyranny of the wicked. What is to be said to it? Yet must we still acknowledge and confesse that God is righteous. And seeing it is so, let vs tarry till he shewe vs why things go so vntowardly to our seeming: and let vs assure our selues that his disposing of things after that sort is not without cause. Wherefore let vs shet our eyes when things go cleane contrarie to our liking, and let vs onely settle our selues vpon the sayde poynt to say, Lord thou art righteous, and I will content my selfe with thy rightfulness, vntill thou make mee to enter into thy sanctuarie, and there perceyue why thou orderest the state of mankinde after that sort. Truly if I should followe mine owne fancie as now, I should murmur, yea and repine agaynst thee, too see how things are confounded heere. But forasmuche as wee knowe that thou gouernest the whole worlde by thine infinite wisdom and iustice: it is meete that thou shouldest be allowed, and that we should confesse that thy disposing of all things after that sort is rightfull, although we perceyue not the reason why. Thus ye see how we ought to practise this lesson in effect.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good god with acknowledgemēt of our faults, praing him to make vs so to feele them, as we may be sory for them, that we may hate our wicked life past, and do our indeuer hereafter to frame our selues to his will, that he may receyue vs to mercy: and that in the meane while he will so gouerne vs by his holy spirit, as we may seeke altogether to please him, and to frame our life to his holy seruice. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heavenly. &c.

10. God forbid that there should be vnrighteousnesse in God, or iniquitie in the Almighty.
11. For he shall render vnto man according to his vvorke, and cause euerie man to finde according to his vvayes.

12. God will not condemne for naught, neither will the Almighty ouertthrow right.
 13. VVho is he that hath visited the earth besides him? or vvho is he vvhom hee hath set ouer the vvorld? or vvho hath builded it?
 14. If he turne his hearttowards him, and dravv avvay his spirit and his breath.
 15. Then shall all flesh faile together, and man shall returne into dust.

We haue to lay fourth this sentence which seemeth to be meetly common, namely, that there is no vnrighteousnesse in God. Every man confesseth it, but fewe do know it, and are fully perswaded of it. If we be at rest, and God do to vs as we desire, it is easie for vs to consent that he is righteous: but so soone as wee be troubled, and any harme or aduersitie do cumber vs, we fall to grudging, and acknowledge no more that God is righteous, as wee had done before. Therefore it is not inough for vs to protest in one worde that God is righteous: but the cheefe poynt of it, is to acknowledge all his doings to be good, and too submit our selues willingly to his mightie power when we come to the practising of it: so as if he afflict vs, we enter not into pleading with him, nor be discontented that he gouerneth vs otherwise than our desire doth craue. Ye see then what we ought to consider in this text, where it is shewed vs, that there is no vnrighteousnesse in God. To be short, vntill we be come to so much reason, as to be quiet, and obedient vnto God in all things that he dooth, although things fall not out too oure fancie, purpose or iudgement: wee accuse God vndirectly of vnrighteousnesse. And why? Hee gouerneth the whole worlde, nothing shall happen but by the disposition of his ordinance and power. Then if we finde fault in the things that happen, is it not a bending of our selues against him that hath all power? So then let vs learne to submit our selues to gods providence, confessing that all his doings are good: and then shall we count him righteous, and yeeld him his due prayse. But if wee replie against him, and fret and finde fault at his doings: it is as much as if we blasphemed him by calling him vnrighteous. True it is that it cannot otherwise be but that in our afflictions, we shall haue some heartburning: but yet must we subdue our passions, and holde them as prisoners, and conclude in our selues that sith that God is wholly good and wise, hee dooth not any thing otherwise than reasonably and vprihtly. Thus ye see howe wee ought to fight agaynst our passions, when they rise in vs, and prouoke vs too aduaunce our selues agaynst God. Nowe let vs see howe Eliu proueth that there is no vnrighteousnesse in God: he saith, that he will render vnto men according too their workes, and make euerie man finde according to his wayes. This ought to be wel noted. For to knowe that God is righteous in himselfe, is not all that is to be done: his righteousness is not so shet vp in his being, as that it shoulde not be knowne vnto vs: but it extendeth euery where, and must be knowne cheefly in vs. VVill we then know how God is righteous? Let vs looke euery where about vs, and we may well espie his righteousness, in considering that the world is gouerned by him with such equitie, as there is no fault to be found in it. And surely if euery man be called into his right aray there is none that shall haue occasion to complaine, but all men must needs confesse, that his bearing with them is of his infinit goodnesse, and that his punishing of them is by his rightfull rigour. Lo what we haue to gather as now vpon the reason that Eliu alledgeth. And it is a very notable poynt as I haue sayd afore. For whereas he speaketh to vs of Gods righteousness: we must not imagin that he is righteous onely in himselfe: but consider his righteousness as it becommeth vs, and extende it as we ought to do, that is to wit, to the whole gouernment of the worlde. In what wise then is God righteous? Bicause he guideth all things vprihtly: and looke whatsoever we see, it behoueth vs to allow it as rightfull, bicause it proceedeth from him: I meane not the sinnes that men commit: but I meane that God disposeth all things in such wise in his souereyne providence, as it behoueth vs too thinke all things good that proceed from him. And therefore when any of vs, commeth to examin himselfe: let him vnderstand, that there is no couert for him too pleade agaynst God, neither can God be accused of cruelty, nor any man say that he mistreateth him: but he must of necessitie allowe his rightfulness in his gouerning and guiding of vs. Furthermore, if we will comprehend this matter, and be throughly perswaded of it: euery of vs must first search himselfe, and consider aduisedly what a one he is. For what is the cause that we are so waywarde, and that whatsoever God do vnto vs, hee cannot content vs, but we are alwayes so malapert as to lift vp our selues against him: but that woe bee blinded with vaine selfsoothings, and euery of vs thinketh himselfe to be righteous, bycause wee thinke not vpon our sinnes. And therefore if we once haue the skil to know well our owne faultes: it is certaine that all replying agaynst God, will cease and be dispatched, so as euerie of vs will come humbly and say, Lorde thou hast handled me after such a sort as I must needs acknowledge thy righteousness and glorifie thee. But what? VVe cannot forbear to beguile our selues. And although wee haue not any thing to replie: yet will wee alwayes lessen our faultes, yea and couer them though they be neuer so notorious. And forasmuch as we be so fast asleepe in our sinnes through our hypocrisy: it is easie for vs to lift vp our selues agaynst God. Therefore if men bee desirous to acknowledge that God is righteous, to the end to yeeld him his deserued prayse: the true remedie is, first to make their owne inditement, and to accuse and condemne themselves: and then will it be no hard matter to them to acknowledge that God is righteous. For they be sufficiently conuicted in themselves, that hee hath not mistreated them nor done them any wrong, but that his chastising of the hath bin for their offences: and that although he hath vsed some rigour towards them, yet notwithstanding he hath alwayes borne with them of his goodnesse & mercie. Thus yee see in effect what wee haue to beare in minde. And therewithall let vs marke, that when it is sayde, that God will render vnto a man according to his workes, and make euerie man to finde according to his wayes: It is no: so ment as though God punished the breakers of his lawe out of hande, and mainteyned the good: but it is to shewe that God doth no man any wrong. Then may it well come to passe (as it happeneth dayly) that God will beare with the wicked for a time: for it is seene that he maketh no countenance when men runne ryot in all euil, nor seemeth to thinke vpon them, nor to see them. Ad that is the cause also to harden the wicked to make them the bolder. For vnder the colour that God punisheth them nor out of hande, it seemeth to them that they be quite scaped and discharged. So the god doth not alwayes punish euil doings out of hand, nother doth Eliu meene that he doth so. But in the end when God hath delayed a long time, & prolôged the term of the wicked: at length he will shew that although he wayted for their repentance, yet he forgat not their misdades, but registred them before him, and packed them vp vpon a great heap, to increase the terror of his wrath. Their delay therefore shall be dearly solde vnto them, when they shall haue so abused gods pacience, who forbare to punish them at the first, to the ende they shoulde haue leysure to knowe their faults, & to amend them. Mark this for one point: namely that God executeth not his iudgement at the first day in such sort, as we may perceyue with our eyes that he recompenceth euery man according to his workes. And in good fayth what a thing were it, if he should punish sins, forthwith as they deserue? VVe would not looke for any other day: for all should be accomplished in this worlde.

Rom. 2.4.5.
Ro. 14. b. 10

And then where were the article of our faith concerning our rising againe, and our côming before the iudgement seate of our Lord Iesus Christ? To be short, there shoulde be neither reward for the good, nor feare for the wicked and rebellious. And this also is the cause why it is purposely said in the holy scripture, that God will render recompence, or requite. Saint Paule speaking of the righteousness of God, sayth not that he will recompence frô day to day, but that he wil recompence. And when At the last day. Eliu saying is not agaynst this sentence. But when he sayth, that God will render, he presupposeth the thing that is true: namely that it behoueth vs to hold our minds at a stay, vntill God shew vs the things that are hidden from vs for a time. Our fayth (I say) must bee exercised in wayting patiently for the things that we perceyue not as yet. It is ynough for vs that God giueth vs some tokens of his iustice, and sheweth vs some notable examples, whereby wee are inforced to feele, that hee hath an eye vnto men too punish their offences. If God giue vs any recordes of it, let vs bee contented, and in the meane while bee patient, vntill wee knowe the things that hee as nowe reserueth too himse. Thus ye see how wee must take this sentence to apply it too oure vse. The seconde poynt is, that God doth not so recompence euerie man according too his workes, but that hee also beareth with them whome hee punisheth, and sheweth them some fauour, although that on the one syde hee bee rigorous too them, and make them feele that hee is their Iudge. Howebeit, that is too do vs too witte, that as in respect of the worlde, God passeth not to punish our sinnes, itt suche measure as they doo deserue. For what a thing were that? Hee shoulde not sende vs diseases, wantes, and suche other things: but hee shoulde thunder vpon vs, and ouerwhelme vs at the first blowe, so as wee shoulde not feele some terrible punishment, but hee shoulde arme himselfe in his mightie Maieslie too confounde and ouerwhelme vs. For what are our sinnes? So then let vs marke that God punisheth not sinners oute of hande, and maketh them too feele his vengeance in full measure, as they haue deserued it: but beareth with them so, that all the chastizements which wee receyue in this worlde, are but Gods warnings, in giuing vs leysure too repent. Not that the same shall profite all men: for the wicked are condemned alreadie, by cause they be past amendment, and God hath not onely framed their indrement, but also sette downe their condemnation, which is readie too bee executed whensoever hee wil. Howsoever the worlde go, if wee consider well the chastizementes that God sheweth vs in this world: all of them are nothing comparable vntoo our sinnes, but hee giueth vs respice too the ende

we shoulde think: vpon them. Thus see you yet one other poynt which we haue to marke in this text. And the thirde is, that God doth not so recompence men according to their wayes, but that he reserueth power too himselfe to pardon those whom he listeth, when he intédeth to bring them back to himself. God doth not punish his chofen. And why? For it pleaseth him to receyue them to mercie, and to be at one with them of his own free goodnesse. And in so doing he burieth their sinnes, so as he entredeth not into iudgement with them, as it is sayde in the Psalme. God then hath libertie to put away our offences without punishing them: and yet the same is no derogation at all to his iustice. And why? For when God listeth to forgiue our sinnes, howe dealeth he? Hee nourisheth not the euill in vs: but he toucheth vs with it, and sheweth vs it, and maketh vs to feele how sore we haue offended him, and afterwarde giueth vs a minde to be sory, and to mourne for our sinnes. VVhen we be so touched with repentance, wee become Iudges of our owne faultes, and condemne them: and by that meanes God hath executed his office. For it is muche more when a man condemneth himselfe, than if hee were condemned of God, and gnasheth his teeth, and aboade still vnmenadable and stubborne in his wickednesse. Therefore God forgetteth not his office, when hee draweth vs too repentance: For hee pardoneth not our sinnes too the intent too cocker vs, but contrariwise, too the intent too double his righteousness, so as on the one side we may feele the euill that wee haue committed, and on the other side, hee may make his mercie shine vpon vs, too discover the miseries wherin we were till he had set vs free from them.

And therefore let vs marke well that Gods forgiuing of the offences of his chofen, is no derogation at all to his iustice, that this saying shoulde not be alwayes true, that hee recompenceth men according too their workes, and maketh them finde according too theyr wayes. Nowe wee see the thing that I haue touched: which is, that to glorifie God in his righteousness, it behoueth vs alwayes to be perswaded in our afflictions that we suffer not any thing wrongfully, but that God hath reason to chastise vs, and that if wee enter intoo quarelling with hym, wee shall but make oure case the worser. And furthermore, let vs vnderstande, that God dooth so beare with vs throughe his goodnesse, as wee haue alwayes cause to perceyue that wee are exceedingly bounde vnto him, for that hee vseth no extreme rygour agaynst vs as he ought to do.

Finally, let vs vnderstande, that although he make vs feele his vengeance: yet he spareth vs, and that although he shewe himselfe rough and sharpe, yet doth hee intermeddle his goodnesse with it: and therefore, that hee is alwayes righteous, insomuche that men shall gaine nothing when they thinke to quit themselves: but the best for vs is, that when we see that God calleth vs, and allureth vs to come vnto him, we fall to feeling of our offences before the blowes come, and be sorie and mourne for them, so as God may bee inclined to forgiue vs. Lo what wee haue in effect too remember in this sentence. According heerevnto Eliu for the greater confirmation of it, sayth, that God will not condemne for naught, nor ouerthrowe the right. He speaketh no new thing, but ratifieth his owne matter, euen by answering vntoo that which was alledged by Iob. First therefore he sayth, that God will not condemne for naught: that is too say, men can neuer alledge that hee dooth them wrong, or that hee maketh them beleue that they haue done amisse, [when they haue not,] according as oftentimes a poore innocent innocent shall bee oppressed among earthly Iudges, by charging him with a thing of nothing, wherein he is not faulty, and yet he must be faine to passe that way, & there shalbe false witnessers to face him downe though he were the righteouslest man in the worlde. There then a man may oftentimes bee punished wrongfully and without cause. But it is not so with Gods iustice: he needeth not to shew why, or to keepe great registers for proofes or for excuce of himselfe when he is slaudered by men: euery man carieth his owne indytement written and well sealed in himselfe. I say we need none other Iudge than our owne conscience, and though euery man knowe it not presently: yet will God waken vs wellinough, spight of our teeth: and when we shall haue flattered our selues a long time, yet must we returne to this poynt to bee conuicted, namely that he had iust cause to punish vs. And this is the cause also why Eliu addeth, that God will not ouerthrow the right. For when we haue no better shift, we flee to this startinghole, that God is almightie and dooth what he list, and we cannot resist him, and that he dealeth crossly and ouerthwartly with vs. And although we speake not so: yet haue wee suche crooked thoughtes, so that vnder the colour that God is Almighty, and that we bee poore and fraile creatures, we woulde make him beleue that he tormenteth vs to fore. But contrariwise, it is sayd, that God peruerteth not the right: that is to say, that he neuer punisheth men without a continuall respect of bearing with them, according as hee knoweth to be expedient. And if there were cause to spare them any more. Surely he would do it, bicause he knoweth what is meete for them. So then let vs praetize well this lesson of humbling our selues before God whensoever he chastizeth vs: let vs keepe our mouthes shutte that wee replie not agaynst him, and there withall let vs bee meeke, and let not hypocrisie blinde vs too sooth our selues in our misdoings. Thus ye see in effect, howe it behoueth vs to condemne our selues, and therevpon to acknowledge that God is righteous in punishing vs, and that he ouerthroweth not the right that is in vs: so as if we haue a good case he will mainteyne it himselfe, and we shall neede neither Proctor nor Aduocate: for he himselfe will bee our warrant, as who desyret nothing so much as to quit vs. So then if we bee condemned by him, wee must passe that way, and acknowledge that we haue well deserued it. True it is, that this will well be sayde ingenerall: but it behoueth euerie one of vs particularly, and in respect of his owne person, to haue this lesson well printed in his minde. And specially when wee bee beaten with Gods scourges, so as one of vs is pinched with pouertie, another with sicknes, and a third with some wrong that is done vnto him: on what side soeuer any aduersitie come vpon vs, let vs acknowledge that it is the hande of God which visiteth vs. And why? There is good reason that we shoulde do so. For wee bee wretched sinners, and ranke rebelles agaynst him: and wee must not go aboute to qualifie our faultes and to say that Gods punishments are vnmeasurable, as though hee had no cause too punish vs. But contrarywise, though hee shoulde execute a muche greater rygour, yea euen to the vtter ouerwhelming of vs: yet let vs confesse that it were not too muche, considering that our finnes are come to their full measure. Yee see then after what sort wee ought too vnderstande this sentence. And after ward he addeth, who is he whom God hath ordeyned too set ouer the worlde besides himselfe? Albeit that the woorde whiche Eliu vsith here doth sometimes signifie to visite: forasmuche as the sense is all one, we need not to stande muche vpon the worde. To bee short, Eliu ment to say, that there is none but God whiche governeth the worlde, and that he hath not any fellow, neither is there any other creator to haue buided the heauen & the earth, but he hath all in his hande, and guideth and governeth all his creatures at this day: so as nothing is done without his will. Ye see in effect what Eliu ment to say here. But it should seeme that this reason is not fitte to mainteyne the righteousness of God. For his mightinesse is not in question here: and besides that, (as I haue touched a litle) sometimes vnder the colour that God is Almighty, men would accuse him of tyranny, as though he had no regard of our infirmitie and weaknesse. Marke then howe men take occasion to aduance themselves agaynst God by confessing his almightinesse, saying: It is true that he is the soueraine, but yet it foloweth not therefore that he hath not good flay and government of himselfe as he ought to haue. For albeit that men vex & torment his seruants: yet it seemeth that he passeth not for it, nor hath any regarde of them. But contrariwise, Eliu intendeth to shew, that God is righteous. And how sheweth he it? For he onely (sayth he) governeth the worlde. This seemeth to be nothing to the purpose. But when all is well considered, it is a peremptory reason (as they term it) and sufficient ynough to stop al our mouthes. And this is it which he meeneth by this which he addeth immediately after: namely, shall be whom is varihteous gouerned True it is that in respect of the worlde, the wicked shall sometimes gouerne. And why? For behold kings which are borne of women, come to the crowne by heritage, and so likewise the princes. And they bestow offices vpon their bawdes, and vpon men of no value, as it is well knowne what maner of ones these Courtiers are: or else they sell the offices, and so all iustice goeth to wracke. And how are things handied where gouernours are ordeyned by electiō and voice of the people? Not in the feare of God, nor in reuerence, as though they ment to ordeyne officets that shuld raign with iustice: but with flocking into tauerns, & there they comit the shamefullest things that cābe. Then seeing that kings and their officers & magistrates that go by election, come to their degree by so diuelish meanes: the wicked must needs raigne. But it is not so with God. And why? Bicause that naturally he hath the souerein dominion of the whole world, & the same is due vnto him: he was not chosen to it by rascals that woulde faine haue all confusion to raigne, and which choose such as shoulde support the in their euill, and do nothing but ouerthrow all good order & cōmon weale. God was not chosen in a Tauerne by parcialitie, bribery, and wicked praetises: he was not called to his office by fauour: neither hath he it by successiō of heritage, as though his Peers had agreed that he should succeed after a mortall father: there is none of all this in him. VVhat then? He hath the government of the world by nature: insomuch that the immortal being of God, & his authoritie of gouerning, are things inseparable. And this is it which is said in the .xviii. chap. of Gen. by Abraham. For there Abraham reasoneth that it is impossible that God should do any crueltie or outrage. Can he that is Iudge of the worlde (sayth Abraham) destroy the good with the wicked? Now when Abraham sayth so he meeneth not to counsell God to bethinke himselfe as one of vs might counsell a mortall man, as Moyses speaking to the Iudges, and likewise Iosaphat say, bethinke your selues, for ye sit not in the seate of a creature, but the liuing god hath called you into this throne, & whosoever sitteth there, must not raign as a man, but as the lieutenar of God. So then we may well admonishe earthly Iudges of their office. And why? For they may erre, yea & we see that men do more cōmon vsware aside vnto euill, than hold themselves vnto good and that is, both bicause they ere wholly giuen vnto euill, and also bicause there is no such vertue and stedfastnesse in most of them as ought to be, but though there be a good will, yet is there no such zealous indeuer as were requisite. Thus ye see howe the earthly Iudges had need to be put in minde of their dutie. For why? they discharge not themselues as they ought to do. But when Abraham alledgeth vnto God, that it is not for the Iudge of the worlde to condemne the good with the wicked, he saith it to another ende: namely to shewe that God cannot transforme himselfe, that he should not be alwayes righteous as well as he is God. Then is there nothing more peculiar vnto god than equitie, & if we accuse God of vnrighteousnesse, it is asmuch as we would make him not to be at all. And why? For he is not God to be an Idoll, or to be a dead & idle thing: but he is God to gouerne the world. he hath his souerain maiestie in such wise in himselfe, as he must needs be a Iudge: and being a Iudge, he must needs be so vpright, as there may bee nothing amisse in him. According here vnto Eliu sayth now, that all things which he gouerneth must needs be done rightly, & that there can be no vnrighteousnesse in him. And why? Bicause he hath created the worlde, and mainteyneth it vnder his protection & guiding. Thus haue we the true vnderstanding of this text: & now remaineth to gather the doctrine that is fit for our instruction. And first of a let vs mark wel, that God hath not created the world to leaue things to hauocke, that fortune (as they terme it) might gouerne all: but he intendeth to mainteyning of his creatures as he doth. Therefore when we call God the maker of heauen and earth, we must not restraine it too one instant: but we must beare in mind, that like as God hath framed the world, so all power is still in him, and he disposeth things here beneath, so as he hath a care of vs, and the heares of our head are numbred. yea and he guideth our footesteps, so as nothing cometh to passe, which is not foreappoynted by his prouidence. Lo what we haue to mark. And it is expressly said that besides him there is none set ouer the world, nor none set ouer the earth: and that is to betoken, that his creating of the world, & his gouerning of it, are things that go ioyntly together. The if we imagin that God gouerneth not all things, but that some things hapneth by chance or fortune: it followeth that fortune is a Goddesse that hath created part of the worlde, and so is not all prayse due to God alone. But beholde, it were a cursed blasphemie if wee shoulde thinke that the diuell could do any thing without Gods leaue: for it is alone as if we should make the diuell a participator of the world. Therefore let vs leaue that there is an inseparabie bonde betweene these two things: namely that God createth all things, and that he gouerneth all things. And that is the cause why it is expressly sayde, that God hath buylded the worlde. And do wee then thinke, that he now calleth a companion to helpe him to order his creatures? True it is, that God doth vse in ferious meares to gouerne the worlde: howbeit, that is not to diminish his owne authoritie, or for that he will haue anie companion: for he raigneth continually from aboue. What else are the greatest kings, but onely Gods handes? And hee serueth his turne by them as hee thinketh good. According as he by his Prophete Esay vprayed the proud Sennacherib, who thought himselfe to haue made all things by his owne cunning. Yea (sayth God) what art thou else, but the axe in the hande of him that heweth? If a man holde a sawe or a knife to cut withall, and too serue his turne at his pleasure, can the toole turne itsef against the man? No: but it is to shew that a man hath not onely his handes and armes to helpe himselfe withall: but also that he hath the things that are without him at his commaun-dement. Is there any power in mortal creatures, but from the liuing God? do they not holde all of him? Then are we nothing if we be separated from him. For it is hee in whom we haue our life, mouing and being. Therefore let vs vnderstande, that when God vsfeth worldly meanes, and serueth his turne by men, as by instruments: that is not to lessen or to streighten his owne authoritie, but contrariwise to shew that he hath the guiding of them, & that if he do but commaund or whistle as hee himselfe saith, men must needs go forwarde to execute his will, yea & the verie diuels of hell are compelled vnto it. And although they bee vnwilling, and that it be vtterly against their intent: yet notwithstanding God driueth them by violent power, to execute the things that he hath ordeyned in his prouidence. And so we see nowe after what sort we must consider Gods prouidence: namely that hee hath a care of the whole world, and watcheth ouer all his creatures, not onely to foresee what may happen, (as some fantastical persons imagin that God beholdeth the things as it were aloof, which are here beneath, & then prouideth for them afterwarde) but also (which much more is) that nothing may be done which he hath not determined, so as his will is the rule of all things. Thus ye see what is shewed vs in this text. And therefore it behoueth vs too minde well the prouidence of God, too the entent that when any aduersitie befalleth vs, wee may alwayes go to the first cause. True it is, that diuerse tymes men shall doo vs wrong, as wee see how they had robbed Iob of all his goodes. Men then may spoyle vs of our goods by deceyte or violence, or they may oppresse vs by slaunders and wicked reportes, yea and a man may be wrongfully slaine. In these things it behoueth vs to acknowledge Gods prouidence as Iob hath done. He set not himselfe against the theeues which had robbed him, but sayth the Lord hath giuen, and the lord hath taken away: & yet notwithstanding Saran had bin the worker of it. But Iob knoweth that God which made the worlde, doth alwayes watch to gouern & guide it, as is shewed here. And therefore wheloeuer we be afflicted, although the same come from men, so as they do vs wrong and outrage: let vs assure our selues that God holdeth the raynes of the bridle aboue, and that it is his will to haue vs so afflicted, & that it behoueth vs to receiue the same at his hand as of oure Iudge, that we may enter intoo the consideration of our finnes & yeld our selues guiltie as hath bin said not long since. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. And truly when wee see the wicked beare sway heere beneath, let vs knowe that it is a part of Gods iustice. Whereof commeth it, that things are so troubled, and that some men attaine to offices by wicked bryberie and parcialitie, and other some by purchaze, too the ende anon after to make their hande againe of the poore people, by fleecing one, and deuouring another. It is because God perceyuing vs vnworthie to be gouerned by him, giueth the brydie too Satan. Ye see then that all the wrongs which raigne are Gods scourges for our finnes, as wee haue seene heere tofore. Seeing it is so, it behoueth vs to consider, that when the Princes and Iudges of the earth are wicked, God intendeth too giue a greater gloffe to his owne iustice, that it may be knowne vnto vs howe it is hee that afflicteth vs, and by that meane punisheth the offences which we haue committed, shewing that we deserue not to haue him come neere vs, but rather to withdraw himselfe from vs, and to make vs feeble that bicause wee are disordered and haue shaken off his yoke, and are become as wilde beastes, we are worthie to haue the diuell raigne ouer vs, & the wicked men which are his vnderlings and of his setting vp. So then wee see that that God deserueth to be glorified in all respectes, whatsoever troubles we perceyue in this worlde : and that it behoueth vs alwayes to come to this point, that seeing he is almightie, it is impossible that hee shoulde doo any wrong. He is no worldly prince reigning at other mens pleasures, nor set vp by wicked practises and policies, but he is the same by nature, and as he is God, so also can he not be but righteous : for his righteousnesse cannot bee separated from his mightinesse, as I haue said afore. Now herewithall Eliu addeth, that if God turne his heart vnto vs to take away his spirit and breath, all fleshe shall fayle, and by and by we shalbe changed to dust. Here Eliu matcheth Gods mightinesse with his goodnesse. And so he sheweth, that when we be governed by Gods hande, we must needes feele that he is good and mercifull towards vs, in that we perish not euerie minue of an houre. And why? For what needeth there more to turne vs into dust, and too bring vs vtterly to nothing, than onely the loke of God? It is sayde that if God do but blow vpon men, immediately their freshnesse chaungeth and withereth, and fadeth away. VVhen the Prophet Esay speaking after that maner of the strength of men, likeneth it to an herbe or flowre : he sayth, that if God do but breath vpon vs, hee sereth vs vp as a blasting winde sereth the grasse, and that is it which is sayde in the song of Moyfes. True it is, that there is vsed an other comparison, howbeit it tendeth to the same ende : which is, that if God withdraw his spirit and breath, we perish. According also as it is sayde in the hundred and fourth Psalme. And it agreeth moreouer with the text that I haue alledged out of S. Paules Sermon in the seuenth Chapter of the Actes of the Apostles: namely that we haue our life, mouing, & being in God. Seing the that we haue no being any longer than it pleaseth God to shed his spirite vpon vs : If he withdraw that power, we must needes perish out of hand. VVe see then that the creatures continue no longer in their being, than it pleaseth God to mainteyne them : and that alsoone as hee withdraweth that power, by and by all returneth too nothing. For a conclusion, the thing which we haue touched standeth fast : namely, that Gods mightie power is heere so matched with his goodnesse, as wee ought too knowe that he neuer vttereth any such rigour agaynst vs, but that he therewithall also spareth vs, bicause we should perish euerie minue of an houre, if he listeth to withdraw his spirite from vs. For what is there in vs if we consider our owne strength ( Haue wee any meanes too preferue our selues? VVhat moueth God to mainteyne vs? Are wee worthie to inioy the benefites that he bestoweth vpon vs? No it is nothing so. Againe, I pray you what bonde is there betwixt him and vs? Furthermore what is our strength? VVhat meanes haue we? None at all. Then must we conclude, that there is no cause why God should preferue the worlde, but for that he himselfe is good and the fountaine of all goodnesse, so as hee is not moued by any outward reason to bestow the great number of benefites which we receyue daily at his hand : but only that it pleaseth him to make vs feele his mercie and gracious goodnesse by experience. Thus ye see that the onely life which we haue, is a sufficient recorde howe gracious and mercifull God is towards vs : and that although we were handled as roughly as were possible, so as we did but pine away, and were cumbred with continuall trouble and aduersitie : yet notwithstanding we bee conuicted by our onely breathing, that God maketh vs to feele his goodnesse. And why? For wee liue not but in him, and by him : and if he withdraw his spirite, we by and by perish and turne to dust. But yet is life a precious thing whatsoever come of it. Thus ye see that men are alwayes indetted vntoo God howsoever hee deale with them. True it is that this poynt deserueth to be layd out more at large. Howebeit forasmuche as the time will not suffer it : it shall suffice that euerie of vs do beare in minde the things that I haue touched, and that wee looke neerely too our selues, and acknowledge that wee bee nothing at all, so esteeming Gods mightie power, which hee sheweth towards vs, as we ioyne it with his goodnesse, and therevpon be moued to confesse him as he is, namely by submitting our selues wholly vnto him, and by beleeuing that he so gouerneth the worlde, that he doth not any thing but by weight and measure, and that he is iust and vpright in all his workes, and that we must confesse him to be so, although it seeme straunge too our fleshly reason.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to inure vs more and more to the considering and knowing of them aright, so as we may learne, not only to confesse them, but also to condemne them in our life : and euerie of vs particularly to do the things which all of vs ingenerall are exhorted to doo, and therewithall suffer our selues too be guided by his hande, and patiently receyue all the aduersities that it shall please him too sende vs, to the ende wee may not settle our selues too muche vpon this transitorie life, but aspyre vpwarde too the euerlasting kingdome wherevnto hee calleth vs, where all our ioy and felicitie shall bee truely accomplished. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of errour, &c.

 Eccl. 5. b. 15.
 Rom. 2. b. 11.

Haue tolde you heere tofore, that men are heere put in mind of their owne fraikie, too the ende they shoulde knowe that God spareth them, and that if we abode but one minute of an houre vpon the earth, we ought to think the same a gracious turne of his. And why? If wee haue any life and breath in vs, we haue it all of God. And so we see that he maynteyneth vs of his meere goodnesse. Seeing it is so: let vs not accuse him of too great rigour. For should hee not haue iust cause to roote vs out vterly? Who is he that coule so cleare himselfe, as God shoulde haue no cause to punish him? And yet in the meane while we see, that God preferueth the world, & euery of vs is kept still in that aray, and so are wee all detters to his mercie. So farre is hee of from vsing any great rigour towards vs, that we ought rather to woonder at his pacience how hee can suffer suche iniquities, and not thunder downe his vengeance at the first brunt, and make cleare riddance of vs. Seeing it is so, ought any man to murmure agaynst him? But if we thinke it straunge that hee beareth with other men, he may well replie agaynst vs, that he beareth with vs also. Therefore let vs learne hereby to glorifie God continually in his mercie, no lesse than in his power. For although he be almightie: yet notwithstanding hee restrayneth himselfe bycause hee loueth vs. Also we haue one other verie necessarie exhortation too gather of this text: whiche is, that knowing oure owne frailtie, we shoulde learne to put our life into the hande of God, and not thinke to liue, or continue our state by our owne power, but suffer God to gouerne vs as it pleaseth him, and be alwayes readie to depart hence when he thinketh it good to take vs out of this worlde. Furthermore what is the meane to liue well? It is to knowe that insomuch as God possesseth vs, and quickeneth vs by his holy spirite, it is good reason that wee shoulde holde all of him, to the ende to bee giuen wholly too his seruice, both in liuing and dying. Were this doctrine well printed in our hearts, we should not bee such duldardes as we are: for as for the most part of men, when they rise in the morning, do they bethinke them too put themselves into the hands of God? And if they do it for fashion sake, is it for that they are touched to the quick, knowing that their life is but a little blast of winde that may vanishe away in the turning of a hande? Acknowledge they that? No: So much the more then behoueth it vs too remember the lesson that is shewed vs heere: namely that our life is but a shadowe and a vanitie. And therefore it behoueth vs to put our selues into the hand of him that he will mainteyne vs according too his good pleasure, and also take vs out of the worlde in time conuenient. But as we are counselled heere to humble our selues, and to challenge nothing to our selues of our own power: So contrariwise, we haue whereon too rest oure selues, in that wee knowe our life is not in euerie mans hande, but in the onely hande of God, who is the keeper of it. And the Scripture sayth expressly, that if he withdrawe his spirit and breath, wee die all. So long then as God will preferue vs, let vs boldly desie the diuell and all our enemies. True it is, that if we looke but vpon the rage of men, it shall seeme that they be as rauening wolues, and we as fillie sheepe. They gape with open throte to swalowe vs vp, but yet can they do nothing to vs, till God giue them leaue. And it is not without cause that he challengeth and reserueth too himselfe the power of withdrawing the breath which he hath giuen vs. Therefore let vs be contented, assuring our selues that God hol-

deth our life, in his custodie and protection, vntill he list to take vs out of the worlde, and haue caused vs to finish our course. Nowe if a man shoulde demaunde heere, whether our soules be as it were a winde, seeing it is said that we shall perish when God withdraweth his breath: let vs marke, that although men bee immortall: yet notwithstanding, they haue not that of themselves, but of Gods free goodnesse. Besides this, what else is death, but a departing of the soule and bodie asunder? God then withdraweth his breath to himselfe, when hee sendeth vs into dust and rotnesse: and yet neuertheless, he sayleth not to take vp our soules, and to kepe them til the latter day. To be short, Eliu ment to shew here, not only that we be weake and transitorie, but also that al our strength is nothing, furtherforth than it is vphilde by the onely goodnesse of God. And when he vndoeth vs to ourwarde appearance, that is to say, in effect, he doth but the thing which he had determined as hee thought good. And that is the cause why we ought alwayes to returne vnto him, and to content our selues in that he hath a fatherly care of vs, as I haue sayde alreadie. So then let vs not be like these giddie heades which trust in their owne strength, and thinke they are able to worke wonders: but rather let vs with all humilitie and carefulesse, hide our selues vnder the wings of our God, praying him to guide vs in such wise, as we may liue according to his will. Eliu hauing spoken so, addeth an exhortation, saying: If thou hast vnderstanding hearken to mee and giue care to my wordes. Here he sheweth againe, that the beginning of true wisdom, is to yeelde our selues teachable. Contrariwise, they that are so puffed vp with selfe weening as they can receyue no doctrine, are so full to their owne seeming, as no man can tell them more: Suche are vterly past recouerie. And therefore not without cause do we say, that the first entrance and foundation of our wisdom: is to suffer our selues to be taught. And why? For let vs loke into our selues, and see whether our owne reason be sufficient to know and discern all that wee haue need. Nay contrarywise, God telleth vs that wee be brutish, and that all the gay shewes that are in men, are but vanitie, and their wisdom vter follie. Seeing it is so, let vs vnderstande that we haue need to be taught at other mens handes, that God (I say) might supplie our want. And therefore whosoever desire to haue a well grounded wisdom, let them learne to hearken to the doctrine that is profered them in the name of God, and let them yeelde themselves teachable and lowly to receyue it. For if we be forepossessed with pride, we may well brag and crake afore men, yea and haue great reputation to be wise men: but beholde, God telleth vs that all is but vanitie and leasing. And this is the cause why Eliu sayth purposely, If thou hast vnderstanding beare mee. For he sheweth, that if a man haue witte and reason, hee will alwayes suffer himselfe to be taught, that he may fare the better by it al his life after. Then on the contrarie part, we must marke, that if a man stande stubburnly in the thing that he hath conceyued, and giue not men leaue to tel him their mind, nor will heare any thing at all: hee is but a foole, or rather starke madde. For it is a kinde of verie madnesse, when a man shutteth the dore agaynst all good doctrine, and weeneth himselfe to be so wise, as hee hath no more neede to be taught, but refuseth all things, and setteth a barre before him, and if he woulde say, God shall come no nerer me. So then we haue a good lesson to marke in this text: which is, that if wee will bee of a good vnderstanding, wee must she we our selues too bee so, by receyuing quietly the things that are spoken and tolde vs. And contrariwise, let vs be sure that God condemneth vs for

fooles and witleffe persons voyde of all reason, if we bee so wilde headed, as not to giue eare too the things that men speake to vs, but reiect all good warnings: I say we are no better than brute beastes, what shewe of wisdomer soeuer there be in vs. And for as much as we know, that we are rude of vnderstanding, and that the things which we are able to know, we know but in part, so as wee haue but a little taste of vnderstanding, and come short (Alas) of any perfection: it standeth vs in hande to practise this lesson all our life long. And therefore in consideration thereof, let vs bee the more moued to profite our selues. And forasmuch as God is so gracious as to speake every day vnto vs, and to continue the doctrine that is meet for the ruling of our life: let vs also continually receiue that which is brought vnto vs in his name, & still exercise our selues in it, to the ende we may bee instructed more and more in his will. Behold I say, how it behoueth vs to practise this doctrine. And therevpon Eliu to continue his matter, maketh a comparison betwene the smallest & the greatest. For he saith vnto Iob, how durst thou say to a king, thou art vnfaithfull, or vnto princes, you are wicked? If thou haddest a souereigne Lorde that reigned ouer thee, thou wouldest stand in such awe of him, as thou durstest not misse behaue thy self towards him. Then let vs see if it be not a diuelish furiousnesse, for men to presume too murmur agaynst God? For what likenesse is there betwixt them? A king may bee wicked, what maieltie soeuer he haue: and when princes and gouernors are wicked, they will very ill discharge their duties: and yet notwithstanding men beare with them, by reason of their state. But behold, God whiche accepteth no mans person, breaketh these great ones that are so honored of the world and, razeth the out as well as the little ones, shewing wel that he maketh none account of the loftinesse of his creatures. And herēvpon who dareth open his mouth agaynst him? Now then we see what Elius intent is. Howbeit, for the better vnderstanding of this text, let vs mark that although princes and gouernors be not such as they ought to bee: yet neuerthelesse God will haue them to be honored, and although that of themselues they be vnworthie of it, yet hath God imprinted his marke in them, & will haue men to do him the honor to say, very wel Lord, these raigne in thy name, and therefore it behoueth vs to be subiect vnto the. And surely this is no vaine triall. For if all such as are in authoritie did rule like good fathers, and that we saue with our eies that they had none other care but to gouern vs well: what matter were it to obey the? VVe would do it in respect of our selues, and that were no obeying of God, but only a regarding of our owne profit. Contrarywise, when wicked and frowarde persons haue authoritie ouer vs, and we see notable faults in them: If we neuerthelesse be mild to hold our selues vnder their bridle and yoke, it is a token that we reuerence god as he deserueth. Seing it is so: wee bee bounde for his sake to obey those whome he sendeth, and whome he ordeyneth to be our superiours, although they bee vnworthie of it. And that is the cause why it is sayde in the lawe, Thou shalt not rayle vpon the ruler of thy people. God sheweth well that there shall be Tyrants: and he manaceth his people with that punishment saying expressely that hee will chastize them by sending them wicked gouernours, whiche shall seeke nothing but too pill and oppresse, and too raigne in all outrage: and yet neuerthelesse hee willet men to honour them. Why so? For although they deserue not that men shoulde acknowledge them for their superiours: yet notwithstanding will not God haue those to be receiued for his sake, whiche otherwise are nothing worth? Ye see then that we must be subiect too such as haue publike power and authoritie, bycause wee knowe it is Gods will to humble vs after that manner. Yea, and we see that the children of God haue bin faine to submit themselues in bondage too the vnbeleeuers, when God did bring them too it. And truly wee see also the example that Daniell sheweth vs, for hee acknowledgeth that the raigning of the wicked is by reason of our finnes: and therefore wee must take it as a scourge of God: and if we cannot abide suche a disorder, wee striue not agaynst mortal men, but agaynst the heauenly Iudge. So wee see in effect, that wee bee bounde too honour suche as are in anie publike authoritie. And why? Bycause they bee not aduanced by haphazarde, but it is God that hath ordeyned them: according as it is written, that there is no power but it proceedeth from him. And if wee see anie disorder in it: wee must wyte it vpon our finnes: and therewithall, forsomuche as God hath established the sayde order, namely that Princes and Superiours shoulde be obeyed, and that we shoulde be subiect vnto them: it must bee obserued and kept among vs. Notwithstanding, whereas it is sayde in the lawe, Thou shalt not speake euill of the Prince of thy people: it is not meant that menne shoulde allowe the euill wheresoeuer it bee: for oughte the dignitie of a man that is but a woorme of the earth, too ouerthrowe the rightuousnesse of God? Ought not this sentence rather too haue his curse, namely, that cursed are they that call euill good? But whereas God hath forbidden priuate persons to rayle vpon theyr rulers: it is to make vs too liue in peace and without trouble, and too yeelde some reuerence too the seate of Iustice. For if that were not: there shoulde no more bee anie common weale among vs, but wee shoulde become worse than wilde beastes. Ye see then wher vnto God had an eye.

Besides this, wee knowe that when God sent his Prophetes, it was not to giue Kings and Princes power too doo euill, and no man shoulde shewe them their finnes: but rather it is sayde, Thou shalt rebuke the Mountaynes, that is too say, the highest states. And I haue purposely set thee ouer Realmes, and Kingdomes (sayeth God too his Prophetes) too the ende that all glorie shoulde be cast downe: too shewe that the woorde cannot bee preached as it ought too bee, except the preachers rebuke the faultes of such as desyle and vnhalowe the holie seate of God, by abusing the swoorde that is put intoo their hande. Then if there bee euill and wicked gouernours, they muste bee sharply rebuked according too their deseruings. And this was not sayde for the Prophetes onely: but Saint Paule declareth that wee also ought too obserue the like in preaching of the Gospell: that is too witte, wee must pull downe all loftinesse that listeth vp it selfe agaynst oure Lorde Iesus Christ. Those then that will needes bee spared, and haue their vyces vntouched, bycause they bee in some authoritie: muste go coyne a newe Gospell: of which number are the kings in our dayes, which will needes be called annoynted and holy, and yet cannot abyde too haue their fores touched by any meanes, but woulde haue libertie to peruert all things, and no man too bee so bolde as to open his lippes agaynst them. But we neede not to go so farre as too kings and princes: euen those that after a manner are nothing at all, if they come too anie small degree, thinke themselues too bee as peti-gods, and will needes bee honoured, though they bee laughed too scorne of the worlde for their labour. Albeit that men see there is nothing in them, (as in these newe promoted rascalles:) yet notwithstanding they treade all good warnings vnder foote, vnder colour that they be a little aduanced. Therefore they muste bee faine too marke this lesson, that is giuen them on the contrarie part: whiche is, that forasmuche as that loftinesse of theyrs aduanceth it selfe agaynste God, bycause it stoupeh not too the great king our Lorde Iesus Christ: it is for vs in that cace to vse the freedome that God hath giuen vs. Thus yee see that the meane too obserue this doctrine, of not rayling or speaking euill of kings and princes, is that we muste (as muche as in vs is) reuerence the seate of iustice, bycause it serueth too procure the peace and welfare of men, and too auoyde troubles and seditions: and yet notwithstanding, that such as doo amisse, must bee rebuked for all their high state and dignitie. For Gods aduancing of them is not to the intent they shoulde doo euill, and confounde all honestie: but rather too holde the brydle, and too restreyn all things from confusion. Nowe then, if we must for Gods sake and in respect of him, yeeld such reuerence to those that are of equall state with vs (sa-20 uing that God hath set them in the seate of preferment) as too bee subiect too them: what shall wee doo when wee come to his soueraine Maiestie? For men of what degree of authoritie soeuer they bee, whether they bee kings, princes, or gouernours, sayle not too bee wicked, except God holde them backe by his holy spirite. But the cace standeth otherwyse with God. For hee hath the euermore had soueraine dominion ouer all the worlde: hee was not ordeyned by wicked practyses: he was not set in heauen by Alehouse knightes, nor by I 30 wote not what Outlawes, nor yet by fauour and brybing of folke: neyther was hee chosen by wicked mens voyces, that they might say hee wil beare vs oute, wee shall haue libertie too doo what wee list. No, no: God came not too his kingdome by suche meanes: neyther is hee come too it by heritage and succession after the manner of men, nor by chaunce. But inasmuche as hee is the euerlasting God, therefore is hee also bothe King and Iudge of the worlde. Seeing hee is so: who dareth nowe open his mouth too checke agaynst him? 40 VVee feare a king: it is well done, hee is too bee feared. Also wee stande in awe of oure gouernours: and good reason it is that wee shoulde doo so, seeing that God hath honoured them. But what is the whole worlde in comparison of him that holdeth all things in hys hande? And hee needeth not too lay open his hande too holde the worlde: but, althoughe hee shette it, yet (as it is sayde in the Prophete Esay) hee will holde both kings and gouernours, and all the whole multitude of men, as one little graine of dust.

And seeing it is so, dare wee lift vppe oure selues agaynst him? VVhat a boldnesse is that? Therefore there needeth none other euidence too condemne such as chafe and sette themselues agaynst God, than the reuerence whiche they beare too men. Suche as spewe oute their iniuries after that sort when God handleth them not after their owne lyking, and murmure saying, I cannot tell what God meeneth by it: is it meete that hee shoulde plague mee after this manner? VVhy suffereth hee the wicked too doo the worst that they can, 50 and the good too bee turmoyled, and yet in the meane while hee remedyeth it not? I saye if a man shoulde aske these fellowes that make suche disputations, and are bolde too cast forth suche blasphemies, whether they durst go too them that haue the swoorde in their hande, too rayle vpon them, and too spitte in their faces, and too say you are wicked: O I dare not, would they saye. And why? Thou art afrayde of a mortall man bycause God hath giuen him some little sparke of his glorie: and commett thou too aduance thy selfe agaynste him that hath made and fashioned thee? VVilt thou make no accounte of his power before whome the whole worlde in nothing? VVilt thou check agaynst him like a madde man, and thinke too gette the vpper hande of him? VVhen thou ouershootest thy selfe after that sort, it shall bee to thy confusion. Thus yee see after what sort it behoueth vs to sende those that lift vp themselues agaynst God, vnto the similitude that is set downe here.

And likewise, euerie one of vs must of his owne accorde come too it when wee bee tempted to impacience, as surely these temptations do happen vntoo euerie man, so as wee bee prouoked too pleade agaynste oure Lorde as often as hee doth not as wee would haue him to do. Therefore when we be moued therevntoo, let vs thinke thus: what? Thou durstest not speake agaynst a king, nor agaynst a prince, that were thy soueraine & had rule ouer thee: For why? Feare brideleth thee, bicause God hath imprinted some marke of his maiestie in him. And how then darest thou lift vp thy becke agaynst him? Thou wretched creature, who art thou? It is sayde in Daniell that God sheweth well his prouidence, in that kings and princes are obeyed: for wee knowe that no thing is more contrarie to mans nature, than too bee in subiection. So then if God gaue not authoritie to suche as are set in publike state, men woulde neuer obey them. And that is the cause why it is expressly sayde, that God putteth his feare intoo all the birdes of the ayre, and intoo all the beastes of the earth, so that if men were become vterly brutishe, yet must they needes keepe still that vnderstanding, that such as are aduanced too the seate of iustice, ought too bee obeyed. And yet notwithstanding, that is but a verie small portion of Gods glorie. Shall wee then go make open waire agaynste his Maiestie? Is it not the next way to breake our necks? If wee leape but three steeptes downe, it is ynough too brooze vs, and if wee leape oute of a windowe, that is 40 but a twoo strydes high from the grounde, beholde wee are dead. Now we would leape aboue heauen, and fetch gambaldes, and kicke agaynst God, and shall we bring it about? So then wee ought well too consider the infinite glorie of our God, to humble our selues vnder it, which thing we do not. And it is expressly sayd, that he will not accept the person of the great: but without regarding eyther rich or poore, layeth his bande vpon all men, and rooteth them out in one night: and euen the strongest shall be take away with out bande. VVhen we heare this, let vs vnderstande, first 50 that suche as are greate must not truste in their riches, credit, knowledge, or any thing else. True it is, that to the worldwarde they shall be honored, and it will seeme that they are able to mainteyne themselues, bicause they bee rich, & haue well wherewith, and also bicause they are in fauor: but all these things are nothing with God. Therefore let no man be proude of his owne greatnesse. For such as stand gazing like Peacocks at their owne tayles, do but run headlong into their owne confusion. For inasmuch as they flatter themselues, they become alwayes the bolder to do euill: and that is no more but a further kindling of Gods wrath agaynst them. Yee see then, that great men ought too put this doctrine in vre, of knowing that God accepteth not mennes persons: and by the meanes thereof they ought also too looke that they trample not the little ones vnder theyr fete, and suche as are vnder theyr power. Marke heere too what ende this doctrine is applied, and to what purpose it is tolde vs, that God is no acceptor of persons. And why? To the

ende that he which hath seruantes shoulde not oppresse them, but vse them vprightly as Saint Paule declaereth : and that he which is in publike authoritie, shoulde haue such a regarde in gouerning his subiects, as to know the to be his brethren, bicause that all of vs are the children of God, and he hath done vs so much honour, as to make vs the members of his only sonne our Lord Iesus christ. So then let the great men of this world learne to absteine from swallowing vp of the little, and from vsing of outrages towards them : and let vs all learne to absteyn from aduancing our selues proudly agaynst those that be our inferiours. And why? For there is no accepting of persons before God. And if men trust so in the shadow of their riches and credite, let vs assure our selues that God will iudge them without regarde what they bee nowe, yea and that their damnation is readie prepared for them, so as they shall bee forced too feele that they are a part of the shape of this worlde which vanisheth out of hande, as Saint Paule sayth. And heerewithall let vs marke well howe it is sayd that both great and smal shall bee taken away in the turning of a hande, and that God will make all too bee wyped away at midnight, in the time when folke giue themselues to rest, and when euery man seemeth to be at his ease : yea and that the strongest shall bee taken away without hande, that is to say, without any preparation. God shall not neede too arme manie souldiours, or too prepare himselfe greatly too ouerthrowe the greatest and strongest. Hee needeth no more but too blowe vpon them, or else too turne away his heart, to the ende too drawe his spirite from them, and all shall perishe as hath beene declared heertofore. Hereby wee may bee taught euerie man in his owne state. So then let the great ones knowe, that Gods aduancing of them, is not too the ende that they shoulde dispysle others, nor vaunt themselues in oppressing the lesser sort: but rather let them knowe that they are so muche the more bounde vnto God. For what haue they of theyr owne? And seeing that all things bee giuen them : ought they not therefore too acknowledge from whence they come? About all things let them remember what S. James sayth, let the brother (sayth he) which is exalted too the worldwarde, glorie in his lowlinesse. And why? For if the rich and such as are honoured, or be men of skil and credite, do glorie in their highnesse : they forget themselues in so doing, and are vnthankful to God, and throw themselues hedlong intoo destruction. Therefore it behoueth them to looke neerly vnto themselues, to know that they haue nothing but of the meere goodnesse of God, and that forasmuch as they hold all of him, it behoueth them to dedicate themselues wholly vnto him, and not to take occasion to misintreat their inferiors, but rather to stoupe by applying themselues to their brethrens slenderesse, as S. Paule exhortheth vs to do. As touching the mean ones, true it is that they may well glorie in their greatnesse, seeing that God hath adopted them to be his children : but yet must we not therefore winke at their owne state. And specially whereasthey are nothing too the worldwarde, but are vtterly despised : let them acknowledge that they are lesse than nothing before God : sauing that it pleaseth him to preferue them by his grace. Ye see then how we haue one common lesson taught here vntoo vs all. And therefore let euerie of vs in his calling learne to referre himselfe vnto God, and to holde of him both his life and all the appurtenances thereof. Furthermore, whereas it is sayde, that God will wipe away the strongest without hande : it is too the ende, wee shoulde learne too put a difference betwixt God and men. For when the greatest princes intende too bee auenged of their cru-mies, they haue neede too arme men of warre, and too seeke meanes too bring their enterprife aboute. But if God woulde ouerthrowe and destroy the whole world, hee shoulde finde no let : hee shall not neede too craue ayde of others, or to wage men, or too busie himselfe about casting of ordinaunce, or to furnishe himselfe with other artillarie : hee needeth none of all these things. But hee can without mans hande, withoute worldely helpe, and without straying of himselfe (I say) he can destroy all. For hee needeth no more but too breathe vpon vs, or too looke sternely vpon vs, and beholde wee are ouerwhelmed. And vndoubtedly seeing that his looke maketh the Mountaynes and Rockes to melt shall hee neede to thunder vpon vs to destroy vs? Shall wee be able to abide Gods looke when he casteth it vpon vs? Shall we bee able to abide his breath when he bloweth agaynst vs? Must wee not needes vtterly quaille? Furthermore, this is purposely expressed too ridde vs of all the vaine fancies & presumptions which we haue when we bee well furnished to the worldwarde. For although men dare not say, that they are sufficiently armed too withstande God, and to ward the strokes of his hande : yet doo they thinke so. And for prooffe thereof, if yee threaten a riche man with pouertie, hee wil looke in scorne at you, and say, rusti I haue this, I haue that. Hee will not spight God with open mouth : but howsoeuer the game go, he trusteth still in his riches, and ye shal not gaine so muche at his hande, as to perswade him that his goodes shall not warrant him. The man that is strong and in the luit and flower of his age, thinketh not that euer he shall grow oide, neither can they that are in honor, skill what shame meeneth. Lo howe men presume of themselues : and it is seene cheetly, in that the great men of the worlde do stand so stoutly agaynst God, & cannot be ramed. I he if men haue any fauor or credit, they beare themselues in hand that they haue a bulwark agaynst god and make a rampire of worldly helpe. And not onely so, but also if a man come too tell them their faultes, Gods corrections can haue no place nor entrance vnto them, no, they wil not so much as heare them to be short, men will neuer be made humble but by force. And why? Bycause of the vaine trustes wherein they sette themselues, when they thinke they are well garded and haue meanes ynough to defend them. And therefore it is purposely sayde, that God will destroy the strong without hande, too the ende wee shoulde not thinke too scape though we haue furnished our selues, and prouided long aforehande for all oure matters, so as it seemeth vnto vs that God cannot come neere vs. Then let vs not ymagine these vaine fancies, for God can tell well ynough how to intrap vs by some meane that we cannot conceyue. Our destruction shall come without hande, or withoute inferiour meane.

Lo howe wee ought too minde these sentences, when it standeth vpon the fearing of God and his wrathe. But therewithall on the contrarie side wee haue a comfort, in that it is sayde, that God will saue his people withoute bowe, withoute speare, withoute swoorde, and without the hande of man. Therefore like as wee bee taught there too humble our selues, and too knowe that all the meanes in the worlde shall not auayle vs, if God be our enimie : and as euerie of vs is taught too ridde himselfe of the vaine pride w<sup>h</sup>e with wee bee puffe vpe by nature : And finally, as wee bee exhorted too modestie, to the ende wee shoulde present our selues afore God, and consider that if hee turned away from vs, he could euery minute of an houre change vs and bring vs too nothing, and puld downe the highest of vs all : so on the contrarie part, when we bee misintreated and oppressed heere beneath, and we see great alterations, so as the Tyrants become like woolues to deuoure the sheepe and flocke of God: let vs resort too this warrant, that God hauing promised to saue his Church without mans helpe, will put the same in vre, euen vnto the ende. Then although wee bee destitute of all worldly helpes, so that wee seeme as it were left vp to the spoyle, and our enemies are furnished of all things that may serue them too destroy vs a hundred thousande tymes: yet let vs trust in the mightie power of God, whiche is inuisible too the worlde. VVe perceyue not howe God will maintaine vs: and vndoubtedly it is a straunge thing howe hee mainteyneth vs at this day: but that is to the ende wee should be alwayes confirmed more and more in his doctrine, that we shall be saued without the hande of man: that is to say, that God will vter suche a force, as is yet hidden from vs, and as wee conceyue not, when it shall please him too plucke vs out of the VVoolues throate, and too mainteyne vs. Nowe if God must worke after such a fashon to preserue vs in this temporall life, I pray you what shall hee do for our saluation, which is a farre higher and precioufer thing? VVill God ayde himselfe with mans hande, when it commeth too the drawing of vs out of hell, and too the deliuering of vs from the tyrannie of the diuell and of sinne, to aduance vs too his heauenly kingdome, and to defende vs agaynst so many temptations? No: but let vs assure our selues, that hee doth it of his owne power, and of his owne meere goodnesse. Ye see then that on the one side it behoueth vs too learne feare and humilitie, that we be not puffed vp with vaine presumption to dispise God, but rather tremble vnder him, considering that we haue not any thing to resist him, nor any other remedie, but to present our selues before him, praying him to beholde vs with mercie. And afterwarde when we be so dismayed and beaten downe, let vs come to the second point, which is to be of good chere bicause God hath promised to saue vs, yea euen without the hande of man. And although wee perceyue not that this can bee done as in respect of the worlde: let vs not therefore doubt, but that he can performe our saluation. For inasmuch as he needeth no helpe, he will not be letted to accomplish his promise, but so performe it as wee shall perceyue that our trusting in him hath not bene in vaine.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him so to open our eies, that we may not be seduced by hypocrisie, nor presume to aduance our selues rebelliously agaynst him, but that we may be patient euē in the aduersities that he shall send vs, and learne to humble our selues vnder his maiestie, to glorifie him in all things, & be well ware that we resist him not in any wise, neither with hand nor tong, but be redie to frame ourselues peaceably to his good wil, knowing that he is alwayes iust and vpright: and that wee may so liue while it shall please him too keepe vs in this worlde, as we may consider that our life dependeth vpon him, and that otherwise we should fayle euery minute of an houre: and therewithall learne to yeeld him thanks for that it pleaseth him to continue his goodnesse towards vs, whereof we be so vnworthie. That it may please him to graunt this grace, &c.

21. The eye of God is vpon euerie mans vvayes, and he seeth all the steppes of a man.
22. There is no darknesse nor dimnesse, so thick, vwhere they that vvoorke iniquitie may hide themselves.
23. God layeth not more vpon man, so that he vvalke vvith God in iudgement.
24. He breaketh the mightie vvithout inquisition, and setteth others in their place.
25. For he bringeth their vvorkes to light, and turneth the night to breake them.
26. He smiteth them as vvicked in the place of the Seers.

W<sup>E</sup> saw yesterday, that if God list to punishe men, hee needeth not too make any great preparation, nor to arme men, nor to borrowe strength elsewhere: for he could destroy all things with his onely looke. Therefore hee needeth not to serue himselfe with mans hand of any necessitie. True it is, that sometimes hee doth so: but that is to shew, howe that all things are subiect to him, and that there is no creature which yeldeth not itselfe to his seruice, yea euē to execute the punishmētts that hee mindeth to haue done. But yet for all that, hee needeth not to prepare himselfe long afore hand for punishing of vs. And hereby we be put in minde too humble our selues vnder his mightie hande, assuring our selues that there is no way in this world, to fence our selues when hee is agaynst vs, but that hee shall execute whatsoever he hath determined in his owne purpose. And so men may well exalt themselves in pride: but in the ende they shall feele, that they are not of power to resist God. And now folowing the same matter which we haue touched already, Eliu addeth, that God dooth these things, not of an absolute [or lawlesse power,] but bycause hee knoweth mens wayes, and marketh all their steps. So then if any of these great chasticements happen, so as a mightie people bee ouerthrowne in battell, and a Realme conquered: let vs assure our selues that God vtereth not such power without cause, but that hee doeth it through his iustice. And though wee perceyue not the reason why God vseth suche rygour: let vs referre the knowledge of the whole vnto him, as to whome it belongeth, and let vs content oure selues with the knowledge of that which is shewed vs heere, namely, that the wayes of men are knowne vnto him. Howe happeneth it that oftentimes we enter intoo disputation of Gods iudgements, and thinke them straunge. It is bicause wee see not so cleerely as hee doth. Howbeit, forasmuch as it is his office to iudge of mens wayes, let vs agree with him, and although we see not why hee doth it, yet let vs assure our selues that his cace will alwayes fall out to bee good and rightfull, seeing that hee ought too chastice not onely [particular] persons, but also whole Nations and Countreys. This saying, that God marketh mens paces, is taken twoo wayes in the Scripture. For sometimes it is referred too Gods promises, bycause hee is carefull too gouerne vs. But in this text (as also in manie others) it is sayde, that God beboldeth our steppes, bycause nothing is vnknowne too him, but all oure whole lyfe must must come too account before him. Therefore let vs walke as before his eyes: for it shall bee in vaine for vs too hide our selues, according also as Eliu addeth, that there is neither darknesse nor mist so thicke, that the wicked can hide themselves in it. And not without cause is thys added. For wee see that although euevery man confesse that God beholdeth all our workes, and must needs be our Iudge: yet notwithstanding, men doo for all that beare their owne eyes, and not consider that God perceyue them. And surely it is not for naught sayde in the Psalme, that the wicked beare themselves in hande, that God seeth not their craftinesse and malice at all. Also they are vpbayded by the Prophet Esay, that they dig themselves caues vnder the earth, too hide themselves from God. Seeing then that hypocrisie doth blind men so sore: It is needefull too marke this sentence, that there is no darknesse so thicke, that can hide the wicked from Gods sight. And for the better conceyuing heereof, it beho- ueth vs first of all too remember what I haue touched: namely that men, although they bee sure that they shall one day come before the iudgement seate of God: doo neuerthelesse seeke startingholes, and therevpon ouersleepe themselves in their lurking holes, as though they coulede beguile God. See what an hypocrisie is thys. And heere withall let vs marke, that men deceyue themselves in shrinking away after that sort from God, in that bicause they themselves haue lost their remembrance, they thinke that hee also hath turned his backe, and remembreth not their misdeedes. Let vs not beguile our selues with such imaginations. For although he discourte- nance things for a time, yet in the ende hee will shewe that he forgot not his office, which is to be iudge of the whole worlde: and not onely to bring euerie mans works to light, but also euen their deepest thoughtes, according as it is his propertie to search mens hearts, and it is not in vaine that he chalengeeth that title to him. Therefore mark here two poynts which we haue to consider in this text. The one is, that we must bethinke vs of the vice which is so deeply rooted in vs: that is to wit, that we thinke not to scape Gods hand by our startingholes. and after as we be drunken in our sinnes, so also thinke wee that God hath his eyes shet and blindfolded, or else that he hath a cur- taine drawne afore him, so as hee cannot perceyue the things that we hide. Howbeit on the other side, and for the seconde poynt, let vs marke howe it is sayde, that all our darknesse shall bee discouered before him when he listeth. And therevpon let vs take warning that we thinke not our selues to haue made the better market, where me are not priuie to our naughtinesse. For the very cause that sendeth many too destruction, is for that they go for good me, or at leastwise can stop the mouthes of such as are not priuie to their wickednesse: for the they triumph, and dare spight God himself. But let vs assure our selues that we shal haue gayned nothing by our deceyuing of the world. For how goodly shewes foeuer we haue made, in the ende we must come before the heavenly Iudge, who will open the bookes that were fast shet before, & cause his great day too appeare, too the intent too bring all the darknesse to light which as nowe keepe things in huckermucker. And this is the cause why the holy Scripture speaketh so often of it. It is not in one place nor at one time onely, that it is sayde, that there is no dark- nesse before God. But for what cause is this sentence so often repeated? It is bycause wee cannot be perswaded of it. For when wee haue eschued the shame of the worlde, we beare our selues in hand that God ought not to stirre our filthinesse, nor to discouer it. But let vs assure our selues he will make the knowledge of it to come euen vnto heauen. Seing then that we cannot be persua- ded of it, it is no superfluous thing that the holy ghost doth so often tell vs, that God will iudge after another fashion, than mortall men do now adayes. And that is the cause why it is purposely sayd heere that the sinners shall not hyde themselves there: as if Eliu shoulde saye, it commeth dayly to passe, that mens eyes are so dazeled, as they take their vices for vertues, yea and are so euil minded, that it dooth them good to bee flattered, according as we see that when euil hath full scope, there is no more condemning of vices, but euevery man vpholdeth them. So then it may come to passe (as is seene by experience) that vice shall reigne, and that there shall bee suche a flood of iniquitie, that all things shall bee turmoyled among men, and there shall bee no more iudgement, nor discretion with them: but yet for all that, it must go farre otherwyle before God. VVherefore let vs learne too lift vppe our eyes about the worlde, and by sayth beholde Gods iudgement which as nowe is hid- den, knowing that there all things must bee discouered, according as it is sayde in Daniell, that the bookes shall bee layde open, that is too say, that the recordes shall be layde before vs. VVhat maner of recordes? Not of paper or parchment, but of oure owne consciences, so as euevery man shall bring his arraignment, not written, but ingrauen so deeply, as there shall be no more disguising of it. And besides that, God himselfe shall bee there in the person of his sonne, with such light, as all things shall bee knowne, yea euen which are nowe vnder deepe dungeons. All these things must then bee seene both of the Angelles of heauen, and of all creatures. Let vs be- thinke vs of this, to the ende wee may walke in an other maner of feare, than we haue done, and ridde our selues from all hypocrisie: for wee cannot amende our market by flattering oure selues (as is sayde afore.) Finally, let vs learne, not too make oure reckening withoute our hoste: but as often as the case concerneth the exami- ning of oure life, let euery of vs cyte himselfe before Gods presence, and therewithall consider how it is sayde heere, that seeing it is his office too serche mens heartes, yea and euen theyr deepest thoughtes: it is too no pur- pose too quitte oure selues as nowe before men, bicause wee cannot thereby escape his hande. Therefore let vs learne too examiae oure selues after that sort, and furthermore suffer our darknesse too bee lightened by Gods woorde, seeing that this poynte also is attributed vntoo him. It is sayde in this sentence, that there is ney- ther darknesse of death, nor mist so thicke, as can hyde those that woork wickednesse. Therefore the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrewes witnesseeth, that like as God knoweth mennes heartes, so as hee will haue his worde to be as a two edged sworde to cut afunder our thoughts and affections, yea and too enter euen vntoo the marce, to discouer the things that are hid den in vs. And Sainct Pauls meening is, that when Gods worde is preached, we must needs bee reprovued, as though all our articles were written agaynst vs, and our whole life were layde afore vs, that wee maye bee conuicted, and vterly cast downe, to the ende to glorifie God, by acknowledging howe greatly we bee guiltie before him. And therefore let vs not onely cyte oure selues before Gods iudge- ment seate, to the intent to correct all feynednesse: but also as oft as his woorde rubberh oure sores, and re- baketh our vices: let vs take it patiently, and not presume too bee wilfull. For what shall wee winne by it?

VVe see many men nowe adayes which chafe and freite if their vices bee touched: for they wouide that folke

folke shoulde beare with them still. And that is all one as if they woulde not that God should haue anie authoritie more ouer them, nor bee any more theyr Iudge. But if they considered well what is sayde heere: they woulde not bee so dull as they are scene too bee, in that they bee alwayes newe too learne what things are. If a manne shewe them any thing that is commonlye knowne: they are as scornfull of it as may bee. And why? Bycause they neuer felt the auayleableness of this doctrine, how there is no darkenesse in Gods sight, but desyle themselves, hanging their groynes downe to the groundwarde lyke swyne, and sleeping after suche a sorte, as it shoulde seeme vnto them that all theyr sinnes are nothing, notwithstanding that the number of them is so great, as they may seeme too bee as it were saped in them, but yet their filthinesse stinketh not vnto them bycause they themselves are rotten in it. Therefore it woulde behoue them to thinke a little vpon this Iesson, and then woulde they bee more quiet when men shew them their vices. And it is a wonder to see, that although many mens wickednesse is apparat to the world, insomuche that euen little children can iudge of it: yet notwithstanding, they aduance themselves agaynste God, and despise him, and will not abyde to be rebuked. And what a shame is it? I speake not of things vnknown, neither stande wee here vpon the examination of mens thoughtes, nor of seeking vnder the earth for the things that are vnknowne too men: but the worlde seeth that the mischeefe doth so ouerflow, as it is pitifull. The very ayre stinkes of it: and yet notwithstanding these good Catholikes that would be taken for good Christians, and haue alwayes the Gospell in their mouth, (yea to bite it like mastie dogs that are mad) woulde that men shoulde still dissembles it: and they think that men do them great wrong to discover their lewdnesse, which (to say truth) is not discovered by vs, but onely spoken of bycause all men knowe it. Yet neuertheless (as I haue sayd) they that cannot nowadayes abyde that God should lay open their lewdnesse, to the ende that they might be ashamed of it, and repent it, shal feele in the end that they must be faine too come before his iudgement seate, where there shall be no more darknesse nor mist to hide them. So then let vs vnderstande, that it is greatly for oure profite, that God doth nowadayes sende vs his worde too inlighten vs: that we may well bethinke vs of our sinnes: Insomuch that although we haue not knowne them for a time, yet they may come too our remembrance, and wee put the thing in vre which I heere alledged oure of Saint Paule: which is, to cast our selues downe, and to be ashamed before God, and too condemne our selues by feeling the naughtinesse that is rooted to deepe in vs. Beholde, I say, how God worketh our saluation, by making vs to feele such a power and effectualnesse in his worde, as we indeuer to examin our whole life throughly, to the ende too mislike of it: but as for those that are stubborne and despise God, and come like straught men too iustle agaynste him, and cannot abide any warning: he must send them as vnreasonable folke, to the day whereof Eliu speaketh heere, wherein there shall be no darkenesse nor couert so close, but it shall be layde wide open, yea euen before all creatures. They cannot nowe indure that God shoulde make them ashamed, to the ende to burie their sinnes for euer: howbee it (spight of their teeth) both Angels, men, and diuilles, must knowe their wickednesse, and they must be ashamed euery where by the power of this light which shall discover all secrets. Thus ye see howe wee ought to applie this text to our instruction. For surely our Lordes threatning of men with the great day, is too the ende they shoulde preuent it: and so the remedie is readie for vs. As I haue earie sayd, God delayeth not the inditing of vs till we appeare before him altogether: but he executeth his iurisdiction dayly by the Gospell, according also as our Lorde Iesus Christ sayth: that when the holy ghost cam: he should iudge the worlde. Therefore, when the gospell is preached, then doth God execute a soueraine iurisdiction, not properly vpon mens bodies, as they bee at this day, but vpon their soules: and hee will haue vs to be cōdemned there for our own weifare. And therefore (as I haue touched alredie) seing that God doth so much and so often warne vs, that we must in the ende come to the great light. let vs not stil shet our eies wilfully, nor wittingly be blinded when he sendeth vs his word to discover our filthinesse, and to shew vs that we cannot hide our selues from his sight. And so let vs profit our selues by the meane that is giuen vs at this day. But if we play the wilde beasts, and seke lurking holes still: yet in the ende we shall feele (whether we will or no) how it is not sayd in vaine, that there is no darknesse before God. For he will make vs to beholde those things in his countenance and glorious maiestie, which we woulde not see heere in the mirrour of his worde. And Eliu addeth immediately, that hee will not lay more vpon men, that they shoulde come to iudgement with him. This Text is dyuerfly expounded: for some take it, as though God would lay no more burthen vpon a man than hee ought, and than a man coulde beare. But when the whole proces of the text is well considered, we shall finde that forasmuche as this treatise concerneth Gods iudgements, Eliu vpholdeth, that God afflicteth vs not after such sort as we may haue occasion to pleade agaynste him. It behooueth vs alwayes to consider what matter he dealeth withall. If a man will knowe what is ment by a sentence, let him consider with himselfe: the case concerneth such a thing, that is the ground which is treated of, and therevnto must the whole sequele be referred. Then if all things bee considered, the generall ground of this text, is that men may peraduenture grudge agaynste God, but in the ende they shall bee confounded. And why? For although God seeme as nowe too handle vs with great rigour: yet when things are throughly well knowne, our mouthes shall bee stopped and God shall bee glorified, as it is sayde in the one and fiftie Psalme. Let vs marke well then howe it is shewed vs heere, that for all our fayre pleading agaynste God, our case shall quayle in the ende. And why? For it will bee founde, that God hath not handled vs vnindifferently, nor layde to fore a burthen vpon vs, that is too say, hee hath not afflicted vs ouer of measure. For although hee doo nowe and then strike men more than they are able to beare: yet is it not more than reason, nor more than they haue deserued. And heereby wee bee put in minde of the pryde, or rather of the rage that is in vs, which driueth vs too murmure agaynste God. For howe doo wee pleade wyth him? It shoulde seeme by vs, that there is some Iudge or Vmper by whome hee shoulde bee iudged. If God were too make an accounte, shoulde wee bee the bolder too spight him, when hee handleth vs not after our owne liking, and that things come not too passe as wee woulde haue them? Then let vs learne, that men are heere condemned of the diuillish pryde whiche prouoketh them too pleade agaynste God. Howbee it behooueth vs too consider well, that God will not abace himselfe so farre as too answere vs when wee summon him too the lawe: hee will not in that case appeare as our counterpartie. True it is (as I haue declared afore) that hee will doubtlesse come thither: but to what end?

Euen

Ro. 14. b. 10
2. Co. 5. b. 10Act. 17. g.
20. 31.

Euen to shewe the thing that is told vs here : that is to wit, that although we haue the power to cyte God, and that he were to make answer, so as he were bound too cleare himself of all his doings, and we myght haue our tung at will to speake against him : yet would that stand vs in no steade : for in the end when it commes too the vpspott, it will be found that God hath not charged vs to fore nor aboute reason. And why? Bycause our finnes are knowne vnto him, yea and so knowne, as he can tell what measure of chastisement we deserue for them. But the wellspring from whence this pryde commeth, is for that we would be our owne iudges to iustifie ourselues. And who hath giuen vs so greate autheritie? Behold, ail iudgement is giue vnto our Lord Iesus Christ : and therefore it behoueth vs to come before him with all lowliness and reuerence, to heare and receyue what soeuer he pronounceth vpon vs without any gaynsaying. But eue-ry of vs wil be belceued in his owne case, and therefore we graunt not somuch to God as to mortall men. For in worldly iustice, he that is set in the iudgement seate must not bee both iudge and party, (and yet notwithstanding he will oftentimes indge wrongfully) for men are corruptible. But yet for all that, men change not in that behalf as touching the outward order that God hath set. And what then shall wee do when wee come before his gloriouse maiestie. So wee see, that men are as it were straght from all reason, when they grudge after that sort agaynst God. And wee see also, that the cause from whence this mischeif procedeth, is the same that I haue touched : namely that wee esteeme our works after our owne fancie. Neuertheless ye see here, that God reser- ueth iudgement too himself. It belongeth too mee (sayeth he) to consider your steppes, It is I that do marke you and serch euen too the bottome. It is not for you to medle with that matter. For whosoever thrusteth in himself to play the iudge, taketh vpon him that which is not dowe to him : what is to be done then? when our Lord afflicteth vs, let vs reuerse our matter vnto him, assuring ourselues that he seeth many vices in vs, which are hidden from our selues. Behold Lord, true it is that I perceyue not the hundredth parte of my fault. : And why is that? Euen bycause I am blind, bycause I am shapred in euill, and bycause the diuell hath as it were lewitched mee. O Lord that I could first of all perceyue better the iniquities that I haue committed before thee, and yet deny myselfe little or verthelesse, forasmuch as I am not a competent iudge to consider of myne owne faults, and yet it coulde comence the hat or to lette me my iust iudge thy iust. I put my case vnto thy hand, assuring myselfe that it coulde doo things in iustice that are vnkowne to mee.

Lowly it is expressly sayd in this texte, that although we went to lawe with God, yet should he not be found, in our daunger. Then let vs not presume to pleade with him : For how faire shewes and colours soeuer we haue before men : we shall be confounded in all that wee take in hand, when we come before God. Thus ye see in effect what Eliu ment to say in this verse. Herevnto he addeth, that God will breake the mighty, yea eue without inquisition, & put others in their place. And why? For he will bring their workes to lighte, and: turne the night to the dark, to the end to breake it. As he sayth that God wil breake the mighty without inquisition : it is to the end to make vs feele better the authoritie which wee despyze so boldly, bycause wee be too dull. True it is that some in sted of this word inquisition, do translate number : as if it were sayd, although the mighty were infinite in number, yet notwithstanding God would not fayle to breake them. But word for word it is thus : hee will breake the strengthes or multitude of men: For the word importeth either of both: and afterward there followeth, there shall be no inquisition.

Forasmuch as the word inquisition is there : and that it signifieth properly to serch or make inquitie : no doubt but Eliu ment to say, that God needeth not to make any inquisitions as earthly iudges do. For in asmuch as they are creatures, there is ignoraunce in them, and therefore they are fayne to help themselues by such meanes. For they cannot prophetic of things. But forasmuch as all things are open before God, he will iudge men without any such kind of proceeding as we see in common weales in this world. But yet there is more in it: which is, that Eliu ment to betoken, that God will not alwayes make vs priue why he executeth his iudgements, but we shall be bynd in that behalf. This inquisition then wherof he speaketh, is properly referred vnto God in chastizing men. As if it were sayd, when iudges make out a proces, it shall be commoned of, and the forme and style of it shall be obserued, so as men shall knowe the things, and afterward the sentence shall bee published, that men may knowe the crymes of the offendour, and after what sort he was conuicted. But wee must not measure Gods myghty power and authoritie by these lawes of men. And why? For he will breake without inquisition, that is to say, without shewing vs why? He will not alwayes publish his sentence : mennes offences shall not alwayes be rehered there : neither shall it be vttered why wee are punished : that shall bee hidden from vs : But yet in the meane whyle, he will not cease to put his iudgements still in execution.

Nowe wee see the naturall sense of this texte. But yet notwithstanding he addeth, that this thing is not done vniustly : For God (sayeth he) will bring their workes to light. Although then that God punish without inquisition (that is to say without such forme of proceeding as is requisite in worldly pollicy) yet doeth he all things with reason and vpryghnesse. And if this be not perceyued at the first daye, let vs tary till all things be discouered, and till he bring the things to lyght which are now wrapped vp and confounded together. And here wee haue to take warning, that we flatter not ourselues as we haue bene woont to doo. For behold what is the cause why wee do continually followe our owne sway, when God seemeth to spare vs, and thinke wee haue libertie too do euill bycause wee are vnpunished. It is bycause that when God beginneth to chastise vs after the common maner, wee perceyue it not, but are forepossessed with a blockish and fleshy carelesnesse. And afterward when it commeth to great roughnesse, we be so dismayd, as we know not where we be if he thunder vpon the sudeyere. VVhich thing he doth when he thinketh good. For after he hath forborne a long time, he needeth no more but to lift vp his hand and men perish in the twinkling of an eye, as hath bene sayd afore. Therefore to the end that euerye of vs may stirre vp himself with it bothe early and late let vs remember this text, that God wil not make long proces in punishing vs, nor is bound to any lawes. Let vs consider (I say) that we must alwayes be in a readinesse, and not delaye till he smite vs, but rather aduisedly prevent his iudgement, according as it is sayd that the man is happy which hath a careful hart. Furthermore let vs also remember this horrible theatning, that when the wicked shall say peace and all goeth well with vs, then shall destruction fall vpon their heads. So then let the faythfull vnderstand, that when God listeth too punish them, hee needeth not too begin at one poynt, and afterward to delay ere he can goe forward with his workes.

worke, as mortall men do, by reason of the lettes which they haue. And why? He will condemne and execute his sentence all at once: he needeth not to trouble himselfe with making long proces for vs: we shall haue no leysure to breath vpon the matter, neither shal we pine in distresse, till we may be quite dispatched at his hande, but we shall be confounded quickly, as if heauen fel downe vpon our heades. Then if we will not be ouerwhelmed with Gods horrible vengeance: let vs feele our owne faultes. Furthermore, when we feele them, let vs assure our selues, that we haue wherewith to comfort our selues in him, at leastwise if we be sorie for them, and seek not to hide the, but lay them open before our God, and sorowfully condemne them, that we may receyue mercy at his hand. For it is sayd that he quitteth those that condemne themselves, and bury their sinnes: which haue them before their owne eyes, and willingly confesse them vnto him. Therefore let vs not dout but that God will wipe out all oure faults if he see that we confesse them freely. Yea, but yet must we passe this way also: namely to beare in minde 20 this saying, that God punisheth without inquisition: too the ende that euery of vs doo his dutie in entering into himselfe, and in examining his lyfe throughly, that we may be ashamed and humble our selues. And nowe it is sayde, that God hauing so broken the great and mighty men, doth put other in their places. And againe on the other side it is sayde, that he punisheth them in open sight, yea and that he punisheth them as offenders. I haue sayde already, that whereas it is sayde, that God discouereth their workes, and punisheth them in suche sort: it is too 30 the ende: that we should alwayes stande in awe of Gods iustice, and not imagin that hee vseth any tyrannie or crueltie. Therefore let vs keepe vs from surmising anie such power in God, as shoulde be vttered without reason. True it is that the reason which he holdeth, is vnknewne vnto vs, and wee must bee contented with his onely and single will, as with the onely rule of right: and howsoeuer the worlde go, let vs not wickedly imagine, that God dealeth crossely and ouerthwartly, or that hee iudgeth otherwise than with reason: but contrariwise, 40 let vs fully beleue, that although his iudgements seeme straunge vnto vs, yet are they ordered by the best rule that can bee: that is to witte, by his will which surmounteth all righteousnesse. This is the thing that Eliu declareth in this text: And the same ought to serue cheefly for vs. Then if any man be afflicted in his owne person, he ought alwayes to consider that God is righteous, too the ende he may repent him of his faults. for we shall neuer haue true repentance, except we know that God afflicteth vs iustly: neither can we glorifie god, and confesse 50 him to be righteous except we haue first condemned our selues as I haue sayde. Thus we see howe we must applie to our selues this doctrine, that God discouereth mens workes and bringeth them too light when he punisheth them. Verely although we examin not worde for worde the sinnes and offences that we haue committed: yet notwithstanding the chastizement which God sendeth vs, ought to profit vs in that behalfe. And therefore it is sayde, that God punisheth them instead of the wicked, that is to say, in suche sort as the wicked, too signifie that they can too bee cleere before men. Marke that for one poynt. And another is, that hee sayeth, that he putteth others in their place. And that is to the ende that we should know the cause of the chaunges which happen oftentimes in this worlde. According also as it is sayde in the hundred and seuenth Psalm, which is a right exposition of this sentence. VVe be as it were straught, when we see a plague to vnepeople a countrey, or if there happen a famine, or if the land that hath bin very frutefull becōmeth barren, as if salt had bin sowne vpon it: or else if al things be so troubled with warres, as a countrey is layde waste, or the Princes thereof are chaunged: when we see any of these things, we are astonished. And why? For we knowe not Gods prouidence which raineth about all worldly meanes, neyther do we thinke vpon men. For if we considered after what sort men behaued themselves, we would not thinke it straunge that God shoulde make such chaunges and alterations. Thus ye see why it is expressly sayde, that God putteth other in their places: 10 namely, to the ende that when we see things change in the world, we should not think it any noueltie. And why? For therein God sheweth himselfe to be a Iudge. Let vs not father them vpon fortune: but let vs assure our selues that God doth there vtter his arme, bicause men can not mainteyne themselves in the possession of the benefites which he had bestowed vpon them. And therevpon let vs consider what our vnthankfulnesse is, that we may amende it. For assoone as our Lorde hath made vs fatte, and set vs vp in any wealth: by and by we turne our selues too kicking agaynst him, like horses that are too much pampered. And is it any woonder that God layeth his hande vpon vs, seeing wee are so proude and vnthankfull? Let vs marke what the modestie of men is now adayes. VVhen God doth them any good, do they so behaue themselves as they may possesse it long? No: But contrariwise, they spight God, to the ende he shoulde bereue them of it by and by. Seeing then that the pride and vnthankfulnesse is so heynous, as I haue sayde: wee must not grudge at the change of things, nor at the great 20 number of alterations. And why? For we prouoke God vnto it? Howbee it is not ynough to knowe that God taketh away one people and putteth another in their place, and setteth new inhabitors in a countrey, and remoueth men after that sort: It is not ynough (I say) too knowe these things, yea and that he doth them iustly: but also euen when we be in our best state, let vs pray him too graunt vs the grace too inioy his benefites in suche 30 wise, as we may still possesse them, and bee guided by them, too the euerlasting heritage which is prepared for vs in heauen. Thus ye see how we ought to put this sentence in vre: and as for the rest, it shall bee referued till to morow.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to receyue vs to mercie, and therewithall (after he hath humbled vs vnder his mightie hande, and made vs feele hys iust corrections to our amendement) to indue vs with the gracious giftes of his holie spirit, and to increase the more and more in vs, till we be fully reformed to the glorious image of his righteousnesse and Maiestie. And so let vs all say: Almighty God our heauenlie father, we acknowledge and confesse, &c.

26. He striketh them as vicked in the place of the Seers.

27. Bicause they haue turned avay from him, and haue not considered all his vyayes.

28. To make the crie of the poore come vnto him, and to make them heare the outcrie of the afflicted:
29. And vwhen he sendeth quietnesse, vwho can make trouble? vwhen he hideth his face, vwho shall see him, as vwell vpon a nation as vpon a man?

He sawe yesterday after what sorte God punisheth offenders without inquisition, and yet notwithstanding hath iust reason to do it, so as there is no cause to blame him. And now Eliu addeth purposely, that he doth it in the place of seers. VVherein he sheweth vs, that Gods iudgemētis ought to be thoroughly knowne vnto vs euen for our instruction. For when God punisheth sinners, it is not onely to the intent that euery man should know what offences they haue comitted: but to the intent they should all take example of it.

Esa. 26. b. 9

According as it is sayd, that iustice cometh vpon the earth, when God doth so execute his punishmētis in correcting as well those notorious offenders, as other men. So then it is not for nought that this saying is added, that God chastise. b offenders in the sight of men, or in the place of seers [or lokers on]. Hereby wee be warned to take better heede than we haue done, in noting and marking Gods iudgements. It is a great fauour that he sheweth vs, when he teacheth vs by other mens harmes. But if we shet our eyes, or play the dullardes, what excuse haue we? Therefore as oft as God punisheth sinnes: let euery man think vpon it in his owne cace, and lette vs receyue a common instruction, to the ende that his corrections be not loste among vs. And surely that is the cause, that after one hath bene chasticed, euery man must haue his turne. For if we could profite our selues by that which God sheweth vs: the punishment of one man might serue for the instruction of siue hundred, yea or of a thousande. But for asmuch as wee lette all the warnings slip which God giueth vs, and make no account of them: therefore euery one of vs is called in his course, and muste answer in his owne person to be punished for his offences. And so wee see what our vnthankfulnesse is, in that it is sayde that God punisheth the wicked and breaketh them in peeces in the sight of all men. For wee can well skill to talke of the thing which shall be sayde although wee see it not. If there be any report of the taking of a towne or of the sacking of it, or of any discomfiture, or of such other like things: the newes shall be caried abroade, and men will debate of it: and much more can wee well discourse of the thing that wee see before our eyes. But in the meane whyle, to what purpose doth it serue vs? Do we learne to forethinke vs of our faultes, and to humble our selues before God? No: but wee followe still our owne trade, and although wee be as bad as they whom God so visiteth and correcteth so roughly: yet do wee beare our selues in hand, that the blowes shall neuer come at vs.

See yee not then an exceeding great and intollerable vnkindnesse? So much the more behoueth it vs to marke well, how it is tolde vs here, that God punisheth not offenders secretely, so as noman might perceyue it to be his correction: but [so openly as] all of vs might fare the better by it, if it were not long of our selues. And why? For if god should fet vp scaffolds to execute his chasticements vpon: we could not perceyue them more euidently. And so our blindnesse in that behalfe cometh of our owne wilfulnesse and vnkindnesse, as I haue sayde afore. Marke that for one poynt. But the reason also is sette downe here: namely because they turned away from him, and considered not all his wayes. Ouer and besides that wee haue seene already that God striketh nor men wrongfully, but to punish their sinnes: here it is shewed vs what is the wellspring of all euils: that is to wit, the withdrawing of our selues from him which is the fountayne of all righteousness. For our life ought to be so ruled, as wee should obey God and seeke him, and walke as it were in his presence. And therefore when a man is gone away from him, he cannot but run into al confusion: and that is the cause of mens destruction. So haue we a very profitable lesson in this text, to shewe vs how we may keepe our selues from going into destruction. And that is by holding our selues as it were shet vp vnder Gods wing, and by clinging vnto him to obey his will. If we haue this wisdom in vs: it is the thing wherein our welfare lieth. But contrarywise, if wee forget God: can wee scape his hand? If our lyfe stray here and there, wee are vndone, and damnation is at our backes. For it is sayd that God will in open sight and after a terrible maner, punish those that run away from him. But lette vs marke well, that Eliu speaketh not of such as had bene brought vp in the lawe, and had had the Prophets, and bene taught the doctrine of God familiarly, but of the Heathens which had had but a small taste of the light, and yet notwithstanding for asmuch as they gaue themselues vnto euill, it is sayd that they were withdrawne from God. And why? For although he were not so neere vnto them, as vnto those to whom he had giuen his lawe: yet notwithstanding wee muste holde this for a generall rule, that for so much as God hath set vs in this world and created vs after his owne image: we according to the order of nature, ought to tend vnto him, & to make him our marke to amear. Therefore when we run astray and giue our lustes the bridle, so as they reigne ouer vs: It is a turning away from God, euē with whom we ought to be all one. And so after that sorte Eliu blameth the Paynims for turning away from God. For albeit they had not the doctrine of the lawe: yet had they the instruction that I haue spoken of, according also as Sainct Paule declareth in the seconde to the Romanes, namely that they needed no paper wryting to shewe them that there is but one God, and a difference betwixt good and euill: for euery man hath it written in his heart. Now if the Heathen menne were condemned for straying away from God, and for withdrawing themselues from his obedience: what shall become of vs with whom God is more familiar without comparison? God thought it not ynough to haue created them after his owne image, and to haue printed therein some knowledge of good and euill: but he hath also giuen vs his woorde, and will haue it published vnto vs dayly. There he sheweth vs his will familiarly: and it is the waye, as Moyse protesteth, we cannot stray: we haue no excuse of ignorance: but behold, there is our rest as it is sayd in the Prophet Esa. Therefore seing our way is layed afore vs, and we know which way to take: if yet notwithstanding euery man starte aside and take leaue to do euill, and to wander in his owne affections and lustes: are we not much more worthy of blame, than those that neuer heard one woorde of good instruction? Then if the Heathen men are here called backsliders, because they are turned away from God: what are we, seing that our God cometh so neere vnto vs, as to do the duety of a scholemaster and teacher among vs, & to entertayne vs in his schoole, to the end we should learne at his hande in the person of those whom he ap-poynct to preache his woorde in his name? Therefore if wee make no account of the doctrine which is giuen vs: muste wee not be condemned as double renegates or backeslyders? Yes surely.

Then lette euery of vs looke neerely too himselfe, and consider of what value and estimation this grace of God is, when hee hath as it were his owne mouth open, too warrant vs the thing that is good, and conuenient for our saluation. Seing wee haue this, although we had it but with a wette finger as they say: yet let vs assure our selues that we cannot despise such a blessing of God, but it must needs be a withdrawing of our selues from him. Much more, seing we haue his woorde dayly preached in Sermons, and may also haue lectures besides: if all this will not hold vs in awe, and make vs to sticke throughly to our God, and to indeuour too serue him: needs must his had be vitered much more roughly and terribly vpon vs, than vpon those that had but the order of nature to guye them aright. Thus much concerning this poynct. And it is sayd immediatly, that they considered not all his wayes. VVherein it is signified vnto vs, that men are neuer so ignorant and vnskillfull, but that there is naughtinesse ynough in the to make them guilty, and to bereue them of all shifts before God. Heere (as hath bene declared already,) Eliu spekeeth generally of the whole world: for he was no Iewe that he might haue had the lawe and haue spokē of his like, and yet notwithstanding he sayth that those to whom God had giuē no more but their naturall wit, as he had giuen to al other men: considered not his wayes. He sayth not that they had done amisse, or erred, because they could do no better, or because they had no light of doctrine (howbeit, that might haue bin said): but here the spirit of God ment to vige men, to the end they shou'd knowe that their condemnation was iust, and that they could not alledge it for a cloke, that they had done amisse through ignorance, for want of one to gouerne them, wheras they themselues were of a good and vpright mind. For if men had a pure and hartty desire to come vnto God, surely he would not fayle them on his side.

And vndoubtedly this promis shall not disappoint men: knock, and the gate shall bee opened vntoo you: seke and ye shall finde. Then if wee see that men doo so range ouer the fields, and as it were run astraye: let vs marke that they haue not a pure and rightmeening mynd to go vnto God. True it is that they may well haue some shewe of deuotion, as we see among the Papists, where many seeme to be the best mynded in the world, and to all likelyhod vterly rauished which deuotiō to Godward. But if a man looke narrowly vpon their doings, he shall find that all is but hipocrisie, and that God doth not giue them the brydle after that sort without iust cause. Ye see then that the thing with we haue to marke in this texte, is that although the wretched Paynimes dwell in darknesse, & may be likened to blind mē which grope and see not the waye, and haue nothing but grosse ignorance in them: yet notwithstanding they cannot be excuzed of maliciousnesse and stubbornesse, and of wilfull turning away from good vnto euill, euen of set purpose: For it is writtē that they considered not the wayes of God. These things are not wyted vpon the brute beastes, nor vpon the stones which haue no vnderstanding: and therefore it must bee concluded, that they which are most rude and barbarouse, (euen they I say) haue refused too go ryght, and that if they had had a good desire, they had not bin left destitute of Gods grace. Yet is it not therefore to be sayd that wee are able to do well, and that there is such an abilitie in vs, that we be able to seke God: wee intreate not of that matter: and when the Papists make such cōclusions, they shewe themselues to be starke beastes. For when it is said that men sin not by ignorance but through a certeyne wilfulnesse: the Papists conclude that seing it is so, it followeth that we haue sufficient reason to gouerne our selues well, and that we be cleersighted, and to be short, that we haue a fredom to do good or euil. But it is to great a beaktinesse to reason after that maner. And why? For they be not things vnable to bee matched together, that men should haue their eyes as it were picked out, so as they should not bee able to see or to discerne any thing, and yet therewithall also bee altogether wicked. And therefore they are neuerthelessse conuicted, not to haue considered Gods wayes, nor to haue bene led in the right way, for that they were caryed away by pryde. Ye see the in what wise we ought to match the one with the other: namely that by reason of sin, we be all of vs bereft of reason and vnderstanding: See how the heritage which we haue of our father Adam, is that our minds are combered and confounded, so as we cannot discerne the thing that is for our welfare, but drawe cleane from it, according as it is said that euen our light is turned into darknesse, vntill God inlighten vs by his holy spirit) and yet neuerthelessse that our ignorance is not such, but that wee bee corrupted in our affections, and wpe out the goodnesse which God might put into vs: and by cause our nature is froward, therefore we be enemies vnto God, and all our thoughts and imaginacions are enmities too his righteousnesse, according as sainct Paule speakeeth in the eight to the Romaines. Then are wee ignorant, and yet in the meane whyle ceasse not to be froward. VVee knowe not which way to go, and yet therewithall wee go astray wilfully. And why? For we mynd not to come vnto God, no, wee must be fayne too bee inforced thither, or else he must inspire vs with his grace, and inlighten our harts which are full of rebelliousnesse. Then vntill such tyme as God hath so reformed vs. Surely we will always shet our eyes, that we may not see his wayes. Now if this be spokē of such as had not the meanes that God giueth vnto vs: what shall become of vs? for it behoueth vs too come backe agayne to the point which I haue touched. I sayd euen now that the heathē men were not to be excuzed in turning away from God: and therefore much more are we double backeslyders, wee I say whom God had drawn vnto him. Now if it bee sayd that the heathen men haue not regarded Gods goodnesse, nor liued and walked according too godlinesse: I pray you in what case are we which haue a farre other knowledge than was giuen vntoo them? For our Lord pointeth vs as it were with his finger, what waye we shall go. And the text which I alledged out of Moyse, (namely this is the way, walke therein) is of great importaunce. I take heauen and earthe too witnessse (saythe hee) that this daye I haue shewed you life and death, and that if you go amisse, yee shall bee without excuse before God. For it appeareth that you seeke your owne destruction. And why? For in asmuch as your God teacheth you, and graūteth you such prerogatiue, as to declare his will vnto you: it is all one as if he should put the way intoo your handes, and you refuse it and choose death. Nowe when men make such a choice, must they not needs become starke diuelles? So then this protestation of Moyse ought to perce our harts and make vs to bethink our selues better. And first we see that our Lord setteh a doctrine before vs, which is for our behoof, as it were in a glasse or a liuely picture: let vs not playe the blinde and bleareyde folke, nother let vs drawe a curten before vs, to the intent too bee ignorant in that which we ought to knowe, wheras in dedde the thing thing is manifest ynough vnto vs. And herewithall let vs marke, that when God speaketh to vs, it is not to leaue vs in doubt, so as we should not know what his woordes ment: but contrarywise to the ende wee should receyue good doctrine and instruction by his worde. And this is another poynt well worthy to be marked. For many pretend that Gods worde is so deepe, as men canot tell what to take too, or what to follow. But this is an accusing of God, as if so be he mocked vs in putting vs in hope to deceyue vs. Therefore let vs marke well, that whē God speaketh, it is to the end we should receyue good doctrine, & that wee should become wise and skilfull: to follow the thing that is good, according as it is sayd that the word of God giueth wisdom to the ignorant: which is by knowing their owne slendernesse, that they may yield theselues vnto him. Then shall we alwayes find the sayd vse to our owne profite in the woordes of God, if we haue the wisdom to be desirous to go forwarde in the right way of saluation, and to keepe vs in it. And if a man turne aside because he hath not considered Gods wayes: it cannot be sayd that he hath erred for want of better ability: but contrarywise he himself is the cause of all his euill, & it ought to be wyted vpon him. There is yet one saying more to be noted: which is, that he speaketh of al the wayes of God. VVherein we be aduertized, that it is not ynough for vs to content God in parte, and to serue him by halues, but we must throughly and wholly frame our liues altogether to his will. For, to giue eare to all that he sayeth, & to submit a mans selfe to him without exception come both to one ende: and vndoubtedly those two commaundements are inseparable. Like as God himself canot be deuided: so also let vs marke that his righteousnesse cannot be deuided. VVhat maner of one is the righteousnesse of God? He hath comprehended it in his whole law. He sayeth not only that a man shall absteyne from whoredome, nother hath he only forbidden theft, nother hath he only condemned murder: but he hath ioyned ten commaundements together, and will haue men to hold them all. Now if one man obey God in chastitie, and another in absteyning from fleecing of his neighbour, and a third in keeping himself from doing wrong or violence, or from taking leaue to hurt or harme other men: is not this a rending of Gods righteousnesse in peeces? For (as I sayd) all the commaundements are inseparable, and there is in them a holy bonde which ought to be kept vnbroken. And so let vs marke well, that if we will be bliffed of God, we muste take good heede, not to some one parte of his wayes, but to all. Thus ye see what Eliu ment to note here. And hereby wee see that euery man ought to be diligent in looking to himselfe. Therefore if wee intend to examine our life well, and to square out our workes and our thoughts by it: when we haue found any outward or actuall sinne in vs, let vs proceede further, and see whether wee haue not had wicked affections: and therevpon let vs learne to condemne our selues, and pray him to clenze vs from the euill which we feele so in our selues. Lo how we ought to practize this sentence. And furthermore it is shewed vs also, that when men haue once begon to ouershoote theselues, they run astray further and further, and become euery day worse than other, till they haue renounced God, and quite cast him vp. VVe are not so malicious as to giue our selues ouer to al vices at the first day: we shall be hild in the feare of God for a while: but if we take liberty to runne at rouers, and God do happen to winke at our sinnes and iniquities: then Satan taketh possessiō both of our soules & bodies, & thenceforth carieth vs away in such wise as we become vtterly vnreouerable. Ye see then that after men haue once left to frame themselues wholly to Gods will,

and to giue themselues to soūdnesse and simplicitie: they do so appayre, as there is nomore consideration in them, but they greeue God, not in some one sinne only, but by all meanes and in all caces, so as they vtterly reiect all his wayes. And furthermore wee see here yet better than afore, how rightfull Gods iustice is in chastizing vs. Why? They that had done amisse, rebelled still further agaynst God: they ranne away from him, and had no will to be taught good: but gaue themselues ouer vnto euill, wittingly and willingly: then is it not high time that God should set to his hande to correct them now or neuer. Seing it is so, let vs alwayes be fully perswaded, that God neuer punisheth vs, till he haue bene to much prouoked to anger, and that wee haue deserued long time afore to be thundred at by his hand. Therefore it followeth, that after he hath wincked at vs, in the ende wee must needs come to that which is contayned here: namely that in open sight and after a notable fashion, he will breake all those in peeces, that are so turned away from him. Lo what wee haue to beare away in this sentence. And it is sayd immediatly: to make the crie of the poore come vnto him, and to make him beare the exclamation of the afflicted. Here Eliu noteth one kinde of sinne which God punisheth in men. True it is that wee offende many wayes. Howbeit for asmuch as menne cannot be brought to know their faultes, vntill they be more than conuicted of them: here Eliu hath set downe a kinde of sinne, which is most apparent and easiest to be seene. For when outrages and extortions are committed, so as one man polieth an other of his goodes, and they that are greeued haue no redresse at all: they crie out vnto God, and men heare their complaints, and euery body reweth and abhorreth their cace. Thus yee see one kinde of wickednesse which is well knowne both to great & small, which is when we see that there is no iustice, but might ouercōmeth right and wee dwell as it were among theeues. For he that listeth too make his hād by pillage, taketh no thought when he hath done all the wickednesse that can be, because there is no redresse nor any order to be taken. VVhen such things happen, euery man can speake of them. For this cause the holy Ghost hath chozen a sinne that is most notorious, to the intent we should be the better conuicted. Herewithall let vs marke that vnder one kinde the whole is comprehended. For in what wise soeuer we offend God, he hath alwayes iust cause to punish vs, and (as I haue declared already) his law cannot be deuided, it must continue whole in one, and his commaundements must be so knit together, as al of them may make but one righteousnesse. Howbeit for asmuch as we be such hypocrites, and euery man writeth himself like a snake to the intent to hide his sinnes: God intendeth here to draw vs as it were by force, and to compell vs to confesse the dette. If a poore man haue any wrong and outrage done vnto him, he will aske vengeance of the partie: and his cōplaynts shal come abroade, so as the ayre shall ring of them: and seing it is so, thinke we that it can be hidden from God? thinke we that he will let it slippe? what is to be done then? First (as I haue sayd already) let vs marke that although noman in the world complayne of vs, yet will our sinnes crie out agaynst vs, and the sounde of our offences will mount vp to heaue. If a thing be remoued, we see it maketh a great noyse: and when wee breake the righteousnesse of God: is it not more than if we should ouerthrowe a house? thinke wee there is any thing more precious than the order which God hath stablished too make vs walke according to his will? VVe go about to destroy all that. And is not that more (as I sayd) than if wee should ouertrowe some buylding? And do we thinke that the noyse of it cōmeth not to the eares of God? Then lette vs marke well, that as oft as wee breake Gods lawe, the crie of it mounteth vp vnto heauen, and our finnes aske vengeance of vs. For although men be dumme and open not their mouths to say any thing: yet do not our finnes fayle to be registred before God. Lo what we haue to marke in the first place. But if men themselues crie out agaynst vs, and we be euill spoken of for our wickednesse, and heare their complaintes and grudgings: is there not much more reason that wee should thinke that God heareth all such cries? And lette vs euery way marke, that it is not for nought sayde: the crie of Sodome is come vp vnto mee: and therefore I am come downe to see whether it be so or no. But let vs assure our selues that our Lordes eares are not deafe, so as our offences should not alwayes come to knowledge before him. Neuerthelesse when there is such crying out vpon vs, and such confusion, hee muste needs note it the more. For of very truthe (as I haue touched already), it is a thing of no small wayght, when wee go about after that sorte to ouerthrowe the thing that our Lord hath stablised. And in good sooth what is the rule of goodlyfe? Is it not as it were an Image of God shyning amongs men? And when wee go aboute to ouerthrowe that, I pray you what a confusion is it? Howbeit lette vs marke by the way, that God will not leaue them vnpunished, which haue wrongfully vexed and troubled the poore. True it is that the greate ones wexe bolde when they see poore men destitute of succour, so as they are not releued, nor haue any friends or kinsfolke too sticke by them. And therevpon it seemeth vnto them that they may do what they list. And that is the cause why they fall to all outrage. But lette vs marke how it is sayde, that God hath a care of them: and therefore the more that poore folke are left vp, to all wronges and noman succoreth them: so much the more doth God declare, that he hath a care of them to reuenge them. If this were well considered, wee would be lesse hastie to trouble our neighbours, and specially those that cannot make their parte good. For it is a breaking of the protection that hee hath set vpon their persons: and in the ende wee muste feele that he is our aduersarie for it. Do wee then see a poore man? Let vs be as it were stopped there, that wee do him no harme, violence, nor outrage. And why? For God will steppe before him, and although the poore man do beare patiently the wrong that is done him, yet shall not the cry of it misse to come vp to heauen and to be heard at Gods hande. And like as this doctrine ought to serue for a warning, that euery of vs may bridle himself and absteine from euill doing: so also the poore ought to be well comforted, sith they see that God hath them in his protectio, and that though the wicked do trouble and vex them, yet God bridlith their rage, and watcheth over the poore, and will in the ende shewe that he neuer forgate them. Then seeing that God taketh our quarrell vpon him: let vs referre it vnto him, and lette it assuage our sorowe and griefe when wee be wrongfully afflicted, so as men do eate vs vp, and we haue no remedy, but seeme to bee as sheepe in the wolues throte. Go to: our Lorde hath promised that the crie of all extorcions which men do, shall come vp to him. Seing wee haue this buttresse, lette vs be contented, and tary till he shewe by effect, that he is neere vs and hath a care of our welfare. Lo how wee ought to practyze this sentence. It followeth, when God giueth reste, who shall make trouble? and when he hyde his face, who shall see it as well vpon an man, as vpon a nation? Here Eliu ment to repressie (in Iobs person) all the quarrels that wee make agaynst God. For wee would controul him in all his doings: yea and wee would couenant with him, that hee should gouerne vs after our owne liking. Truly we will not say so: but yet in the meane while, it is seene that we haue that pryde in vs. What man is there which could not finde in his heart to abace the maiestie of God, to the end that things might fall out to his owne liking? If we be discōtented when God doth otherwise than we would wishe: it is asmuch as if wee would put a barre before him, to say, I intend not that this thing shall go so. Yee see then why it is now sayde: if God giue reste, who can make trouble? And if he hyde his countenance who can see it? Nowe, this reste that God giueth, is of diuerse sortes. For the faythfull haue the reste whereof the Scripture speaketh: which is, that they leane vnto God, and put their trust in his goodnesse, and doubt not but that he gouerneth them. Herevpon they may sleepe at their ease according as the Prophete speaking thereof, sayeth that euery man shall sleepe vnder his figge tree and vnder his vine when he is so in Gods custodie, and that wee shall knowe it. And this peace is the very frute of faith as the holy Scripture sayeth.

Yee see then that the chiefe reste which menne haue or can enioy, is to commit themselues to Gods providence, and that in respect of his fatherly care ouer them, they can say, my God I commit my life vnto thee, it is in thy hande, order it thou at thy pleasure, and I in the meane time will keepe on my course. Marke this for one poynt. But besides this also, there is another reste. For God doth spare the wicked outwardly although hee beate them within, so as their consciences do alwayes gnawethem, according as it is sayde in the Prophete Esay. For although it bee sayde there, that their thoughts bee like waues beating one agaynst another (yea and as a sinke that is filthy within, bicause that vnbeleefe must alwayes bring vnquietnesse): yet notwithstanding God casteth them into a sleepe, bycause he doth not punishe them out of hande. So then it is sayde that if God giue reste who shall make trouble? Hereby it is shewed vs, that when God deferrith and prolongeth the punishment of the wicked, wee must not be ouerhasty. For wee shall gayne nothing if wee pkade agaynst God and say, why doth he not punishe the offenders out of hande: That were as much as to trouble those whom God will haue to be at reste. And therefore lette vs learne to submit our selues patiently to Gods will, and to beware that we runne not a head after that sort. For it is sayd that it becommeth not any mortall creature to make trouble where God will haue quietnesse. And therewithal, lette vs vnderstand, that it is to no purpose to haue bodily prosperitie, except wee haue Gods fauour with it, that the feeling therof may make vs quiet in our harts.

Agayne if wee haue not that quietnesse, lette vs vnderstande that it belongeth to God to giue it vs. For if peace and warre be in his hande, and that hee can giue trouble and quietnesse when he listeth in the transitorie state of this worlde: much more hath hee the spirituall reste which is farre greater and excelienter. Then lette vs consider, that it lieth not in vs to quiet our selues when wee be in trouble: but wee muste resorte vnto God: for it is a singular and inestimable treasure that cometh from him, to holde vs so in quiet as wee may alwayes in the midst of the tymoules of this worlde, abide still vpon our feete, and that being tossed as it were with great stormes and tēpestes: yet neuerthelesse we may haue our anker fastned in him to hold still our owne. This (say I) is as a singular priuiledge that God giueth to his childre. So the are we cōbred? are we full of anguish, trouble & perplexity? what is to be done? let vs take vs to this ferdnesse:

knowing that it abideth within vs. True it is that wee must alwayes seeke the meanes that God offereth vs, to keepe vs to it, and to indeuer to attayne it: but how soeuer the worlde go, let vs fully resolue vs of this, that it is onely Gods office to quiet vs, and to deliuer vs from all vnquietnesse. This is the thing which we haue to marke. And further although the faythfull haue this sayd peace, so as they bee quiet in the middes of all their afflictions and of all the miseries of this world, yea and that they be- take themselues vnto God when they be tempted with distrust: yet is this no let, but that their life is subiect too much vnquietnesse. Therefore let vs not storme though it please God to turmoyle vs. For it is not sayd that he will so handle vs in this worlde, as that wee muste not be tossed too and fro: but yet for all that wee must hold our selues fast, as we be not vterly shaken downe with temptations. Lo what wee haue to remember in this sentence. On the contrary part it is sayd, If God byde his face, who can see him? Herein wee are warned, that it is not for vs to searche too farre aforehande what God doth, but that wee must content our selues with the knowledge of that which he sheweth vs. VVhat is this face or countenance of God? It is not a shape like vnto a mans visage, which hath nose, eyes, and mouth: but the face of God is the record which he giueth vs when we know his will. God therefore sheweth vs his face, when he telleth vs why he doth this thing or that, and it is all one as if wee sawe him before our eyes. Contrarywise he hideth his face from vs, when he afflicteth vs, when things seeme straunge to vs, and when wee knowe no reason why he worketh after that sorte. Therefore when God holdeth vs so in ignorance, it is a hyding of his face from vs. And let vs marke well how it is sayd, that we may well strayne our selues to see him: but wee shall neuer attayne to it. Then is it a Diu:lish presumption when men do so enter into disputation of Gods works, storming and chafing if God do things otherwise than they thinke good, desiring to frame him to their will, euen as though they would looke vpon him whether he will or no when he hideth himselfe: or as though they would pull him downe to them. And may they bring that to passe? No: what is to be done then, that wee may take profite of this saying? Truly this lesson deserueth to be layde forth more at large. Howbeit as at this time (to the intent the matter be not broken of): let vs marke that whensoever it please God to shewe himselfe vnto vs, it behoueth vs to know him, and to consider his workes, as he sheweth vs them, and to be attentiuue to marke the reason why hee doth so. And when he worketh after a straunge fashion that is vnknowne to vs: lette vs reuerence such secretes, acknowledging neuerthelesse that he is alwayes righteous howsoever the worlde go: and lette vs dwell continually in that beleef, and hold vs quiet, wayting patiently till he shewe vs more fully the things that are hidden from vs as now: assuring our selues that during this life our knowing must be but onely in parte.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgemēt of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele thē, that al the time of our life we may mourne before him, desiring him of forgiuenesse, and acknowledging our selues exceedingly guilty, vntill that he of his free goodnesse deliuer vs frō the damnations wherein we are, and from the daungers wherewith we are besieged. That so long as wee be in this world, we acknowledging our infirmity and weakenesse, may suffer him to gouerne vs & guyde vs to the right way of saluation, in such wise as wee may neuer be shaken downe, but that whatsoever temptations befall vs, we may stand stedfast in the calling of our God till he haue takē vs out of this world, to bring vs into his heavenly kingdome, where wee shall inioy the euerlasting reste that hee hath prepared for vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of errour and darkenesse, to the right way of saluation, for the doing whereof, it may please him to rayse vp true and faythfull ministers of his woorde, that seeke not their owne profite and vayneglory, but only the aduancement of his holy name, and the welfare of his flocke: and contrarywise roote out all &c.

29. And vwhen he hideth his face, vwho is he that shall see him? he is vpon nations, and vpon men togither.
30. In that an Iprocrite reigneth, and there is a stumbling blocke to the people.
31. It belongeth to God to say, I haue forgiuen, I vwill not destroy.
32. But that vvhich I haue not perceyued, teach thou mee: if I haue done vvickedly, I vwill do so nomore.

I was partely declared yesterday, after what maner God hideth his face frō vs, that it be not seene: that is to wit, when men are troubled in this world, & see not the reason & end of his doings: lyke as on the contrary part, if God graunt vs the grace to see that he gouerneth all things, and to perceyue a fayre and well disposed order: then is it as though his countenance shone vpon vs as the Sunne. Do wee then see the state of the worlde so troubled, as wee wote not what to say to it? It is all one as if God hid his face from vs. And in that case what is there for vs to do, but to hūble our selues: according as it is sayd in the Prophet, that in the time of aduersitie the wise man will lay his mouth to the ground, and hold his peace, verely as one knowing that wee shall gayne nothing by struiuing, when God listeth to handle vs so with extremitie. Ye see then that the end whereto this sentence tendeth, is to exhort vs to modellie and sobernesse, bicause our wittes are to rude and to grosse to comprehend Gods secrets, and moreover bicause God intēdeth purposely to humble vs, when he withdraweth himself frō vs. And this is done (sayth Eliu) as well vpon a whole nation as vpon one man. Both generally & particularly God can so intangle things, as we shall not know the reason of them: and if we will speake of them, we should not know at what end to beginne. And for the better expressing of his minde, he addeth, In somuch that the hypocrite reigneth. True it is that this present sentence may be layd forth diuersly: but the sequelle of the texte sheweth well ynough, that the meaning is, that when a wicked man, or when a naughtypacke reigneth, and there is a

stumblingblocke or a snare caste among the people: for the wordes import eyther of both: it is a trouble to vs when wee see the wicked reigne, so as there is nothing but tyrannie, nor any equitie and vprightnesse remainyng: but we be as it were vterly forlorne, and God is not seene. If enormities be committed, so as there is quareling and snatching on all sides: or if snares be layde so as poore folke knowe not howe to scape: then is God as it were withdrawn from vs. True it is that he is neuer the further from vs, nor hath the lesse care of vs: howbeit wee see it not. On the other side, when wee be not able too consider what is done: it seemeth to vs that God regardeth vs not: wee see nothing but darkenesse: the light that ought to guyde vs shineth not vnto vs. Nowe then what should wee do; but shrinke downe our heads, holde our mouthes shet, and wayte Gods leyfure patiently, till he remedie the inconueniences that trouble vs? Also let vs alwayes bee at this poynr, neuer to inqyre further than is lawfull for vs. It behoueth vs to thinke wel, that God doth not such things without cause why: but wee muste enter into the consideration of our sinnes: for if wee wil enter curiously into the discusing of Gods secretes, and incomprehensible determinatiōs: it is a pride that will vterly ouerthrowe vs. And therefore (as I haue sayde afore) lette vs learne, not to be ouerwyse, knowing that God will sometimes leade vs like poore blinde soules. As touching this sentence where it is sayde, that the wicked man reyneth: lette vs marke that although it be a fore temptation, to see such reigne as are naughty-packes, despizers of God, and giuen to all euill, and to see that might ouercommeth right, so as a man cannot tell whither to go for refuge: surely it is a great and harde crosse to overcome: neuertheless the holy ghost intended to set it before vs, to the intent that we should be armed against it.

So then, hath vnrightuoufnesse gotten full scope? Are the wicked growne so lustie as to confounde all things, and to handle matters with such corruption, as there may bee no more remedie? The holy Ghost aduertizeth vs, that it is Gods will to hyde his face after that maner, to the intent to trie our obedience. Therefore lette vs tarie till he inlighten vs, and then shall wee knowe lowe that he hath not sent these troubles among vs without cause. Thus yee see in effect after what maner wee ought to put this sentence in vrc. Nowe Eliu addeth that it belongeth to God to say, I haue forgien, I will no more destroy. As if he should say, that God holdeth the raynes in his hands to guyde men at his pleasure, and if it please him to punishe our sinnes, wee haue nothing too replie why hee should not condemne vs: and if hee beare with vs, yea or liste to forgie vs altogether, who shall resiste him, who shall lette him to shewe vs fauour? True it is that this is straunge to mannes vnderstanding at the first sight. For seeing that God is no acceptor of persons, wee aske why hee forgueth one rather than another? Why doth hee beare with a wicked man, when hee is seene to be altogether out of order? Then may wee well trouble our heads to seeke why God dealeth after that maner: but what conclusion muste wee make, saue onely to referre all things to himselfe in his owne purpose, knowing that it is not for vs to rule him, yea and that wee are not able to comprehend the things that are to high for vs? For when it pleaseth God to humble vs, he hath meanes to do it which can by no meanes sinke in our naturall vnderstanding. Lo in effect what is sayde vnto vs here. And whereas here is mention made of Gods iudgements, whereby he chastizeth our sinnes: lette vs beare in minde what hath ben sayd: namely that the righteousfe man that is shall finde himselfe guiltie, twyce, yea a hundred times more than hee suffereth, and therefore that wee haue no cause to complayne. Furthermore if it please God to forgie vs, lette vs vnderstand that he doth it not for our deserts, nor for any thing that he findeth in vs, but of his owne free mercy. And this ought to bee marked wel, bicause the thing which I haue tolde you already to come naturally into mens imaginacions, hath bene the cause of bringing false and wicked doctrines into Christendome. And the Papistes are still imbrued with this errour, that God pardoneth the sinnes of those that turne vnto him, euen bycause hee seeth some good motion in them. VVhen the Papistes speake of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, they alwayes imagine, that a manne muste on his owne side dispose himselfe afore hand, and purchase that grace before God: and that although it be not of full woorthinesse, yet notwithstanding there must be a certayne meeting together, that is to say, it is good reason, that God seeing any good dispositiō in man, should helpe him, as in respect of the same. And what hath caused such dotage, to be alledged? Euen bycause men conceyue not that God hath such a libertie, as is giuen him here: that is to wit, that it belongeth to him to say I will forgie. For as much as this thing hath not bene conceyued: Therefore the Papistes haue forged this Diuelishe imagination, that God forgueth those which are any whit disposed with a good motion and purpose to repent, and that although they haue not done so many good deedes as they may deserue to be accepted, yet notwithstanding God receyueth them to mercy, bicause of the good disposition that he findeth in them. But contrarily, let vs holde the doctrine that is contayned here: namely that whereas all men be alike, and that damnatiō is cōmon to all men, so as they be all intangled in it: God pardoneth some, and leaueth the residue in the damnation wherein they are already. VVhy doth he so? It is not for vs to dispute of it. Let vs hold this to humble our selues withal, and let vs not forge meanes in our owne head, which the holy Scripture speaketh not of. And in good soth, who giueth such motion vnto a man to mislike of his sinne, but onely God, who hath already touched him by his holy spūite? for naturally we be all euill, and when wee haue comitted it, we are still more and more disposed vnto it: and hypocrite blindeth vs, by flattering vs in the same. Therefore when a sinner misliketh of his sinne: it is a token that God hath already touched him. True it is that Cain, and Iudas were greatly grieued at the feeling of their offences: but that was not for any milking of them: nay rather they gnashed their teeth agaynst God, & hardened themselves in their euill. Therefore when a sinner feeleth remorse in himself, & is touched to humble himself before God: wee must conclude that it is a marke of the holy Ghost. Now then if God giue vs applyable affectiō to mislike of our selues & to draw vnto him: it is a token that he hath shewed vs mercy. And surely, is it not a good warrant of his mercy? Shall wee then say, that man hath deserued to haue sinne forgien him of God, bicause he was therevnto disposed? we see the that the Papists haue in this behalfe falsified and disguyfed Gods doctrine, fathering that thing vpon man, which belongeth not vnto him. And therefore so much the better ought we to marke & remeber this saying, that when men haue cast themselves into destruction, and are hild in thraldome of sinne, so as Satan possesseth them: none but God hath authority to say, I forgie. And whom forgueth he? wee must nottie his grace nother to one thing, nor other, but let him vse his own minde, to dispoze all things according to his free goodnesse. Therefore when he forgueth one man, he may well well leaue another in damnation, according also as it is Exod. 23. d. sayd in Moyses, and alledged by Sainct Paule, as a record 19. of great importaunce aboute others, I will forgiue whom Rom. 9. d. 15 I will forgiue, and I will shewe mercy to whome I will shewe mercy. In saying so, God sheweth vs that wee muste not inquire why he doth it: for hee curteth away all such questions. VVhom then doth God pardon? euen whom it pleaseth him. It is not any mortall man that ordereth that matter: it is the liuing God, who declareth that when he sheweth mercie, wee muste not aske why he doth it, nor to whom, nor whether one man be better disposed than an other, or whether there hath bene any desert, good motion, or other meane aforehand? No. For God will haue men to content themselues with his doings. Therefore whereas hee sheweth mercy vnto some and not vnto all: it behoueth vs to magnifie his goodnesse: and if he shewe any apparance of his iustice, lette vs assure our selues that he is not bound vnto vs.

And vndoubtedly this diuersitie sheweth vs so much the better, that when he draweth vs, euen out of death it selfe, hee doth it not but of his owne free minde: and that wee for our parte shoulde bee vtterly forlorne and damned, if wee were not succored by him. Thus then yee see howe yee may be the more prouoked to glorie God, and to knowe his mere grace towarde vs, and that our saluation is grounded ouely vpon his good will in receyuing vs to mercie: that is to wit, in that on the contrary parte hee forsaketh whom he liueth, and sheweth not like mercy to all, but letteth some alone, so as they are not rayled to saluation. Thus yee see what we haue to remember in this strayne.

Now he addeth, th. it be will no more destroy when he bath so pardoned. And herein we haue one good lesson more: which is that when God spareth sinners, he is reconcy-led vnto them, and fully at one with them. True it is that sometimes God punisheth not the wicked, and although their sinnes be tolde them and brought to their remembrance, it will seeme that they are escaped his hande for a tyme. But then is not this saying performed, that God will not destroy. And why? for there he forgiueth not, but nourisheth the wicked as menne fat oxen and swine to the ende to kill them. VVee see that when an ox hath bene leane all his life long, if a man intende to kill him, he will bestowe the more coste vpon him: and likewise will hee do with a swine to make him well iarded. Now the Prophet vseth this similitude, too shewe vs that the state of the reprobates and despyers of God, is neuer the better for that they are not punished out of hand (according as wee haue seene bothe in Ieremy and Ezechiell that sliche as are referued, make neuer the better market for their long tariance, but as they are worse before God, and haue pyled vp a greate heape of cursednesse vpon their heads, so also must God powre out the greater rigor vpon them.

 3. & 51. e.
 40.

And so although our Lord punisheth them not the firste daye: yet ceaseth hee not to holde them there still vnder his wrath and vengeance. And therefore this texte belongeth not vnto them. But when our Lorde doth set menne quyte and cleare, and will not punisheth them any more: why is that? It is bycause hee hath forgiuen their sinnes. I tolde you that this lesson is very profitable: And why? For firste of all wee bee so fleshy, as wee passe for nomore, so be it that God make vs not to feele his rigor.
 Although he be angry with vs, and reiect vs and as it were banishe vs his house: all this toucheth vs not: lyke as if a diseased person, were as good as rotten inwardly in his body, and yet notwithstanding all were one to him, so long as he feeleth no greefe. VVhen a man hath an ague, if he feele no alteracions nor payne of head or backe, ad is well, hee ouerpaseth it, and yet notwithstanding the disease lurketh so within, as it becommeth deadly. Contrarywise if he be fore a thurt, it were good for him to in-dure it for a time, to remedy the ague which is his cheefe disease. But a man is so sensuall, as he careth for nothing, but for the taking away of the greete and pafsion of the present fitte that troubleth him. Euen so is it with vs.

 10 For although God be offended with vs, that seemeth to be nothing: we perceyue it not bycause of our dulnesse, and therefore wee heape sinne vpon sinne, and continae alwayes harde harted. Somuch the more then behoueth it vs too marke howe it is sayde in this strayne, that wee shall not scape Gods hand, except he forgiue vs our sinnes.

It behoueth vs to go to the roote: lette vs not desire God onely to deliuer vs from our sickenesse, wantes, and such other things: but lette vs specially pray him to bee mercyfull vnto vs, and when wee haue once gotten that, wee shall be deliuered from all inconueniences. And yet further, for the better conceyuing of this doctrine, lette vs marke, that although wee be in prosperitie, yet if in the meane while God be our enemy, the mischief shall continue still with vs, and his benefites shall turne to our bane. Then if wee vse Gods giutes vnto his displeasure, all the benefites that he bestoweth vpon vs muste turne too our greater condemnation: lyke as on the contrary parte, when wee bee reconcyled vnto God, and hee hath pardoned our offences: although hee chastyze vs, the same shall bee a medicine too vs, and all our afflictions shall bee blessed before him, in so much that they shall turne to our saluation, as S. Paule sayeth in the eighth to the Romaynes. Beholde here how it is a right necessary 20 poynt, to knowe that we shall alwayes bee shet vp vnder the curse of God, vntill such time as he hath pardoned our sinnes.

And here vpon lette vs learne, not to be afrayde of mi-series and aduersities onely, but specially of Gods wrath which we cease not to prouoke. And when wee shall haue done amisse, let vs not beginne at the outward afflictions, as who should say that our returning vnto God should be to the end he should nomore afflict vs: but lette vs pray him to bee so gracious as too purge and clense vs of our sinnes, to the ende there may be nothing in vs that may kindle him agaynst vs, or displease him. True it is that the chastizements and correCTIONS which God sendeth vs, are as strokes of a spurre to pricke vs forwarde: and when he seeth vs dull, he driueth vs by that meanes to repentance: but yet must we not be at this poynt to say, well: I am content, so God withdrawe his hande from mee. No, wee muste not do so: for wee shall haue gay-ned very litle, if wee get nothing but that. VVhat then?
 Let vs go vnto our God and pray him to be at one with vs, and to do somuch for vs, that when wee haue bene gently chastized, wee may knowe his goodnesse towards vs. And I pray you, marke what is the cause, why God doubleth his stripes and striketh much more roughly vpon vs. VVhy so? If a man be chastized, hee 30 feeleth that God visiteth him, and perceyueth all things to go better with him. So then a man humbleth himselfe when hee hath offended God, and he desireth to be de-liuered, and that God should take away his aduersitie at the first brunt: but in the meane while, the poore soule hath no wit to enter into himselfe, and to search his owne faultes, and to atreyne to somuch reason, as to say: alas, I must seeke to recover the fauour of my God. He thinks it ynough if he be nomore pressed lyke a dogge that doth baily. but

but shake his eares when he hath scaped with a blowe of a cudgell. Such a one goeth not so far as he ought to do, he setteth at the outward parte: and therefore God followeth with striking him still. So then we see how lightly men dispatch themselues when God chastiseth them to make them come to repentance: for they may well haue some conceyte of it, but the same passeth away out of hand. Now sith that God seeth that although a mā perceyue not his owne harme, yet the filthinesse doth settle still within him: he is fayne to presse him, to the end he may know that the disease would increase, if he purged it not to the bottome. Then let vs vnderstand that we do but growe worse and worse, vntill that God haue shewed vs mercy. And therefore wee muste not onely desire him to giue vs health, soundnesse, and whatsoever else our fleshe desireth: but also to blotte our sinnes, and to gouerne vs so by his holy spirite, as there may not be any thing in vs to prouoke his displeasure agaynst vs. And this is the cause why Dauid, and the other holy Prophetes, when they felte themselues beaten and tormented at Gods hand, did not say onely, Lorde deliuer mee from this affliction. True it is that they desired that too: but firste of all, they desired God to forgieue them their sinnes and to be nomore angry with them. And why spake they so? For they sawe well from whence afflictions come: how that they be the frutes and recordes of Gods anger: and therefore they went alwayes to the roote of the mischief. Euen so must wee do. And that is the thing whereof wee be warned in this place where it is sayd, that God will not punish after he hath forgouen. True it is that it foloweth not that God forgieue vs, bicause he maketh no countenance of displeasure, but doth as it were wincke at our sinnes & wee prosper as though he loued and faouered vs: but rather our destruction is then neere at hande. According as wee see howe the Sodomites were then destroyed, when they were come to the fuinesse of their delights and pleasures, in somuch that they despyed both God and the worlde: they were so besotted as they sawe not one whit: and vndoubtedly they tooke the greater libertie, vnder the colour that God had not visited them of a long time: they were as men that had drunke the dregges of wine, as the Prophets terme it. And wee haue seene in Jeremy and Ezechiell, that when God beareth with the wicked, they do as it were settle in their lees, and are soaked more and more in their vices: and when they be imbrued with them to the ful, then is there nomore remedy, nor any more remorse, as the Scripture sayeth. For this consideration let vs marke, that if we scape vp the wood of Gods wrath, although fire be not put to it out of hand, yet muste wee looke for it, and not thinke that wee haue gayned any thing, except wee be reconcyled vnto God. Now after that Eliu hath sayd so, he addeth: If I haue not perceyued wach thou it mee: If I haue done amisse, I will do so nomore. These things are added here as it were in skorne. For Eliu bringeth in God speaking vnto Iob, & offering himselfe to be reprovved and amended: if he haue done amisse. True it is that for asmuch as these woordes are somewhat cut of, men haue taken them in another sense: howbeit, the naturall exposition is this: VVe haue seene heretofore that Eliu hath exalted God in such libertie and soueraintie, as all mortall menne must needs stoupe vnder him, and not once open their lippes at him: and that he hath priuiledge to do what he thinkes good, and wee in the meane whyle must acknowledge that all that euer he doth is rightfull and reasonable. Not that hee sheweth a reason of it: for he intendeth to referue that authoritie ouer vs to himselfe. Eliu therefore hath shewed that already. And nowe he skorneth Iobs ouerwee-

ning, for that he had disputed agaynst God, and misvnderitoode the cause of his affliction. Not that Iob had not acknowledged a secret righteousnesse in God, which ought not to be measured by mans imagination (for Iob acknowledged that) but in the meane season wee haue seene, that his passions tossed him, so as he chafed agaynst God, and oftentimes he boyled ouer and spake vnadvisedly: This we haue seene. And now Eliu rebuketh him for it, howbeit in way of mockery. I see (sayeth he) that God muste be fayne to come to account, and to say vnto thee, well I haue done amisse, thou arte able to teache mee, another time I will do better, and I will do nomore so, as who should say that God were a little childe. Furthermore lette vs marke, that this is not spoken so much vnto Iob, as vnto the whole world: and wee haue neede of such warning. For wee knowe what dulnesse there is in our vnderstanding. If God speake vnto vs earnestly and grauely, wee are not a whit moued at it: for wee see that men are wedded to their owne opinion, and when they haue once conceyued a thing, it is not easie to turne them from it: and if a man speake playnely to vs of the Maiestie of God, and shewe vs how frayle wee be, wee haue alwayes our replies. Seing then that men are not of such capacitie that God should shewe them their faultes distinctly and grauely, and in such phrase of speache, as they might bee playnely ledde vnto reason: when God seeth them so willfull, hee muste bee fayne to mocke at them, and to put them to shame, as folke that are not woorthy to be spoken directly vnto. If I see a foole and haue labored to winne him by good meanes, and he in the ende is vtterly paste recouerie, so as he is altogether vnruely and blasphemeth God: what shall I do? shall I speake to him as if he had good discretion? No. But I shall scorne his beastlinesse, or else if I see him lift vp into ouergreat pryde, I shall threaten him. After the same maner doth the holy ghost proceede now. For he sayeth: go to: God muste be fayne to come vnto you, and say that if he haue done amisse he will amende it if you rebuke him for it. And surely what is to bee sayde to vs, when wee checke God dayly, according as euery man knowes that he findeth faultes with him in himselfe, and is discontented when things go not to his minde, and when in effect wee would haue God to turne the bridle, and to do cleane otherwise, than he doth. Then seing we are so malapert: I pray you howe can wee be dealt with, if wee be not mocked and vpbayed with such pryde? and must not a man be needes out of his wit, when he aduanceth himselfe after that sort agaynst his maker? who maketh any doubt of it?

Yee see then what wee haue too remember in this streyne. For seing that the words are so couched in skorne, it is certayne that wee be more conuicted, than if a man spake to vs in an ordinary style. And why? For when it is vttered after this maner, go too, God shall come and say, I haue done amisse, rebuke you mee, shewe mee my lesson: is it not a shame for vs to be so spoken too? Yes surely is it. VVhat? Must God come downe to vs to confesse his faulte, and submit himselfe to our correction? But we see that that is a detestable monstrousnesse: and there is none of vs, but his heares would stande staring vpon his head to heare it spoken: and yet notwithstanding our doings tende to it. VVhen menne freite and chafe after that sorte as I haue touched already, and make their vagaries, and would make God subiect to their imagination: it is all one as if they would bereeue him of his soueraintie, and subdue him to such lawe as they list to laye vpon him, as though hee were a litle babe. Men therefore will vnderstand do that thing which they would

would be lothe and afrayde to heare spoken. And so wee see that the holy ghost hath taken a good waye to spight the diuelish malapertnesse which is in vs, when we murmur so against God, in that he sayeth, go to: I see then that God must be faine to come to you and aske you forgiuence, and be contented to be taught by you: and when you haue shewed him that he ought not to do so: he will do so no more. Now when the holy ghost speaketh after this sort: it is to shewe men that they are very diuelish in presuming after that maner to set vp their bristles against God, and to murmur when he worketh not to their liking. So much the more therefore ought wee too way well the words that are cōteyned here. And as often as we be tickled with any intents to be inquisitiue of Gods doings, or to bring him vnder coram. let vs consider what we do, and into what maze wee enter. For it is all one as if wee would rob God of his maiestie, and abace him in this world, and make him subiect to that we think good: Alas, and were not that too great a despying of him? whether go we? Therefore when any such thing commeth to our mind, if we bethink vs not as we ought to do, let vs remember this saying: If thou grudge after that maner, thou settest thy self against thy God. Behold, the holy ghost hath already declared and told thee, into what confuzion thou puttest thy self: namely, that it is as much as if thou wouldst become the creator of thy God: and if there were no more but this malapertnesse, warr not thou worthy to be drowned in the bottome of hel? For is there any greater pride than to desire to darken, or rather to abolish the maiestie of God? Thou sily worne of the earth, thou cursed creature, thou wretched cartiō, thou art a sink of all filthinesse, and wut how take vpō thee to check so against thy maker? When we haue any such thoughts in vs, let vs beware that we put them away, yea and vtterly bury them, and that we shet all fantasies out of dores, and stand no further vpon our reputation, but say, Lord be thou glorified in our ignorāce: and let vs say nothing else but this, Lord thou art righteous in all thy doings, although we see not a whit as now, but wee shall one day be enlightened by thee. As now it is greate wisdom in vs to rest simply vpon his will, seing he will haue vs ignorant for a tyme. Ye see then that it standeth vs in hand to put this sentence in vte. Furthermore whereas it is sayd that we teache God the thing that he perceiued not: It beho- ueth vs here to make comparison betweene God and vs: For he hath bin frō euerlasting, and we be but as snayles of one dayes breede, and yet we put out our hornes immediatly. And what for that? It is but water. VVherof are snayles made? or wherof come they? ye see then we are but as snayles, and are chaunged incontinent. And is it mee- 50 teete that we shuld pooke out our hornes against God? what strength? what courage haue we? of what continuāce of time are we? we be but threescore our fourscore yeres in the world: I speake of the eldest sort: And what then can our vnderstanding be? On the cōtrary part let vs marke of what continuance Gods wisdom and knowledge are. From euerlasting: before the world was made all things were present with him: he hath not increaced in wisdom nother is he abated in any thing. But he knewe all things euen before the world was made. So the must not men needes be worse than madd when they giue their affections head after that sort to say, the matter ought to haue gone thus? How now? Hath not God considered how this thing ought to be done? Is he not wyse ynough of himself? Is not this an ouerturning and marring of all things? He is not like mortall men: For except they haue debated vpon a matter afore hand and taken counsell of it, they can do nothing that is good and profitable. Had

God neede to consult? Hath he neede to debate of matters aforehand? How should that be? For as I sayd afore, all things haue bin present with him before all times. VVhat is to be done the? To suffer ourselues to be taught by him, knowing that there is no vnderstanding in vs, and that we do but glyde through this world, and our life vanissheth away as a shadowe: we be blind wretches, and although there be some reason and vnderstanding in vs, yet is it not able to guide vs, and much lesse to aduise God what he should do: but serueth only to make vs v- 10 excusable. And so the reason that we haue, standeth vs in no steade but to conuict vs, and cōdemne vs: And therewithall the holy scripture sheweth vs that wee bee blind wretches, yea and we are sufficiently taught it by experience. And therefore if we take vpon vs to teache God, whether do we rushe? That is the cause why I sayd that it behoueth vs to knowe first what our ignorance is. And secondly that it belongeth vnto God too dispose of all things, that when we vnderstand the want that is in ourselues: we may be out of doubt, that it belongeth vnto him only to remedy it. Then do wee lack vnderstanding? let vs craue it of him (sayeth sainct James:) which is the weispring of it and giueth it without vpbroyding. For God dealeth not nigardly with vs as men do, who when their goods do diminish, are greeued if they be too much called vpon. It is not so with God: For he neuer ceasseth to do vs good. Therefore let vs learne to offer ourselues vnto him when we want wisdom, and let vs not doubt but he will giue vs as much as shall be necessary for vs. And this doctrine which I haue touched is exceedingly for our behoof. For what hath bene the cause of so many corruptions in Christendome, in so much as the good doctrine hath bene peruerted and imbaced, but by cause me haue bene desirouse to be ouerwise as though God had not bene wel aduised. VVhen men presume to put forth their owne inuentions, and to say this will be good, and that must be done: and such a thing must be remedied: and after what sort? After their owne fancy. And had not God foreseene it? How happeneth it that he did it not afore? VVe see what God pronounceth, and therto 40 must we holde vs. He wil haue vs to receiue all things for good and holy which he speaketh. And behold, men step in and will play the sticklers, and rowe betweene two streames. And why? For they could finde in their harts to do God so much wrong, as to say he is scarce wel aduised, and that they themselues are wiser than he. But we shal knowe this thing the better by taking of a thing that is grosse and easy to bee vnderstoode: which is, that the Pope hath gone about to deuide the things that god hath ioyned together, that is to wit, that he hath bereft the people of the cup in the Lordes supper, and told the that they must content themselues with the one kind, namely with the Oiste, and that the cup serued but for the priest to sing masse withall. And what alledged hee? O there would be many inconueniences. True it is, that all those inconueniences are grounded vpon heathly superstitions, to make men beleue that wyne is no more wyne, but that it is turned into the blood of our Lord Iesus Christ. Then marke here the allegation of the Pope: O sayeth he, there would be many inconueniences if the cup should be giuen to all the people: it were better that the priest should drink in the behalf of all the whole company. To be short, it is all one as if he sayd, we be wiser than God. we see things that he saw not, and therefore we must prouide for them. And after what maner? By putting away 60 the ordinance of Iesus Christ. Be old, our Lord Iesus Christ sayeth drinck ye a l of this cup He sayeth expresse- ly drinck ye all. And behold, the Pope cometh and cut-teth off that word, saying: it is true that so was the ordinance of Iesus Christ. But we haue not done it without good reason, it is to prouide for incōueniences: I haue foreseene it to be so And what shall we say of Gods son: who is the infinite wisdom it self and the light of the world? Did he see nothing in making this institution? VVe see then that men ouershoot themselves beyond all measure, when they consider not that all Gods doings are brought about by infinite righteoulnesse and wisdom. Then let vs hold vs there, and followe the way that he sheweth vs, and not be afrayde that we shal erre, if he once shewe vs his will, and we suffer our selues to be gouerned quietly by it.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better than we haue done, so as we may be sory for them and aske him forgiuenesse, and that therewithall wee may knowe that there is no other help: for vs, but to put our selues to his meriey, that he may spare vs: not for some litle time only, but so as wee may be alwayes vphild by his power, and so assured of his meriey, as we may not doubt but that he will guide vs, euen vnto the end, vntill he haue deliuered vs from all the aduersities and miseries whervnto wee bee now subiect. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to &c.

33. VVill God performe the thing by thee? For thou hast misliked it: but wilt thou chooze and not I? vvhath knowest thou? speake.
34. Yee men of vnderstanding speake you, and let vwise men heare mee.
35. Iob hath not spoken in vvitdome, nocher haue his vvords bin in vnderstanding.
36. I desire that Iob should be tried to the vttermost, to the end vve might see the ansvvers for men of vvickednesse.
37. He vvill multiply his sinnes by iniquitie, he vauntech himself against vs, and multiplieth his vvords against God.

W E haue seene heretofore how God (to skorne mennes folly,) offered to heare mens counsell, saying that if he had not vnderstoode the things that they shewe, or if he had done a misse, he would do so no more: and therupon I declared, that it was not without cause that God so skorned this presumptuousnesse: for we see how men exalt themselves against him, and take vpon them to controll him at euery turne, and therefore God had neede to dandle with them after that maner. And now Eliu setteth forth the maiestie of God, saying: Will he performe the thing by thee? The like as heretofore, he had (as it were) dalyed, to the end that men might knowe the better, how fond their ouerweening is: so also on the contrary part, he sheweth that it is no dalying with so greate a Lord as God is. For when wee haue repayed neuer so much, what are we? Is it meete that he should be subiect to our lustes? Should he aske counsell at our hands to knowe what he should do? Were not that an ouerthrowing of the whole order of nature? So then we see how the holy ghost hauing declared that men are not woorthy to be spoken vnto with reason and grauitie: doeth now touch them to the quick, euen by setting the maiestie of God before their eyes, and by telling them that it is not for vs to set him any lawe or rule. Thus much importeth this saying, Will he performe the thing by thee? For although men ouer labour themselves, yet shall they not win so much, that God should yeeld vnto them, and be subiect to their pleasure: And therefore spight of their teeth they must passe the way that God hath appointed, according as he listeth to dispose things, and: or as we sayd: For it is not in vs to rule the matter. True it is that here it might be objected, that Eliu doth not sufficiently defend Gods righteoulnesse, by alledging his mighty power. But it behoueth vs to beare in mynd, how it hath bene declared afore, that whē God is mounted vp into his seate, he doeth not there glory of an absolute or lawlesse power: but that he is therewith the iudge of the world, and that nothing is more peculiar vnto him than equitie and vpryghtnesse, inso much that he can no more be bereft of them, than of his owne being. On the other side, the case standeth not here, vpon shewing what God intendeth, but of his making of men to feele their owne fraylety. Therefore here is a comparing of things contrary. For on the one side God sheweth that all power belongeth vnto him without exception: and on the other side, he warneth vs to consider wel what we ourselues are, and what our sinfulness is, and to beware how a mortai man that is but a worme of the earth, should take so floury vpon him, as to dare stand in contention with his God, and desire to ouermule him. And sure: y so often as wee murmur against God, and cannot accept the things in good worth which come from him: we knowe him not.

So then let vs marke well, that the holy ghost doeth here bring men lack to their owne state. For neuer durst they be so bold as to grudge against God, except they had forgotten what they themselves be. VVil we then be lowly and mild to glorifie God, as it becommeth vs? Let vs enter into our selues and examin wel what our nature is, and when we knowe that we be but men, it will hold vs short from any presumption. Thus yee see what wee haue to beare away in this text. And further it is sayd, thou hast misliked, thou shalt choyse and not I. Here againe in this streyne God is brought in, complainyng of mens pride for pleading so against him. For surely they that cannot content themselves with Gods will, do mislike his doings, and by that meanes pretend to haue choyce & election, as though it were free for them to saye, this is not well done, God must leaue to do so True it is that we would abhor such blasphemies: and if it should be demanded whether any of vs would take vpon him to let God of the executing of his determinacions: euery of vs would answer, God forbid that euer I should intend to aduance myself so: For it is to diuelishe a pride and to haynouse a blasphemie. But yet in the meane whyle, wee haue our tongs filed to find fault: whensoever God doth not things to our contentacion, yee shall see vs grind our teeth, and make complaints, nother shall we haue neede to haue gone to schoole to learne Retorick to grudge against God. And is not this a plaine misliking of his doings? For at what point are men if they yeeld not quietly to Gods good will? Is it not their mynde to haue the choyze of all things, and to saye God must do thus? So then God must be our page. Behold an outrageouse vice which reygneth euery where, and yet men indeuour not to put it away, no nor to amend it. Somuch the more then ought we to marke well this text, how God cometh in his owne quarrell against vs, and sayeth: you wretched creatures what intend you to do? For I see you murmur dayly: VVheras the cheef point that you haue to do, is to obey myne ordinaunce, and to take it in good woorth, and to hold your pceace and humble your selues when I afflicte you: you are so farre of from doing it, as there is none of you all, but he ryseth vp against mee. And must I be subiect vnto you? VVhat reason can you alledge that I should bee bound to that? Seing that God is brought in after this sort: Surely wee are worse than blockiſhe, if it doo not touche and moue vs. Though our harts were swolne like Toades, yet shoulde the filchinesse brust out: And though they were as harde as rockes, yet ought they too clyue asunder.

But wheras God addeth, what? do you mislike mee? And what mislike we, when we fall to accuſing him after that sort? Do we not finde fault with his righteouſnesse? where is the wellspring of all lyght? Is it not in God? And would wee reiect his doings? whether were that too go? Agayne, this importeth therewithall, that wee would haue fouereyne dominion ouer him, and that he should be no more at his owne libertie, but that he should do what wee thinke good. And that is the cause why he sayeth thenshalt thou chooſe and not I. And by cause men cannot finde in their harts to condemne themselves, except they bee compelled: here God addeth for a conclusion, what knowest thou? speake it. As who should say, he reprooueth vs for our ignorance. Our tong wil be as nimble as may be, and it is hasty to speake a thing before wee haue conceyued it: but God telleth vs that if wee had but one drop of reason, wee should bee as it were dumme. And why? For if a man speake he wote not what: Is it not a fure record of his folly? And yet notwithstanding, wee will bee talking, infomuch that our Lord needeth but to crosse vs with somewhat that misliketh vs, and it whetteth vs too murmur agaynst him.

But now let it bee knowne that we can skill wherof we talke: if al that is in vs be throughly examined, there shall be nothing found but ignorance. Many woords, and litle wit, our tongs shall runne vpon pattins, and in the meane whyle our reasons shall bee vterly sencelesse. And what a rashnesse is that? wee see then how wayghty this conclusion of Gods is, what knowest thou? speake it? As if he should say, I giue you leaue to speake, sobeit that you shewe by your doings that you be wyse men, and men of vnderstanding: But you are starke fooles, and there is nothing in you but ignorance: And must you then take vpon you such liberty to speake, and haue not what too saye? Now if wee can make our profit of this streyne, it conteyneth a good lesson. For first wee see, what is the rule of our life, namely to yeeld God his dewe authority, that he may dispoze of vs, that is to say, that he may do all things, and yet not by our aduice. Then it is not for vs, to set God a lawe and too point him out his lesson: but wee must agree vnto all that he doeth. Marke that for one point. True it is that wee may well demaund the things which we thinke to be for his glorie, & for the welfare of his church, or for our own priuat benefit. For he sheweth such familiaritie towards vs, as to say vnto vs, discharge your harts, and your cares. According also as Sainct Paule sayeth, that wee must make him priuy to our desires. Therefore when wee bee in any vnquietnesse, let vs refer ourselues vnto God, and pray him to do the thing that wee thinke good, howbeit let vs rule ourselues alwayes by his word: notwithstanding if it please him not to graunt our desires, yet must we vse thanksgiuing as sainct Paule sayeth in the same place, and our desires must not be heady, nother must we constrayne God to do that which we require, but contrawise although he say vs naye, and mynde therein to exerceyse our patience, let vs alwayes blisse and glorifie his name, acknowledging that he doeth all things with inestimable iustice, vpryghtnesse, and wisdom, and that we ourselues knowe not what is good, but are poore blynd wretches, and therefore he must bee sayne to see for vs. Thus then ye see that the first poynt which wee haue to marke here, and to put in vre this streyne, is that God must not doo things at our appointment. Howbeit this stretcheth yet further, that is to wit, if wee finde any thing in the scripture which is straunge to our vnderstanding: let vs assure ourselues, that we must not leane so to our owne reason, that God should do what wee thinke ought to be done. How then? let his wil reygne and let men stoupe vnto it: For he ought not to aske counsell of vs. Then behoueth it bothe the Angels of heauen, and men vpon earth, to humble themselves, and God only to beare the sway: Yea euen with such freedome, as it be confessed that it belongeth to him to do what soeuer he doeth.

And on the other side we be warned, that wee cannot do a worse thing than to repine and grudge at God when things fall not out as wee would wishe them. And why? For it is a misliking of the only rule of ryghteouſnesse. And what a thing is that? If a man fall to euill and do amisse through frayty, he is not therefore to be excused: but when he commeth to such a fulnesse of sin, as he is not contented to offend God and to breake his lawe, and to abolish all order, but also would quenche Gods ryghteouſnesse and haue the lyght turned into darknesse, so as there myght be no more discerning betwene good and euill: what an oueroutrageousnesse is that? And yet notwithstanding, as often as men repyne at God, and cannot patiently beare his doings and glorifie him: therein they mislike of him, as though they would vsurpe authoritie ouer him to iudge him, and not only that but also condemne his righteouſnesse, which is too outrageouse and beastly dealing. Therefore when we bee tempted to grudging and impatiencie, let this text come to our remembraunce, and let vs say, thou wretched creature, what doest thou? what a maze entrest thou intoo? This is not a simple temptacion, but a pushing with the hornes agaynst God. Thinkest thou to blot out his ryghteouſnesse? with whom doest thou march thy self? Then if our flesh be so itching, as to make vs bend our selues agaynst God: let this bee as a barre too holde vs backe. And if that suffize not: let vs adde thus much further, that it is to greate a malapartnesse for vs to desire to chooze, specially by taking away Gods choyce. That men should haue the libertie to say, this must bee done: and that God shoulde haue the fouereyntie to gouerne vs, as he listeth: are twoo things that cannot stand together. And why? VVe agree with God, as fire with water. VVe be very well sighted: For if wee looke but half a finger length before vs, wee are dazeled asone as wee open our eyes: and commonly, wee iudge that thing to bee euill, which is good: Our desires are corrupt, and so are all our affections and thoughts. So then, how should we agree with God, who is the infinite, and incomprehensible wisdom dome, and vnto whose righteousnesse it behoueth vs to be subiect? Seing there is such a contrarietie betweene God and men: If we haue the choyce, God must be packing, or else tyed to the stake: and our lusts must be like chaynes and cordes to say to him, thou shalt not stir. And what a presumptuousnesse were that? So then if wee be tempted to grudge at our afflictions, or at any other thing, when the state of the world is out of order, so as things fall not out to our liking: let vs think thus with ourselues: True it is that I may wish this thing, and thy God giueth thee leaue to aske of him so it be done with humilitie & subiectio. But whē thou hast made thy request, thou must hold thy self quiet, though things fall not out to thy liking: eue though thy God seeme to be minded to greue thee of set purpose, yet must thou yeeld in that behalf, and not play the beast. Seing it is so, let vs marke well this sentēce where our Lord sayeth: What? whether would you go? you shall haue the choyce and I shall medle no more. It is al one as if we would bereue God of his being, and abace him in such wise, as we might be maisters ouer him. But very nature teacheth vs the contrary to that: and as often as we murmur after that maner, and storme at things because they fall not our, as we would wishe: it is as much as if we would thrust God vnder our feete. True it is that we think it not, but yet must we not fall to such blockishnesse. Then let vs thinke vpon things, and enter into the sayd consideration, to the end wee be no more so rebellious as we be. And for an end, let vs also marke well this speche, where it is sayd, what knowest thou? speak it. For (as I haue touched already), if wee meane to twit a man that he is a foole, we will say thou knowest not what thou sayest. If we wote not what we say: it followeth that we knowe nothing. And out of doubt when all our skill is thoroughly tried, and that we be serched from top to toe what we be: it will be found there is nothing in vs, but dotage, that maketh vs go astraye. And yet for all that, we must alwayes be pratling whatsoever come of it: I speake of those that followe their owne sensuality. For it is well sayd, I haue beleued and therefore wil I speake. And marke here how we may speake wyzely: that is to wit, by uttering that which we haue learned in Gods schoole, and by his word. This is a good speaking and allowed of God, yea and a sacrifice of good fauour vnto him: namely whē we cōfesse that all things are good which he hath shewed vs, and when we rest wholly vpon his saying. Yee see then in what wize we haue to speake. But when a man auunceth and thrusteth forth himselfe to speake whatsoever he hath imagined in his owne brayne, in so doing he checketh against God. And what knowest thou? Let a man trye well all thy strength and vnderstanding of thy mind, and he shall finde it but stark folly. Therefore whensoever our toong is to lauish of talke: let vs remember how it is sayd here, what knowest thou? And it is certayne that in this place our Lord ment to condemne all mannes wit, like as in other places of the holy scripture where it is sayd that God knoweth the thoughts of men how they be but vayne, and that he sercherh all their secrets, and ouertaketh the wylie in they wylinesse, and that men may well beare themselves in hand that they be sharpwitted and suttile: and yet all is but smoke and vanisheth away strayght. So then in this text our Lord sayth, go to, if you haue any wisdom shewe it, but if you haue no skill, why then do you speake? Here we haue a generall doctrine, which is, that we must not clayme any thing of our owne wit to trust vnto it. Therefore as oft as our wit runneth at rouers, so as we presume to talke and iudge of matters rashly: let vs assure ourselues that the holy ghost setteth himself against it as our aduersary partie, & sheweth that there is nothing but foolish rashnesse in vs. And why? For we haue no skill. True it is that God hath giuen vs reason and vnderstanding: but that is but only to do vs to wit, that the light of God shyneth in our darknesse, of purpose to make vs vnexcusable, in somuch that we haue no knowledge, except God speake vnto vs, and inlighten vs by his word: and that is the waye wherby we may be men of vnderstanding, according as it is sayd in the Psalme, that our wisdom is to profit vnder him. And therefore let vs marke that we must vtterly distrust all our owne reason, and knowe, that till our Lord haue inlightened vs by his word, we are vtterly voyde of all discretion, and there is nother modesty nor honestie in vs. Lo what we haue to beare in mind. Furthermore when we speake let vs be sure aforehand that our Lord hath taught vs, & that we haue the thing of him which wee vtter, and not imagined it of our owne brayne. If all this were well practiced, we should see the world in another order thā it is: For there are two things which displace al right. The one is, when we will be wise in our owne conceits: and the other is, when we giue bridle to our affections and lustes. But if we knew well the thing which is spoken here: that is to wit, that we haue no skill at all, and that our speaking is but to bewray our owne folly: I say if we were thoroughly perswaded of that: no dout but God should be exalted, and all men would hold themselves to his word, so as there should be one cōmon accord, and there would not be somuch disputing of this and that. And for proof hereof, why do the Papistes debate somuch vpon all the articles that are in controuersie betweene them and vs? It is not only because they cannot finde in their harts to be subiect vnto God: but also because they be so sawcy to step forth with their lordly conclusions, to determyne and bynd mens consciences to their resolutions. Then if the Papistes could hold themselves to the pure simplicite of Gods word: surely wee should in one minute of an houre agree vpon al things that are in doubt at this daye. Agayne, as touching these phantastick heads that creepe in amongs vs to defile the pure doctrine: I praye you wherof commeth it, but of this diuelishe pride, that they cannot finde in their harts to receiue the thing quietly, which the holy scripture speaketh? If a man aske these madd heades (which would nowadayes abolishe both Gods free election and also his prouidence and such other like things) what reason they haue: they will answer, mee thinks it very strange. Ye beasts, though a mā were the sharpest witted and the skilfullest that could be, so as he were a paterne of all cunning and learning: yet is he but a flye worme of the earthe to finde any faulte in Gods doings. But behold, these stark beasts haue nothing but pride wherewith they are ready to burst, and stincking poyson: and yet notwithstanding, they take vpō the to ouerturne the holy scripture vnder the colour of this saying, that they perceiue it not. In what cace are we then? So then (as I haue sayd) let this article be marked, that men which haue no skill, ought to hold their peace and kepe silence, to the end that God alone may be exalted. VVere this doctrine thoroughly put in vre, surely wee should see a quiet obedience, and that all of vs would say Amen whensoever the pure trueth of God were layed afore vs. But there is a second mischeef, which is, that our affections are to vnrule, and we giue them leaue to run at rouers. By reaso wherof if God afflict vs, or if things fall not out to our looking, we fall to storming, and euery mā is caried away, and (which worse is) it is not ynough for vs to take libertie to speake against God: but also it seemeth that we seeke occasion to rayle at his iustice if it be not agreeable to our fantasies. VVe see this at all times. And ther-

therefore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke what I haue sayd: namely that if this sentence were put wel in vre, we shuld see an angelicall order in this world. VVhat is to be done then? let vs not followe our owne reason, nor attempt things vpon our owne head, but be contented to be taught of God. And agayne on the other side, when our affections cary vs awaye into bitternesse, so as we be greued and vexed: let vs shake those things off: bycause it is good reason that God should reigne and haue al superioritie ouer vs, and that we shuld obey him: to confesse that all his doings are good and ryghtfull. For then is he glorified of vs, when we acknowledge, not onely that he ought to gouerne vs, but also that he doeth it ryghtfully. Thus ye see what we haue to note. Furthermore whensoever we finde any men, that aduance themselves after that sort agaynst God: let vs vnderstand, that they be in maner desperate and vnrecoverable, sith they cannot submit themselves to the good will of God, to acknowledge the same to be good and ryghtfull. And therefore let their example teache vs to humble our selues, and to say, Alas, as what would betyde thee if thy God preferred thee not. For whence cometh modestie but of the holy ghost? And here thou seeest what the nature of euery of vs is. Then seing the case standeth so: when wee see these lyghtheaded persons that do so aduance themselves, and passe their bounds against God: let euery of vs thinke: as muche might befall me, if I were not withild by the spirit of my God, so as he gouerned mee to make mee meeke, that I might glorifie him, and take in good woorth whatsoever he sendeth mee. Lo here in effect al that we haue to remember in this sentence. Now it is sayd consequently, let men of hart speake, that is to say let men of vnderstanding speake, and let wyse men herken. Heere at the first sight Eliu seemeth to speake things contrarie: for to speake and to herken agree not togither. Yet notwithstanding it is not without cause that he willethe wise men to speake, and men of vnderstanding to herken. For a man shall neuer speake well, except he be willing to heare: nother shall he euer be fit to teache, vnlesse he be willing also to receiue good doctrine. VVe see then that Eliu matcheth two things togither, which ought neuer to be separated asunder: and that is the thing which I haue spoken afore, namely, that we may wel speake, howbeit when we haue learned afore. I haue beleueed (sayeth the Psalme) and therefore haue I spoken. Therefore it behoueth vs to keepe that lesson, for how can we beleuee, vnlesse we haue giuen care and suffered ourselues to be taught? For we must be teachable when good things are set afore vs, according also as it is sayd that the wise man shall become wyser by hearing. Ye see heere a saying of Salomon, which sheweth full well, that to speake is no let but a man should herken: according also as to herken is no let but that a man may speake. For wherefore is our Lord a maister, but to the intēt that we shuld heare him, and euery of vs teache his neyghbours, and therby make the thing auaylable which we haue receyued? If God haue giuen mee any gift of grace, I am bound to vtter it to my neyghbours when I see them do amisse. So then to speake and to herken are twoo things, that not only agree verie wel, but also (which is more) are inseparable: at leastwise if all things be well disposed and considered in good order. True it is that speaking is heere set foremoste: neuertheless when as Eliu sayeth wyze men, he therein presupposeth that they which speake had first learned afore, and knew what to say. And againe whereas in the second place he setteth downe that they should herken: it is to do vs to wit, that our speaking must be after such a maner as we must neuertheless giue care when another mā hath to speake, to whom God hath revealed more than to vs: according also as Sainēt Paule setteth it downe for an order in prophecying Let him that is a Prophet (sayeth he) 1. Cor. 14. f. speak, and let but two or thre do it at once, for auoiding of confusō. Now then in that he calleth them Prophets, he sheweth that it behoueth them to haue what to say, and none must thrust himselfe forth vnlesse he be called: like as he sayeth in the .xii. chapter of the first to the Corinthians, that we haue receyued the things at our Lords hand, which we communicate to our neyghbours. Then must not any mā take vpon him an office in the church, except he be called and haue wherewith to furnish the roome. For it is a record that God will be serued by vs, when he dealeth his graciouse gifts to vs by his holy spirit. S. Paule then declareth and presupposeth, that such as speake, are furnished aforehand. Neuertheless he addeith that when God hath revealed more to another man, the first must hold his peace and giue roome to the spirit of God. And thus ye see why it is said here, that although wise men speake, and that God alloweth them, and also that they be furnished wherewith to do it: yet notwithstanding they must also herken, and be contented to hold their peace when another man speaketh better. For the Prophets do alwayes yeeld themselves subiect to the holy ghost who is the fountaine of all vnderstanding. Also, although a man haue receyued very large gifts of grace: yet doeth God deale them vnto him, but in measure: to the intēt to abridge all occasion of aduancing ourselues to much, as though any man might be sufficient of himself. God therefore hath set it as a band of loue among vs, that one of vs should haue neede of another: and it behoueth vs to mainteyne it by brotherly communicating. For this cause (except we wil be rebels against God) it behoueth vs to be willing to receiue good doctrine at his hands, although God haue inlightened vs by his word. Neuertheless it is certeyne that here Eliu intendeth to reprove Iob, as if he sayd, that Iob hath shewed himself to be euill taught. And surely although Iob were a man of greate learning: yet was he so caried away by his passions, as he was in maner dulle, and his words were out of order. This is the thing that Eliu ment to say. And in this strayne we haue a good admonition to gather. First of all, if Iob, whome God had indued with so greate grace, be condemned as a man voyde of wit, and be reported to haue bin excessiue in his passions, yea and that although he had ttreyned himself to repress them, yet notwithstanding he toke to much libertie: and waddred beastly in his words, what is to be thought of vs? Then let vs take heed to prevent this condemnation, and whensoever our mynde is ouerore shaken, so as we haue fretted against God, & would haue entred into disputation and pleading against him: let vs in the end suffer ourselues to be reproved by the holy ghost. And why? For if Iob (who was an Angell in compaion of vs) were not spared, what shal we bee? Specialy seing we be so heady and vnruelye, is we will not yeeld in any one point, which we be enforced to knowe to proceed from the hand of God: but our minds are so loftie, as we would rule both heauen and earth, and (as you would say) correcte Magnificat. Seing then that wee be so bold, what shal be done to vs? Shall we not be blamed a hundredfo'd more than Iob was? It is a thing that ought to make vs sory at the hart, when we see our passions so outrageouse. Furthermore we haue to marke in general, that a man shall neuer be meete to teache except he do (with all humittie) suffer other men to reprove him when he hath done an ille. Lo how God inteadeth to hold vs in awe by this text. And therefore let euery mā apply it to his owne instruction. For if it be sayd that men of vnderstanding must as well heare as speake: what must they do, that haue no vnderstanding at all? Neuerthelesse wee see nowadayes that it is not for the wyse to speake, or too harken when they haue spoken: who bee they that haue full scope to speake and babble and make other men hold their peace? VVitleffe folke in whome there is nother skill, discretion, nor iudgement. A drunckerd that is dulled with his glottonic, infomuch that when he ryseth in the morning, he hath scarce disgested his euening wine, and is ready by and by to go to a tauerne, and there playeth the beast all day, and the double beast all night: Such a man shall nowadayes haue free liberty to speake, and other men must kepe silence afore him, and giue him the hearing. And how is that? Full shameful. VVe see that they which haue least shame, haue most liberty to speake, and as for such as are men of vnderstanding, they must haue their mouths shut, they may in no wise be brought in. Lightheaded and disordered folke, (and which is the chief of all mischief) the despysers of God haue their full scope. True it is that although they were the wittiest men in the world, and of a sober and settled mynde, yea and also of greate skill: yet is it certeyne that they should alwayes be but beastes, if they haue not the feare of God. But behold, the despyers of God, starke beasts, drunckerds and gluttons, vnthrifts, & such as haue nother honesty nor shame, even those (as I haue sayd) do nowadayes royst it out, those speake what they list, and it is not for any man to be so bold as to quetch against them. Lo at what point we be. And agayne, as for too be heard: How dare any man nowadayes tell other men their faults? For although sinnes bee as howge as mountaynes, yet may no man see them. If a man say, how now? Ought such things to bee borne withall? It will bee answered: hah? what is it? we see it not. Yee wretched beastes, if ye had no eyes, ye were the lesse to be condemned: but you are sufficiently conuicted, and there is none of you all, but he hath the sting of conscience. Too bee short, although there were nother preaching, nor warning, nor any thing else: yet the very hartbyttings that gnawe you within, might make you to see that there is nothing in you but euill, and yet you aske still, hah? what is it? So then we are faire of from putting this doctrine in vre where it is sayd, let wyse men speake and let men of vnderstanding heare. VVheras none but fooies, witleffe folke, and madde men, haue libertie to speake, and bynd other men to the stake, so as they haue al authoritie yetted to them, yet notwithstanding they haue ne'eres to heare, nor to receyue correction. If a man would tell them their faults, they bee such as cannot abyde any bewraying. Neuerthelesse, if we go agaynst the thing that God hath stablished, our stryuing to overthrowe it shall bee but in vayne. It is to hard a walk for vs: And therefore let such as rushe agaynst it, assure their selues that it shall bee too their ruine

Prou. 1. a. 5.

and destruction. Lo what we haue to heare in mynde. And therefore sith wee knowe how things are confounded nowadayes: let vs learne too returne thither as God calleth vs: which is, that his doctrine should bee heard and take place amongs vs, so as all of vs should be diligent to receyue it, and he which knowes he hath don amisse, should seke to amend it: that by that meanes wee myght all do honour to him that ought to haue souereyntie ouer vs, and consider that if Job were condemned for giuing himself the bridle too much in that he mortified not his affections, nor hild them sufficiently in awe: Alas what shall become of vs? Then let vs thinke vpon it, and be ashamed to see thee wretchednesse that hath reigned too much amongs vs. For I pray you, to what purpose is it for vs to speake of the reformation of the gospell, when in the meane seazon wee stryue after this sort agaynst God? wheras wickednesse hath his full scope nowadayes: so farre of are men from repressing it, that it is rather mainteyned with tooth and nayle: infomuch that if a man take vpon him to speake, and to shewe them their faults: then the lambe doeth alwayes trouble the water. These stincking goates that croude themselves into Gods churche, do trouble and defile all the holynesse that God hath set amongs vs by his word: and in the meane whyle these filie lambes must be accuzed, as though they werethe cause of all the euill. Sith wee see this, let vs learne to strengthen and encourage our selues, that when we see the euill in others, we may take heede that it bee not also in our selues. And furthermore, when we feele that our Lord graunteth vs the grace to submit ourselues vnto him in all mildnesse, so as we suffer our selues to be taught: although wee see wickednesse raygne, not only let vs not consent vnto it, but also let vs resist it stoutly to the vttermost of our power. For he that dissembleth, or draweth a curten before his eyes, when wickednesse raungeth abroad, and the diuell caryeth awaye his vnderlinges, after that sort: is as guilty in Gods iudgement, as if he had mainteyned the euill. Thus ye see how we ought to practize this doctrine, if we will do God his dewe service, and acknowledge him to be Lord and souereygne ouer al monarchies and principalities in the world.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs to repent them, that being gouerned by his holy spirit, we may fight manfully agaynst all the temptacions and afflictions of the world, and whyle that it shall please him too kepe vs here, wee may seeke to bee altogether subiect to his holy commaundementes. And so let vs say, Almighty God our heavenly father, we acknowledge and confesse according to the trueth, that we be not woorthie to lifte vp our eyes to heauen, to present our selues before thee, nor to presume so farre as that our prayers &c.

Eliu procedeth saying:

2. Diddest thou think this aright, vwhen thou saydest my ryghteousnesse is aboute God?
3. For thou hast sayd, vwhat shall it profit mee, or vwhat shall it auayle mee, not to haue sinned?
4. I vwill ansvere thee and thy freends like vyvse.
5. Looke vp to the heauens and behold them, looke vp to the ayre that is aboute thee.
6. If thou sinnest: vwhat dost thou agaynst him? And if thy sinnes be multiplied? vwhat hurrest thou him?
7. If thou bee ryghteous: vwhat giuest thou him? Or vwhat shall hee receyue at thy hand?

Liu contineweth here still to blame Job for blaspheming the righteous-nesse of God: & he groundeth it vpon this point, that Iob had ment that his own ryghteousnesse surmounted God.
 Not that he vttered those words, or pretended any such thing: but by-cause he had maynteyned his owne ryghteousnesse in such wise, as though God had tormented him wrongfully and without cause. And therevpon it should haue in-sued, that God dealt not reasonably with him, but afflicted him out of measure. Howbeit for the better, concey-uing hereof, it behoueth vs to call to mynd what hath bene set downe heretoofores. When Iob spake of his owne ryghteousnesse, it was only to the end to shewe that he was not punished for his offences, and that he ought not to bee iudged wicked bycause God afflicted him so greuously aboue all other men. For (as I haue told you) God in afflicting men, hath not alwayes an eye to the punishing of their tynnes, but intendeth too trye their patience, as beefell vnto Iob when God gaue Satan the brydle. For it was not bycause Iob was a naughty pack, and had prouoked Gods wrathe by greate offences.
 No, but although Satan found no fault in him, yet notwithstanding he obteyned leaue to torment him. So then the cause why God afflicted Iob after that sort, was not for that he was angrie with him, but for that he intended to try his obedience, that it might be a mirrour vnto vs.
 Therefore Iob fought very well in saying that he was not punished for his offences, but that there was some other respect: And therein he deserueth not to be condemned.
 But his faulte was, that being troubled with the vehemencie of his passions, he thought first of all, that God vsed no measure, but was to sore agaynst him, and that a poore creature ought not to bee punished after that sort, and so did he murmure in that behalf. True it is that Iob flattered not himself in his infirmitie: but yet had he not so good staye of himself as he ought to haue had. And agayne, the greatest mischeef was, that hee thought vpon nothing but his anguise, insomuch that attymes: his fayth was as it were choked, and he looked no more to the heauenly life, nor to the reward that is promised too all the faythfull after their manfull fighting.
 Hee could not attayne to that, bycause he was sore possessed with his greef, and as it were troubled and vtterly ouerwhelmed. Yee see then that Iob confesseth ryghtly in generall, that God hath prepared an euerlasting heritage, that cannot fayle, for those that are his, and that the wicked also cannot scape his hand, but although they triumphe in this world and take their pleasure here, yet they shall paye very deere for it. Iob knewe all these things in generall: but when he ment to applye the doctrine to himself, he could not bring it to passe, bycause his hart was distressed and hee stormed too much.

VVhen he was at that afterdeele, hee gazed here and could not see three foote afore him without dazeling of his eyes: his wits were after a sort bereft him. That was the cause why he could not comfort himself with the hope of the rest that was promised him. For he had assuaged all his anguise, if he had remitted himself vnto God to say, euen so Lord, yet haue I alwayes hoped that thou wilt make mee feele, that such as shall haue suffered their afflictions patiently, shall be happy in the end. Lord thou giuest me knowledge, that such as wayte vpon thee shall neuer be disappointed of their hope. For thou wilt still provide for all their aduersities, and giue them a good end, and although thy helpe appeare not out of hand, yet wilt thou neuer fayle them. Iob ought to haue thought of these things, but he did not. For his passion hild him as it were in prison: and his faith (as I sayd afore) was in maner choked. Like as if the we her bee sore troubled and darke, wee shall paraduenture haue some maner of light, but yet shall we not see a whit a farre off. For the darke clouds do as it were dimme our eyes, so as wee cannot discern any thing. Euen so is it with vs when we bee afflicted. According as experience sheweth that when a man is vexed in his conscience, he seeth nother sunne, nor moone, but all is darke vnto him. True it is that he will hold still the principles which the faithfull ought to haue, so as he shall knowe God and his goodnesse, but yet can he not take comfort to chere vp himself in the middes of his sorowes. For he cannot conclude thus with himself: go to, yet will I hold on still.

 For my God recheth mee his hand, and I shall get out of these distresses and perplexities wherein I am. The man therefore that is so pressed with anguise when God af-flicteth him and maketh him too feeble his sinnes, is dis-maid and cannot come so farre as to say, God hath declared that he will drawe his seruauants out of the graue: and therefore although I seeme to be vtterly ouerwhel-med, yet is not Gods mighty power diminished towards mee. Lo in what taking Iob was. So then although he knewe that the heauenly life is prepared for vs, and that it is our very heritage, and that there wee shall haue the euerlasting ioye: yet could he not comfort himself in his afflictions. And why? For he was ouerraught too much with his affliction, for that it made him feeble Gods hand agaynst him: his eyes were after a sort blind folded: his wits were so amazed as he could not chere nor comfort himself to take hold of Gods promises with such tast as the same might assuage his miseries. And this is a lesson well woorthy to be noted. For wee see continually, that when wee are afflicted with hartgreeses, wee are so amazed, that wee be as if a man had giuen vs a knocke vpon the head with a beetle, yea and wee may well haue some feeling therof also in our bodily afflictions. In winter if there be a greate frost, so as it be able in maner to ryue stones: we could finde in our harts that all were on fire. And why? For we haue the present passion before our eyes, and wee haue forgotten quite what heate meeneth. Cleane contrariwise, in sommer when wee bee ouerwhote, wee would that all were full of yce.

Now if wee come too our minds: for asmuch as the passions of it, are much more excessiue: no doubt but they are able to oppresse vs much more. Yee see also how we ought to go rightforth vnto God, that wee myght bee comforted in him, and imbrace his promises which lift vs aboue the world and make vs behold the glorie which as now is inuisible: But oftentimes, wee cannot come to that point at the first brunt. So then this doctrine is very necessary for vs. For whereinto myght wee fall, if wee take not hold of the rest which is prepared for vs in heauen? wee should fall as it were intoo despayre and blaspheme God. For nothing can bring vs too yeeld him glorie, and too confesse that he afflicteth vs iustly and ryghtly, excepte wee feele that the presente afflictions are auaylable to our saluation, and that God ruleth them in such wise, as they serue vs for medecynes.
 If wee heleeue not this: how can wee glorifie God?
 Howe can wee soupe vnder his myghtie hand, to yeld our selues to him obediently as saint Peter exhorteth vs?
 It is impossible. Nay cleane contrary wise, there will be nothing with vs, but fretting and gnawing of teeth. If this beefell vnto Iob, what will befall vnto vs? True it is that

Exec. 27 d. 12.

1. Pet. 5. b. 6.

that Iob ment it not, nother would wee do any more : but yet notwithstanding we be as blame woorthy, as if we would pleade against God, and make our selues more righteouse than him. So then we haue good cause to pray vnto God that when he afflicteth vs, he will neuer suffer vs to forgo the taste and fauour of his promises, but that we may alwayes hope that he will bring our miseries to an end : yea and to such an end, as we shall haue cause to prayse him, as a good father that hath procured our welfare. Furthermore when wee feele our infirmitie to bee such, as wee be in maner dazled by our afflictions, and cannot mount vp to the rest that tarieth for vs about: let vs vnderstand that we be in the hie way to blaspheme God if he remedy it not: yea and although wee meane not to make our selues more righteouse than God, yet notwithstanding let vs assure ourselues that we ame alwayes at that marke when we fall to grudging and repyning: and that is a cursed blasphemy. Then behoueth it vs to condemne all our passions when we be so greued and vexed, as we knowe not on which side to turne vs. 20 Let vs consider I say, that then our afflictions do boyle to feruently, and therefore are cōdemned by the holy ghost. Iob could well haue replied therevnto and haue sayd, I neuer had any intent to blaspheme God nor to magnifie my righteousnesse about his: Yes but he doeth for all that. For is God more righteouse than we, if our mouth be not stopped to condemne our selues, so as we alledge no excuses before him, nor take leaue to grudge agaynst him, when it pleaseth him to afflict vs after what sort foecer it be? Then if we be not so beaten downe, and that we confesse not that God doeth al things iustly: it is cer- 30 teyne that we would aduance our righteousnesse about his: and that is all one, as if we would spurne against the sunne. Now then sith we be warned therof, let vs learne (as I sayd) to preuent the mischeef. And when soeuer we be afflicted let vs be fully perswaded and resolved in our selues, that God knowes why he doeth it, although wee see not the reason therof. And furti more that we must not be so troubled with the aduersitie that lieth vpon vs, but that we should hope that God will deliuer vs, foras- 40 much as he hath promised euer to sayle those that are his. VVherfore let vs ouerpasse all the troubles that are afore our eyes, and which hinder vs from looking further off, and let the same serue to comfort vs, so as wee may saye, yet will God haue pity vpon vs in the end. And therefore let vs passe on still, and beldiy go through with our course. Lo what we haue to marke in this streyne. And that the sense, is such, it appeareth by that which Eliu gathereth of it. For he layeth it forth saying: thou hast sayd, what shall it boote me not to haue sinned, and what shall it profit mee? The thing then wherein Eliu vpbraydeth Iob that he would make himself more righteouse than God, is that he had thought it to be an vprofitable thing to haue walked in the feare of God, and to haue absteyned from sin. For if we imagin that: where is Gods righteousnesse become? It is as good as abolished. For Gods rightfulness cōsisteth not noy in doing no mā wrōg, but also in gouerning the world with equitie, and in disposing his creatures after such a sort, that if we trust in him, we shall not be disapointed, and that if we serue him with a good cōscience, we are sure to haue reward for it. Then if God should forsake those that feare him, and not passe to reward them in heauen: surely he should cease to be ryghteouse, according also as the Apostle declareth in the Epistle to the Hebrewes. God (sayeth he) is not vnrighteouse, that he should not remember your afflictions too giue you relief: For he is saythfull. VVhen he sayeth that God is not vnryghteouse: hee sheweth that his righteousnesse is a thing inseparable from his being. Although then, that he exercise men with many afflictions in this world, when they haue behaued themselues stedfastly in their vocation, yet must they comfort themselues with his promis: and it is a point well woorthy to be noted. For we shall see many which imagin that God is asleepe in heauen. Howbeit his Godhead is not a vayne imaginacion, but it importeth the things which I haue spoken concerning the gouernement and souereyne dominion of the world: namely that like as he hath created all things so also bothe man and beast and all things else, are in his hand and protection, and all things must be brought to a good end for their sakes which are his: & that although things be out of order here bilowe, yet in the meane whyle, as in respect of himself, there is nothing at all out of order: and that although he suffer things to be otherwise disposed than wee would haue them, yea and appoint many confuzions also, yet can he well skil to set al things in perfect stare agayne. Thus ye see a thing that belongeth vnto God, and is peculiar to his being. And so let vs marke, that if we will glorifie God and yeeld him the deserved prayse of his righteousnesse: we must behold his hand and power in all things, and not doubt but that he hath iust cause to do whatsoever he doeth, although we knowe not why he doeth it. Lo in effect what we haue to beare in minde. Furthermore, the perfectest men that are, may sometimes be tēpted to say, what booteth it thee, not to haue sinned? according as I alledged yesterday, that Dauid entered into the same doubt, and sayd, Then haue I lest my tyme in clem- 50 sing my hands: and it is but lost labour that I haue kept myself from filthinesse and infection. Dauid was tempted herewith, and there is not any of the faithfull that is not now and then shaken with such fancies: specially when aduersities oppresse vs sore by reason of our infirmities, and the diuell assaileth our sayth through our vnbeleef, so as wee cannot but bee sore afrayd, and enter intoo these present doubts. VVell then, what is to be doone in the meane whyle? VVe must beate them 60 backe and condemne them: and not only condemne them, but also abhorre them, saying: wretched creature, needes must thou bee full of vanitie, when thou darest so set vp thy bristles against thy God: and what an outrage is that? Yee see then how it behoueth vs too thruste faire from vs, all the wicked imaginacions wherwith the diuell laboreth to peruert vs. Howbeit, some tymes the mischeef is so greates, that we be not sufficiently strengthened to withstand the assaults of it, according as it happened vnto Iob. For he fel at length to repining and sayd: what is this? I would I were where no man might think vpon mee more. After what sort speaketh Iob? It is a heathenishnesse, yea it is a brutishnesse, to say I would I were in my graue: For why? then I shuld feele no more miseries. And where is the hope of the faithfull? what becommeth of the threatnings which God maketh to the wicked, that they must be fayne to feele his dreadfull hand in the end? Iob is become so brutish, that he remembreth not these things. So then it behoueth vs, to mistrust our owne affectiōs, that we may see. How? So perfect a man, which was like an Angell of heauen, and had record of Gods owne mouthe, as we haue seene afore, is neuerthelesse so ouerraught with anguish, as he cannot consider that when we go to the graue, we be not there medled together confuzedly, but God separateth his owne seruants from the rebroate, so as their soules are in his custody, and he kepeth them in safetie. If Iob were so farre driuen, that he could not remember this: what will betyde vs? True it is that Iob was not an infidel,

Hebr. 6. c. 10.

Psa. 73. b. 13

to deny the resurrection, and to reiect all the doctrine of the euerlasting life. No, but he wanted a presente aduisednesse to bethink him of it, in the time of his nede he had not his armour alwayes in a readinesse. It is like as if a man should perhaps be taken vnwares, and so amazed as he could not draw his sword, but shrinke backe and stagger, yea and paradiecture receyue some blowe, ere he could defend himself. Euen in like case was Iob. True it is that he had both sword and buckler: but he was taken so vnwares, as the dinell had him at some aduantage: 10 Infomuch that he began as it were to shrinke and (as I haue shewed afore) could not lift vp his mind to heauen to behold the hope that God giueth to the faithful. Seing it is so, let vs learne to desirist ourselues, and to knowe that there is such a fraylty in vs, as we should bee borne downe neuer to ryse vp agayne, if our Lord did not pity vs, and reache vs his mighty hand, to the end we might cal vpon him and refer our selues wholly to his will. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in effect vpon this texte. And by and by Eliu addeth, I will answere thee and thy companions. 20 In saying so he sheweth that when men stryue in that maner against God, they shal gaine nothing by it, though they had neuer so great a band and trayne. For God is able ynough to beate them backe with one word to their confusion. Iob had no companions, but spake alone in the mayntenance of his quarrell: but Eliuze intent is to say, Although thou haddest a greate army with thee, and that you had conspyred together too accuze and blasphemie God all with one mouth: yet notwithstanding, myne answere shall bee sufficient for you all. Here then we see 30 how strong Gods tructh is, and that it is in vayne too fight agaynst it, and that although wee bee fensed and haue manye pattakers, yet must God alwayes haue the vpper hand, so as his ryghteousnesse, shall contynue vnappayred. VVhen wee haue barked our fill agaynst it, wee shall not bee able too byte it, as shal be sayd anone. Marke (I say) what we haue to remember in this strayne. And therefore first of all let vs learne, not to bee lauishe of our tongues when God afflicteth vs, and when things go not after our mynd. Let vs not bee impacient therefore 40 in our afflictions, but let vs alwayes humble ourselues vnder him, acknowledging that he is ryghteous howe soeuer the world go. For if wee be so bold as to barret with him: it will be to our greate confusion and shame. Yee seethen how all men ought to brydle (and as it were to imprison) theselues, to the end they may neuer murmure agaynst God, nor blasphemie him. Furthermore though wee haue many partakers, yet shall it not boote vs: For God will not suffer himselfe to bee overcome, by neuer so greate multitudes of men. It shall bee in vaine 50 for vs to assemble men of our owne retinue: For wee shall all of vs bee put too the foyle together. If all the world had made a confederacie to spyght God, he would not passe of it, he would but laugh them to scorne: according as it is sayd in the second Psalme, that when the kings of the earth haue consulted together, and the people haue storned as much as they list: he that is about will laugh them to scorne.

Psalm. 2. 4.

Thus yee see that the second point which wee haue to marke, is that wee must not thinke our case to bee the better, when wee haue many adherents and partakers. For God will condemne all the whole packe of vs. And furthermore wee see also on the other parte, that when wee haue Gods tauth on our side, wee must not sticke to maynteyne it. And why? For he will giue vs mouth and wisdom, and also power to beate backe all our enemies. And wee haue greate neede in these dayes to be armed with such assurance: For wee see with what turioussnesse the enemies of the gospell set vp themselves. Bycause wee bee but a handfull of people and they a greate multitude, and that in a maner the whole world agreeth with them to practize our death: They beate themselves in hand, that the goale goeth on their syde: and there is nothing but triumphing amongst them before any stroke bee stryken. VVhat a thing were it then, if wee knewe not that which is shewed vs here? That is to wit, that forasmuch as wee haue the truth on our side: one of vs may alwayes fight agaynst a hundred thousand, and wee neede not to bee afrayde, when the Papistes come stoutly agaynst vs with their Ergoes, although they be a greate hoste and wee fewe or none in comparison. No no: let not that abashe vs. And why? For this saying, I will answere thee and thy companions, is not written alonely for the person of Eliu, but the holy ghost giueth vs that promis, to the intent we should not sticke to enter into battell, and too stand stoutly to it to the vttermoost, sith we knowe our case is good, and that God fyghteth for vs bycause wee maynteyne his quarrell.

Therefore, when wee haue such a certeynetie, let vs fight boldly agaynst our enemies, for they must needs bee confounded in the end. Thus yee see what wee haue to heare in mynde, and how wee may put this text in vre to applye it to our instruction, specially at this presente tyme, when wee see the whole world imbattayled agaynst God, and the multitude of enemies so greate, as it myght vtterly discourage vs, if our Lord did not comforte vs by telling vs, that wee haue wherewith too answere for him, though there be neuer so many gaynsayers that are so confederate together. Now let vs come to the answere that Eliu maketh. Behold the skies (sayeth he) look vp to the greatest beaues: they are hygher than thou, and thou cannest neuer reache to them. This seemeth to bee a very rawe answere: For had he none other reason wherby too shewe the ryghteousnesse of God? Yes: But if this saying be applyed as it ought too be: it is ynough to stoppe the mouthes of al such as blasphemie God. For by the beholding of the heauens, hee leadeth vs to another consideration: which is, that our doing well profiteth not our God, and that our doing euill, cannot hurt him: For what shall he be the worse for it? Seing it is so, he is not to be measured according vnto men: For he is not reuengeful, as who would say he is angry when a man doeth him wrong, or that he is led by affection, like a man that looks too bee pleased, and thinks himself beholding to another man for doing him any seruice. God is none such. So then wee must not measure him by our owne meteyard, nor imagin any fleshlinesse in him. For the very skyes that are vnder his feete, doo shewe well that he is not like vs, nor medled here with vs to haue any parte at all of our nature. Therefore wee see that this reason (where it is sayd, Behold the skies and loke vp about thy hed) is sufficient too beate downe all those that dare list vp themselves agaynst God.

But now it is needfull to laye out that which followeth by peccemele, to the end it may bee the better vnderstoode. VVhen Eliu sayeth, if thou doo good what profit doeth God receyue by it? He sheweth thereby, that God is not bound vntoo vs. Marke that for the first point. The second is, that he is not affectioned, as men are: when any pleasure is done them, they are moued with it, by cause they bee passible: but God is not so: wee canne neither shewe him friendship nor fauour. And so he is not like vnto vs. And as touching the first point, namely that God is by no meanes bound vntoo vs, do what wee can: It is a very true thing. Notwithstanding we see how men growe proude, yea euen without cause or occasion, and would make God beleue, that he is beholding to them although they can bring him nothing. And this draweth after it a mischeeuouse taylor of superstition. Why do the Papiſts labour so much at this daye for these ceremonies and gewgawes? It is because they thinke that God receyueth some profit by them, when they make many gewgawes, and haue babbled and trotted from place to place. They thinke they haue made a fayre worke when their churchstufte is well decked, and when they haue wel trimmed and washed their puppets, as if a man had made a goodly banquet and decked vp a house, and bestrowed it with ruffes & other things. The Papiſtes (I saye) surmize that God delyghteth in these nyce toys, and that hee taketh pleasure in them. But wee must not imagin that wee can bring any thing vnto God. And that is the cause why it is sayd in the sixteenth Psalme, Lord, my goods cannot come at thee. Howe then? But I honour thy saynts that are on earth. Forasmuch as God can receyue no benefite by vs, he commendeth our neyghbours vnto vs: and when wee do good to such as are in necessitie, liuing freendly and vpryghtly among men, and indeuering to impioye our selues faithfully, where wee bee able to helpe and succour: God accepteth such things as sacrifices. So then let vs remember this doctrine, where it is sayd that wee cannot bring any thing vnto God. For it serueth to abate all pride in vs, to the intent wee myght not thinke that God is any thing beholden to vs, nor bee led vnto foolish superstitions, to gad vp and downe and to do many things of no valewe, as though God tooke pleasure in them. And why? For wee can bring nothing at all to him. But we must also apply this doctrine too the presente intent of Eliu: which is, that God is not like mortal men, which are moued and touched. And why? Because they haue neede one of anothers helpe, and cannot set lyght by other mens force.

Thus yee see what the cause is that wee bee moued and caryed to and fro. But there must no such dotages enter into our head concerning God: for he behaueth not himself after our maner, nother can wee do him any good. Contrary wyse also it is sayd that if wee sin, we can hurt him by it. True it is that when wee offend God we do (as much as in vs lyeth) impeache his ryghteousnesse: and by that meanes he is very ill delt withall. Therefore when wee sin, we are a woorthy nolesse than if wee had impeached the most iustie of God. VVe knowe what is the rule of ryghteousnesse which he commaundeth vs, and when wee go contrary to that, it is asmuch as if wee would barre him from reygning, plucke him out of his seate, and as it were trample him vnder our feete. Of all these things are men gilty: but yet cannot God be either increased or diminished in himself. Therefore let vs marke well that by our sinning wee hurt not God. Neuertheless as touching them that blaspheme God, true it is that when they spewe out their venim, thereby they deface his glorie, according as it is sayd that his name is euill spoken of, and his glorie diminished, when we acknowledge him not to bee good, ryghteous, and wyse, by confessing it before men. And so is his reygning diminished, howbeit in respect of vs. And not in respect of himself. But in the meane season, what do we by sinning? when wee haue done neuer somuch, wee cannot do him any anoyance. Let the best archer in the world shoote vp, and see if he shall hit the sky. VVhen wee haue practized all that is possible, can we come at God? Can wee by any meanes touche him? No surely. But (which more is) all that we cast vpward, must fall downe vpon our owne heads. If I shoote at a man, and hit him, I wound him. but I cannot hit God as I sayd afore. VVe may well runne casting of stones, and we may wel shoote both with bowes and gonnies, but yet shall God bee alwayes farre ynough from the dint of our strokes. True it is, as I haue already sayd, that wee may well barke, but wee can neuer byte. VVhen men cast vp their blowes, where lyght they? Shall they passe about the skyes? No. But they shall fall backe vpon their owne heads. And so men cannot auance themselves agaynt God, but too their owne confuzion.

Thus yee see a text here well woorthy to be noted. VVherin Eliu sheweth, that if we do amisse, wee can do God no hurte at all by it. And therupon we haue a double instruction to gather. The one is, that God sheweth a singular and infinite goodnesse towards vs, in that it pleaseth him to accept our seruice although he receyue no profit by it, and that he same touche him not at all. Marke that for one. And this ought to be vnderstoode in one word. But forasmuch as, there be some ignorant persons here: it is requisite to declare it more fully. Yee see then that God might reiect vs, without making account of any of vs. And why? For (as I haue sayd) let all the world strayne it self as much as it can, and yet shall wee not bee able to do any thing that can profit our God. And yet notwithstanding he telleth vs, that if wee indeuer to do good and to walke in his commaundements, our doings are acceptable sacrifices vnto him. Now, is it not a singular comfort that he giueth, when he sayeth I accept your doings, and although they be not worthy to be esteemed at my hand, yet I take them in good woorth, and bind my self to you as if I were beholding too you for it? Is it not a souereyne goodnesse, when God doeth this of his owne accord? Then let vs learne to magnifie the mercie of our God, for accepting our works wheras they deserue it not, nor he on his side, is any thing bound by the. Also let it serue to encourage vs to do well, when wee see that God receyueth the thing at our hand which is nothing woorthie, and putteth all the poynts of our works as it were into articles in his booke of account, for that they be acceptable to him thorough his owne goodnesse. And in good sooth is it not an inestimable goodnesse of our God, and such a one as ought too rauishe vs into woonderment, when wee thinke vpon it? VVe see then how gratiose he sheweth himselfe towards vs. And on the other side, we must consider the other point that is set downe heere: which is. That do wee neuer somuch euill, wee cannot hurt our God.

Therefore let vs assure ourselues, that God will not punishe vs for our sinnes, by reason of any spyght he beareth vnto vs, nor for that he desireth to bee reuenged, as a man doeth when he is offended. For when a man hath any wrong done him, so as he is harmed in his owne person, or hindred in his goods, he will seeke to bee reuenged. God (I say) is not moued with such considerations. VVherfore then doeth he threaten vs? Because he will not haue vs perishe: he sheweth the fathersly regard which he hath of our welfare, and in the meane while if he punishe vs indede, therein he sheweth his iustice. For in this case, there is no going to lawe with him as if he had some priuate quarrel to vs: but he punisheth vs as a iust iudge: according as his office and nature do afford. Then seing that our God procedeth after that maner: what haue wee to do, but to consider his fathersly loue when he chasticerth vs? for by that meane hee draweth vs backe from the waye of damnation wherin we are. Therefore when wee feele his hand, how rough foeuer it be, let vs alwayes consider that he sheweth himself ryghteous. VVhat is to be done then, but only to trust in him, and to comfort our selues by it, and therewithall to desire him to haue pitie vpon vs, that although wee haue offended him, yet he may not forbear too receyue vs to mercy: Herewithall let vs be fully persuaded and resolu'd, that God will not beare such a stomack towards vs, as a proude and stately man will do. But forasmuch as he is the fountayne of all goodnesse and mercy: if wee come vnto him, he will make vs feele how mercifull he is mynded to be towards vs. And although hee chaunce vs now and then, yea euen more roughly than we would: yet will he make vs to perceiue that he doeth it for our welfare, to the end we should not perishe, and that his brydling of vs so short, is to humble vs and to make vs bowe vnder his myghtie hand and chalicements.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faul's, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue done, too the end wee may finishe our race with the greater patience through out the miseries and calamities of this world, and therewithall learne so to seeke for the perfection of ryghteousnesse, as wee may neuer bee wery to learne more and more in his schole, and to go forward in the waye of saluation, vntill wee be come too our races end, which is, that being bereft of all the infirmities of our fleshe, wee may bee clothed with his euerlasting glory. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage &c.

The cxxxvij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxxv. Chapter.

8. Thy vickednesse toucheth a man like thyself, and thy ryghteousnesse the Sonne of man.
9. By reason of the multitude of oppressors, men cry not (or howle) bycause of the mightinesse of maysters.
10. And no man sayeth, vwhere is God that hath fashioned mee, vvhich giueth vs songs in the nyght?
11. VVhich teacheth vs more than the beasts, and instructeth vs more than the birds of the ayre.

Or a conclusion of that which was declared yesterday, we haue to consider what Eliu vttereth heere in fewe words: which is, that our misdeedes do touche men, and not God, and likewise that our righteousnesse, to the end we should not imagin that God is colerick to reuenge himself when wee haue offended, or that on the contrary parte he is bound vnto vs, as if our seruice did him any good. Then let vs not thinke that God is like vnto vs, nother let vs measure him by our wit. True it is that he abaced himself of his owne good will: For how doeth he speake vnto vs, but after the maner of men? But yet must this bee no derogation too his hyghnesse. Should God bee despized, bycause it pleaseth him of his infinite goodnesse, too yield to the rudenesse of men? Nay, Contrarywise he deserueth too bee magnified the more at our hands. Then were it a greate wrong and iniurie, too transfigure him bycause he frameth himself to our slenderesse and to thinke that he is angrie, bycause men haue prouoked him, or to thinke that he ought to recompence men, as if he were bound too them, I say it were as an abolishing of his maiettie. For he is not of our number: Let vs yeeld that vnto men as vnto whom it belongeth: but as for him, it behoueth vs to honour his incomprehensible hyghnesse. Thus yee see what wee haue to gather vpon this first verse. And nowe remayneth to see, after what maner God is ryghteous and gouerneth the world in equitie, and yet in the meane whyle things are out of order. For the wicked haue their full scope, they oppresse, they pill, they powle: and God dissembleth, and maketh no countenance to prouide for it. How is it ment that God hath the guiding of the world, and that he dispozeth all things ryghtly, and yet notwithstanding men see so greate troubles, and outrageouse iniquities without redresse? Eliu therefore comprehendeth all this, and sheweth that wee must not woonder though God being so patient doo let things go amisse, and prouide not for them so soone as we call vpon him: For we do it not hartely. Then if God suffer men to be afflicted, he doeth it iustly, bycause they returne not to him with prayer and thanksgiuing as they ought to do. Neuerthelesse it behoueth vs too tary his leysure, and although he delaye his iustice, and seeme not to send it, so soone as it ought to come: yet notwithstanding wee must wayte patiently, and do him the honour to trust in him, although he bee as it were hidden from vs. This (I say) is the first poynt which is set downe here. And first of all Eliu declareth, that men are not woorthie that God should succour them at their neede. And why? If they be oppressed, so as they haue any harm or wrong done them, true it is that they crye out, and storme, and can skil to bewaile their cace, but yet doo they neuer the more flee vnto God. A man shall heare the screkes and howling of such as indure aduersitie: but yet for all that God heareth them not although it be his office to reskewe them that be wrongfully oppressed, bycause they haue not an eye vnto him, nor doo direct themselues vnto him, but make their complainte without order. Should not God then leaue them there, as in their owne wilfulnesse? And what is the remedie of it, but to know that God doth not chalenge this title to himself in vaine, that he wil succour the oppressed, and therupon go directly vnto him? But we do it not, and therefore our crying out is to no purpose, for wee deserue to be shaken of at his had, and that he shuld shet his eyes, and not regard to helpe vs. And why? For we seeke him not. It is written, seeke, and yee shall find: and we go quite an other waye. Thus yee see a poynt that is well woorthy to bee noted. For it is a stumblingblocke that troubleth vs very sore when we see that God suffereth men to languishe after that maner, and seemeth not to pitie them when their miseries are come too most extremite. For therupon wee conclude that he regardeth not our iniuries, but is so farre withdrawne from vs, as hee hath no care to prouide for our necessities. But in the meane while we consider not that we deserue wel to be destitute of his helpe, because we go not right forth vnto him. And truly euen at this day the confusions are so greate and horrible in the worlde, as we cannot thinke vpon them without shuddering. Looke vpon the warres that are in many places: ye shall see a whole Countrey wasted: the poore folke knowe not what to do, their houses are burned, and their goodes are vtterly spoyled. By meanes whereof the people are in such anguish, as it had bene better for them too haue had their throtes cut at the first, than to pine after that sort as they do. But yet for all that, they looke not vnto God. If a man go intoo straunge Countreies, he shall heare many complaints, and he shall not neede to go verie farre for the matter: for wheresoever bee taxes and impositions, or wheresoever men of warre passe like floods of water, there is no man but hee shall crie, for hee shall bee galled vnto the harde bones. But dooth the world amende for all this? Doth it come with true humilitie to seeke God and to say, Alas Lord it is for our sinnes that thou handlest vs so roughly, and it would behoue vs to thinke thereupon, but there is nothing in vs, but pride, disdain, and rebelliousnesse against thee.

And therefore Lorde thou hast shewed thy selfe to be our soueraine: nowe shewe vs also the fauour that wee may feele thee our father, and succour vs in this ende. Doth the worlde vse any such speeche? Alas it is faire from it, men do rather chafe vpon the bitte, and in the meane while thinke not at all vpon God. Is it not rather a recorde that he cannot beare such despising of his grace? For like as he proueth his truth when hee helpeth those that seeke him and sue to him: and as hee sheweth thereby that his promising too bee mercifull too such as seeke him, is not too disappoynt them of their truste and hope: and like as hee ratifieth his truth, and sheweth himselfe faythfull and trustie, by helping such as call vpon him. So also on the contrary parte he suffereth those to rotte which seeke not him and letteth them wast and consume by length of tyme, so as it is not perceyued that he regardeth them or hath any care of their neede, wherein he sheweth himselfe to be ryghteous, for he punisheth the negligēce or rather the pride that is in them, by cause they despised his grace which was offered them so freely.

True it is also, that sundry tymes God doeth not at the first help those that seeke him in truth: but that cometh not to passe continually. And when it happeneth yet is it iustly: wee must not bind him to our liking. So then although God do slowe to succour his seruants, euen when they call vpon him with all their hart: yet doeth he neuer forsake them. Howbeit the thing that Eliu treateth of here is very common, after the ordinary maner that the scripture speareth. For when it goeth about any doctrine, it is to shew the thing that may be seene most often. Ye see then what wee may conclude. When we haue considered what the world is, wee shall finde that such as are smitten and vexed, can wel ynough lament their miseries, but their crying is not vnto God. It is like a beastly howling: they call out their shrieks into the ayre, but they reache not out their harts vnto God: they cast not their cares and sorowes vpon him as he commaundeth vs: and that is the cause why he sheweth not himselfe fauorable vnto vs. Wee must not blame him of crueltie or vnrighteousnesse, neither must he imagine that he doeth men wrong: For wee see they are worthy of that punishment, and to receyue the wages of their vnbeleef, by cause they rested not vpon the promises that are giuen them, nor were moued in themselues to resort vnto God, as they ought to haue done. Now if it be sayd that men call vpon God, (as peradventure some prayers will be made) Eliu sheweth that all that is nothing. And why? For they say not, Wher is God that made mee? Which giueth songs in the night, which instructeth vs more than the beasts, and teacheth vs more than the foules of the ayre?

This (as I touched euen now) serueth too answere that it myght bee alledged, that wretched men do call vpon God when they are afflicted. Yea sayth Eliu, but it is but faynedly, and therefore it is in vayne. For inasmuch as the prayers which the most parte of the world maketh are but hypocrisie: therefore God heareth them not. Thus the reason that Eliu setteth downe, is that they go not vnto God, as to their maker that hath fashioned them, nor as to him that comforteth men, nor as to him that hath giuen them so many benefites as they ought to magnifie his mercy what miserie soeuer they endure. Then if we acknowledge not God to be such a one as he sheweth himselfe towards vs, nor esteeme the gracious gifts which we haue receyued at his hand: I saye if we come not to him thus mynded: there is nothing but feyning and falshood in vs, and therefore wee must not maruell though he shette the gate agaynst vs, and make no countenance to heare our requests. Behold a text right woorthy too bee marked. For yee shall see in these dayes that the Papistes make procesions whē God layeth his hand vpon them: If there bee any plague or famine or other aduersitie: true it is that they turne vnto God, and sodo the Paynims as well as they. But what? Do they call vpon him with a true and ryghtmeening hart? Alas they are far wyde of it: all that they do, is but ceremonies.

And for proof hereof, let vs marke well that men cannot seeke God ryghtly, except they knowe him to be such a one as they should feele him by experience. First of all when wee call vpon God, wee must remember that hee is our maker, and that wee are in his hand. But nowe let vs examin those which make countenance of praying. If a man serche their hart: shall hee finde that they haue skill to say, seing that my God hath fashioned mee I am in his hand, and it belongeth too him to rule mee in my lyfe, and to provide for all my necessities: I hold all of him, and therefore it behoueth mee to suffer myselfe to bee gouerned by his hand and according to his pleasure? Shall a mā finde one among a hundred that is thus minded, and that speaketh with a true hart, to yeeld honour to God, as too his maker? They will confesse it well ynough with their mouth: yea (say they) wee were made by him, and hee hath giuen vs life. But in the meane whyle for all their confessing, yet are they not fully resoluēd of it: it is cleane contrary with them.

So then there are no prayers that are woorthy too beare that name, when men are so brutishe as they acknowledge not God for such a one as he sheweth himselfe towards them. Howbeit the matter consisteth not only in acknowledging God to bee our maker: but wee must also therewithall esteeme the gracious gifts which he is ready to giue vs, according as it is sayd expressly in this text that he giueth songs in the nyght. Some men expound this saying after this sort: namely that the birdes doo cheare vs with their singing, and that the same ought too bee imputed too Gods goodnesse and that men shewe their vnthankfulnessse if not acknowledging it. Other some raise in that God doeth comfort vs, by making the starres to shyne, and thereby giueth vs occasiō to set forth his goodnesse. For although the Sun

be downe, and darknesse ouerspreade vs: yet doeth God lighten vs by them, as by candels, as who should saye, that his maiestie is not quenched, nor altogether hidde from vs. But such expositions are to much streyned. I herfore we must take it simply, that God giueth songs euen in the tyme when men are asleepe. For the night seemeth as it were to make all things dead. VVhē the sunne is down, and all things are whist and still: there seemeth to bee as it were shet vp in a graue. If Eliu had spoken of songs in the day tyme, it had not bene so greate a magnifying of Gods grace: For a day tymes, men followe their worke, thē doth their che. efuinesse shew it self, thē are their wits awake. Therefore it had not bene so excellent a thing too haue sayd that God giueth songs in the day tyme, as whē he assigneth them to the night. But this is a singular goodnesse of God, that when as wee be after a fort dead, and our spirits are as it were oppressed, and there is no liue. inesse in vs: yet notwithstanding, our Lord doeth stil giue vs songs. For when mē wake in the night, they haue wherof to reioyce, in feeling that God hath them in his protection. They ought to consider that they cannot continue without sleepe, and that in the meane whyle God watcheth for them. Tl efore they ought to reioyce in that behalf, and to say, Alas Lord, I cannot call vpon thee so long as I am asleepe: behold I am heere as a blocke or timberlog, and yet thou keepst mee, and in the meane whyle I breathe through thy goodnesse: yea and this sleeping doeth so feede and refresh mee, as I gather new strength without feeling it. Now when mē think vpō these things, haue they not cause to bee glad and to say, Alas my God, thou shewest thyself a father towards mee, euen whyle I seeke thee not, yea and when I haue not any sense, but am like a dead creature? Then seeing it is so, is it not much more likely that thou wilt be neerer mee when I commit myself vnto thee, and call vpon thee? Howsoeuer the case stand, whither I sleepe or whither I wake, I shall alwayes bee in thy hand and safekeeping. VVhen men haue such thoughts in them, is it not a singing vnto God? So then we see wherat Eliu ameth: namely that oftentimes they which are afflicted haue no truthe in them when they pretend to pray vnto God. And why? For it would become vs to gather together Gods benefits, and to call too mind the good that he hath done vs with. out end or ceasing, to the intent that the same might cheere vs vp. But we be so slouthful as it is pitie to see it, yea and we fall to disputing how wee may go vnto God, what meane there is to come at him, and whither he regard vs or not. Yee see then that the thing which we had to do, is too cheere vp our minds with the greate number of benefits that he hath bestowed vpō vs, and which he ceaseth not to deale vnto vs still from day to day. For first of all, that serueth to confirme vs in such wise, as wee must not doubt too come vnto him vpon trust that he will heare vs: and also it will make vs to come to him with thanksgiuing, wheras they that haue not tasted his goodnesse, and the benefits which they haue receyued at his hand, do grudge and repine agaynst him. Therefore when wee haue well weyed the thing that is told vs heere, no doubt but we shall bee throughly inflamed to seeke him and to say, Behold my God, thou giuest mee so manie good things, as are ynough to rauish mee when I thinke vpon them. And therefore, seeing thou hast shewed thyself so Lountifull too wards mee: ought I not to bee patient and too blisse thy name, if thou afflict mee? But men doo no such thing at all: they forget Gods benefits, and thrust them vnder foote: and therefore they call not vpon him truely and earnestly. The thing then which wee haue to marke v-

pon this streyne where Eliu speaketh of night songs, is that God neuer ceaseth to do vs good, in so much that in the time which seemeth moste dead, and when a man would say that euen God himself were hidden, so as he seemeth not to be mynded too continue his fauour any more towards vs: he ceaseth not to giue vs occasion still to magnifie his goodnesse. Seeing it is so, we ought to be touched with another maner of desirousnesse to come vnto him, than we be. After this, Eliu addeth the vniuersall benefit which God hath bestowed vpon al men. True it is that euery man ought in his owne behalf too mynd the benefits of God: according as there is neuer a one of vs which is not exceedingly bound vnto God for the greate benefits which he hath done vnto him. If I desire to know that God is good and liberal, I neede not looke what he hath done to all men indifferently, but onely to enter into myself, and to consider the whole courtse of my lyfe, and too marke the benefites which I haue felt at the hand of God. So shall I be as it were rauished about the world too saye, Lord if I should go about too cōprehend thy goodnesse, it is so deepe a gulf as I am neuer able to bring it too passe. For when I take but a little portion of the tokens and records which thou hast giuen mee of it: behold I am at my wits end, and how then should I bring it about? Lo how it behoueth euery man in his owne behalf too marke the priuate benefites which he hath receiued of God. Yet notwithstanding if wee thinke but only vpon the things that are common and general amongs all mankind: the same ought to bee ynough too cause vs too magnifie God, yea euen in such wise that when wee come too pray him too deliuer vs from our afflictions, wee ought therewith too reioyce and too yeeld him prayse for shewing himself so good a father towards vs. But what? wee do it not. And therein wee shewe our owne vnthankfull and maliciouse mynde: and if wee perceyue it not, it is apparant that there is nothing but hypocrisie in vs.

This in effect is the thing that Eliu ment too say here. And his words are, it is God that teacheth vs more than the beastes, and which giueth vs more vnderstanding than too the foules of the ayre. Here hee maketh a comparison betweene men and beastes. For if heauen and earth could speake, it is certaine that they should needes prayse God though they haue no vnderstanding, nor are auanced too that dignitie which wee are. And why? It is a greate honour that God hath done them, in that they are the work of his hands, & in that they are his creatures. Now if God haue inhonored heauen and earthe, and all the senselesse creatures, in that he hath voutsafed too create them: and if he haue inhonored the beastes, though he haue made them voyde of reason: what hath he done too man, too whom he hath giuen such vnderstanding? That is the cause why Eliu doeth here compare vs with the beastes. For wherof was it long that God made not vs asses or horses? For the noblest and excellentest man vpon the earth cannot saye, I made myselfe, or it was my will too bee made such a one. For God could well haue made him a dog, or a swyne when he made him a man. Then must wee not seeke the ground in our selues why God made vs reasonable creatures, but wee must commend his goodnesse too wards vs, specially seeing he hath so greatly honoured vs, as not onely too make vs of the number of his creatures, but also too aduance vs aboue the brute beastes, by giuing vs witte and reason which hee hath not doone too any other earthly creatures.

And this is the thing which is told vs in the first chapter of Sanct Iohn: namely that a. things haue their lyfe Iob. i. c. 3. 4.

of God, and that the same life hath euer more ben inclofed in his eternall worde. Howbeit, there is one life which is in lighte, and that life serueth for men. Whereas it is sayde, that the life of men was in it, that is to saye, in the lighte: S. Iohn sheweth that wee haue not a brutish mouing to eate and drinke: but that we haue discretion, So as God hath giuen vs vnderstanding to knowe good and euill: to attaine euen to the euerlasting life, and to perceiue that there is one onely God, whome wee ought to honour as our father. Forasmuch then as God doth so enlighten men: wee see our selues bounde in a farre greater and straighter bonde, than if hee had but simply made vs his creatures. For if there were no more but that God hath created vs with his hande, yet behoued it vs to giue him thanks for it. But seeing it hath pleased him to make a difference betwene vs and the brute beastes, and to giue vs so noble and excellent a life as wee see: may we not well say, Lord what were we? And yet notwithstanding it hath pleased thee to sette vs heere in the number of thy children, and to giue vs thy marke. And whence cometh this vnto vs? Can we finde any thing in our selues to say that we haue moued thee here vnto, or that thou wert led vnto it by our worthynesse? No, but all proceedeth of thyne owne free goodnesse. Nowe then we see what is conteyned in thi. text: namely that we haue cause inough to prayse God, though there were no other thing than the generall benefit which extendeth to all mankynde: which is, that he hath giuen vs witte and reason to bee aboute the brute beastes. Neuerthelesse: it is true that the reason which God gaue to the first man, is very sore corrupted as now. For as wee bee in our own nature, we are so peruered, as we cannot iudge any thing of God: wee bee blinde wretches, there is nothing but vanitie in vs, and moreouer our iustes doe so carye vs away, as there is no staye nor modestie in vs. In somuche (that whiche worse is) if we be compared with brute beastes, there will bee founde more soundnesse in a horse or an oxe, than in a man. For a horse hauing no reason, dothe notwithstanding retaine that whiche was giuen him: but as for man, he is so sorted, as the reason which hee had is turned into maliciousnesse, and in stead of honoring God for the benetites which he hath receiued, he is become proude and vterly rebellious againste him. And furthermore wee see that all the reason which wee thinke our selues too haue, is but vter beaftynesse. For when wee come to thinke vpon God, do we not see howe men are intangled in their superstitions? What can men conceiue of God but vter vanitie, as the scripture sheweth? Then if men bee so dazeled when they thinke vpon God, and forge such a heape of superstitions when they would serue him: where is the reason and vnderstanding which Eliu magnifierh here somuch? True it is (as I haue sayd) that all the light which we haue of nature, is turned into darknesse, by reason of the sinne and corruptions which we haue drawne from our father Adam. Howbeit looke what is euill and sinfull, that must wee impute to our owne fault, according also as it is not of the nature whiche wee haue receiued of Eue [by our first creation] whereas wee be so enclined to confusion if we trust our own witte: we cannot say that that cometh of our first creation: I say wee must not impute it vnto God: For God created vs after his own Image, and that Image was marred by the sinne of Adam. And so it behoueth men to acknowledge their owne faulte, and to yelde themselues gilty before God, for this disfiguring of our selues, and for turning his lighte into darknesse. But by the waye heere is yet one other point to marke: which is, that in the midst of our ignorance and of all our errour and superstitions, our Lord doeth hold vs still conuicted and bound vnto him in an inestimable bonde, for that he aduanceth vs aboute the brute beastes, by leauing vs some discretion imprinted in our hartes too discerne good and euill. And this is it which Saint Iohn meeneth by adding in the forealledged text, that the light shineth in darknesse: as if hee should say, although sinne haue so peruered mennes vnderstanding and as it were vly defaced their nature: yet notwithstanding God dooth still inlighten them in such wise, as a man may perceyue some print of the first creation. Although then we haue not the thing that was giuen at the beginning to our father Adam, nor scarcely holde any litle portion of it: yet ought we well to perceyue that God hath giuen vs an inestimable benefite, in that it hath pleased him too make vs men, & to separate vs after that sort from brute beastes.

See heere, howe that from the greatest to the least, no man can haue occasion to murmure agaynst God. For we must alwayes come to this poynt, to enquire what are we? What haue wee giuen vnto God? What can we alledge vnto him why he should be bounde vnto vs? Nothing: but contrarywise it behoueth vs to yelde vnto him, that forasmuch as hee created vs after his owne Image, and made vs men, therein wee are exceedingly bounde vnto him. And therewithall let vs marke, that as now if God put a difference betwene man and man, we haue no cause to grudge againste him, as we see these fantasticall persons do, who if a man speake to them of gods election, & tell them that he choseth vnto saluation whō he thinketh good: they kick and winch agaynst it saying, how so? Were it any reason that God should haue his creatures so? Were that indifferent dealing? Yea? As who should say that God were tied to men, and had no authoritie at all ouer them. Seing it was in Gods choyce and power to make vs brute beastes, & yet he hath printed his Image in vs, and giuen vs a far higher dignitie than to th<sup>e</sup> why should we grudge as now agaynst him, if he put a difference betwene man and man, and do it by his owne secrete ordinance, without making vs knowe any other cause than his shewing of his goodnesse? For seing that he hath not made a man a beast, whereas he might haue done it: if he do loue him in his owne nature, haue we cause to grudge againste him? No: we see then that such as rayle at Gods election are out of their wits, specially seeing it behoueth them to return to this matter which is shewed vs here: namely that it was knowne, euen vnto the very paynims: for it appeareth that eue among the Paynims some haue vsed this maner of praying God. Therefore such phantasticall heades must be set to schole to the Infidels: (or they are not worthie too haue their maliciousnesse (which is matched with such pride againste god) reprobued by the holy scripture. And further, if the consideration of the benefites which God hath bestowed generally vpon all mankynde, ought to prouoke vs to magnifie him: haue we not so much the greater occasion to do it: and to call vpon him with thanksgiuing for the benefites which we haue receiued of him, in that he hath giue vs much more: that is to say, in that he hath reformed his Image in vs, offered vs his word, & shewed himselfe more familiarly vnto vs? therefore here we must proceed by degrees. First we must vnderstand, that seing god hath inhonored vs by making vs his creatures, we are alredie bound vnto him though there were none other cause. But whē he hath preferred vs before the brute beastes, yea euen of his owne meer goodnes without finding any cause why in vs: that is yet another thing wherein hee hath shewed himselfe more louing. And when wee come too seeke him, suche knowledge must make the way for vs, and open vs the gate.

Beholde

Behold I come to my God, and in what maner do I seeke him? Not only as him that hath created mee, but also as him that hath vttered a fatherly loue towards mee: For I am created after his own image and likeness. What is the cause that he hath aduanced mee about the brute beasts? Is not this then a sufficient matter and occasion of boldnesse too come vnto him? And furthermore if I bee scourged by his hand, is not the forsayd reason ynough to assuage our miseries, howe greuouse soeuer they seeme to be. That is to wit, that seing wee haue receyued benefits at Gods hand ought wee not to suffer our selues to be chasticed by him, if he list to vse roughnesse towards vs? Thus it is sugar, (as I may terme it) to seazon our sorowes withall, when wee call Gods benefits to remembraunce, in the tyme of our affliction, by acknowledging and saying: Very well, I am a mortall creature, and God hath put a difference betweene mee, and the brute beastes. Howbeit moreover I haue bene baptized in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ: and that is a second marke which hee hath set vpon mee, to shewe mee that he is mynded to kepe me in his stocke: howbeit as much as in mee is, I haue defaced my baptisme, I haue bene a faythlesse wretche: and yet behold, my God hath drawne mee backe againe to himselfe, he hath inlyghtned mee in the middes of the thick darknesse wherein I was: Verely I was plunged to the bottome of hell, and my God hath reached mee his hand, and Iesus Christ the day sunne of ryghteousnesse doeth so inlyghten mee, that in beholding his face in the doctryne of the gossell, I see the gate of paradysse opened vnto mee. Seing then that our Lord cheareth vs in such wise, haue wee not good cause to magnifie him, and to humble our selues before him? But now let vs see how many there are to bee found that do so. True it is (as I haue declared already) that such as are ouerpressed with miseries and calamities will crye vnto God. But after what sort? Haue they thoroughly considered aforehand how much they are bound vnto him? haue they made their waye, by acknowledging the benefits that they haue receyued? No: But cleane contrary. So then forasmuch as men acknowledge not God as their maker, nor call to mynd the benefits which they haue receyued of him without ceasing, and specially seing they acknowledge not that he hath created them after his owne image: wee must no more thinke it straunge though God suffer vs, to pyne and wither away in our miseries, and we perceyue no helpe at his hand: For we are not worthie of it. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this text.

But now what must wee do on the contrary parte? Forasmuch as the holy ghost doeth here by the mouthe of Eliu reprove men for their frowardnesse, and tel them that if God do not comfort them nor deliuer them from their aduersities, it is because they seeke him not in truth: let vs be we well aduised to make Gods former benefits

our sheelde to set against the aduersities that oppresse vs, saying: True it is that this affliction is so bitter, that if thou looke no further, it were ynough to rumble thee into dispaire: But hath not thy God shewed himselfe a father towards thee? and that, so many wayes as thou must needs feele his fauour and goodnesse. Then behoueth it thee to shet vp all thy senses in it, and not to suffer the affections to debate overmuch. Behold (I say) wherunto it behoueth vs to come. And furthermore when wee haue wel bethought vs of Gods gratiouse gifts, let them serue vs to double vse. The first must be to certifie vs that wee shall not bee disapointed in our praying. For seing that God hath already shewed himselfe beneficiall towards mee before I was borne, and continued the same all the time of my life, and that his goodnesse is an infinite thing: Should I doubte that he will not heare mee when I come to call vpon him? ye see then how we ought to take Gods benefits to perswade ourselues that we lose not our time in seeking vnto him. Again, the other point is, that we must arme our selues with patience. Therefore when we think so vpon Gods benefits: let the same serue to comfote vs, in the time of our trouble, and let vs not be so malicious as to grudge against him, but rather let vs thinke thus. Seing my God hath created me, is it not reason that he should haue all right ouer mee, and that he should gouerne mee at his pleasure? Then if wee come to refer ourselues after this sort vnto Gods goodnesse, we shall not cease to submit ourselues vnto him for any affliction that he laith vpon vs. And why? For we haue receyued benefits at his hand, and therefore wee must not nowe presume too plucke our heads out of his yoke. Thus ye see the two things wherunto it behoueth vs to apply the knowledge of Gods benefits, if we wil call vpon him in truth.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue done: and therewithall to open our eyes, that we may not be so dul-headed as to forget or despyze his benefits. but maye magnifie them according to their worthinesse, and think vpon them in such wise, as we may be prouoked by them to serue and honour him, and to walke aduisedly according to his good wil, and take such example of the chasticements that he sendeth too our neyghbours, as the same may serue vs for corrections, and that if it shal please him to chastice vs in our owne persons, and to make vs feele the strokes of his hand as wee had neede: he will turne all to the furtherance of our saluation, so that in passing through all the troubles of this world, he may strengthen vs continually with his power, vntill hee receyue vs into the euerlasting rest, which he hath prepared for vs in his kingdome. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignotant soules &c.

The cxxxvij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xxxv. Chapter.

12. There they shall crye, and God wil not heare them, because of the pryde of the vicked.
13. Surely it is but vanitie: God heareth it not, nother doth the Almighty regard it.
14. Thou hast said he seeth thee not, there is iudgement before him: vwayt for it.
15. But now his visiting is not in anger (or it is nothing to his visiting in his wrath) nother punisheth he greatly in anger.
15. But Iob hath opened his mouth in vaine, and multiplied vwords without vnderstanding.

Orasmuchas the first sentence which wee haue nowe reherfed, ought to be ioyned to the matter that I hadled yesterday, it behoueth vs to beare in mynd what hath bin declared: which is, that when God heareth not these that are in trouble, he sheweth that the blame of it must be wited vpon themselves, by cause they come not to him with a ryght and pure hart. according as Eliu hath declared that when we come to seke God, we must consider the benefits & gracious gifts that we haue receyued at his hand: for else we cannot trust in him. What is the foundation of our faith? the free promises that God hath giuen vs. But yet the experience that we haue of his goodnesse, is a confirmation of the thing that we knowe by his word. And so, they that haue not conceiued the tast of his benefits, cannot come vnto him but with hypocrisie. Moreouer when we knowe not how much we are bound vnto God, it is impossible that we should bee patient to obey him, and continue quiet without murmuring agaynst his will. Therefore Eliu addeth now, that there they shall crye: as if hee should saye, very wel, it is true that men shall crye vnto God when they bee troubled: but in what plight are they? Come they before him so minded as they ought to be? No, nothing lesse. For they think not at all of the benefits which they haue receiued at his hand, nether do they profit themselves by them, to settle their trust vpon him. So then men shall crye out for anguise, but they shall not come at God, there is no opennesse in their hart: and therefore if God heare them not, wee must blame their owne sinnes for it, and not saye that God hath forgotten the world, and doeth not his dewty, or that he is as it were asleepe. Therefore when men seke God in truth, he is neere them, and his hand will soone shewe it self to succour them. But so long as they howle like wilde beasts, & loke not ryght forth to the marke which they ought to ame at: their crying shall be to no purpose: let vs marke well that at this day God will not heare vs (at leastwise to make vs feele his helpe) though wee storne neuer so much in crying if we stand not vpon a sure ground. And the cheef point is, to knowe him for such an one as hee sheweth himself: namely a father and sauour, and to rest vpon his goodnesse euen by calling to remembraunce the records which we haue erst felt therof, to the end the same may giue vs courage to seeke him as wee ought to do. And then no doubt but vs shall soone find him, yea we shall not neede to, make long windlasses: For he will come before vs. And so we see that prayer consisteth not in ceremonies, but in the rightnesse of the hart afore God: yea and not only the feeling of our miseries must make vs to desire remedy of them, but also wee must through faythe desire him to shewe himself our father and sauour: And that faith being grounded vpon his promises, must also bee confirmed with all the good tokens that he giueth vs. And when we shall haue found by experience how good and mercifull he is: we must be able to apply the same to our owne instruction, that wee may be rightly fenced. And furthermore, in requiring God to be mercifull vnto vs, we must bring him the sacrifice of prayse for the benefits wherwith he hath bound vs vnto him already. Nowe after that Eliu hath sayd so, he addeth, that such as toke not hold of Gods prouidence, sayed, tush all this is but vanitye, God heareth not, nether doeth hee Almighty regard. This obiection is made in the person of the vnbeleuers: For although it be told them that God doeth iustly leaue men weltring in their owne wretchednesse, by cause they come not too him with faith and obedience: yet notwithstanding they cannot conceyue the reason, but imagin foolishly that God heareth not, & that he seemeth to let the world go at hauck, and that things are ruled here bynearth by fortune. Ye see then that the faythlesse do with a brutillie and suddayne conceyte, catche hold of the thing that is shewed to their eyes, without further discerning: as though wee were loth to consider any further reason, than that which cometh next to hand, and would say, O, I see that yonder man hath doone such a thing. Yea, but thou must seeke further, & vnderstand the reason of it. No marie, I wil not be inquisitiue. Is not this a wilful bereeuing of our selues of wit and reason? Is it not a shetting of our eyes agaynst the light? Euen as much do the vnbeleuers. They see that God heareth not those that crye: & thervpon they fall to storming, yea & to accusing of god. And therefore no maruel though god make not his succour & fauour to be felt of such as do nothing but chafe in their aduersities, & yield him not any obediēce, ne seeke vnto him with such mind as they ought to do. So the, God hath iust cause to let me perish after that maner: And why? Because he calleth the to him, & they come not to him the way that they ought to do. If a mā tel the faithlesse these things: they shet their eyes and think not vpon the. Is it not as much the as if they said there were no prouidence of God at all, and that he had no regard of vs? Is it not an vtter burying of it? And yet neuerthelesse, that is the thing wherto our fleshly reason caryeth vs, if we be not restreyned with the bridle of loweliness and modestie, to deeme of Gods woorks and iudgements according as his woord sheweth vs. This then is reherfed now by Eliu in the person of the vnbeleuers, and it is not for nought that the holy ghost hath set downe such a blasphemy. For it is to the end that euery of vs should bethink himself. VVe haue the seede of such frowardnesse in our nature, that we be (at euery brayde) caried away with this rage of chafing agaynst God, to conclude that he doth not his dewtie. Forasmuch then as our stomack is full of much pride, and we passe our boundes so farre as to ouerthrowe all reason: this is set afore vs, to teache vs to hūble ourselues, when wee come to iudge of Gods doings and ordinaunses. VVherfore let vs not giue bridle to our nature, but heare God speake, and way well the reasons that he bringeth. And aboue all things let vs marke wel what Eliu ioyneth with it here: For after the making of the said obiection, he addeth: alibough thou sayest, God seelb not: there is iudgement before him, loske thou for it. Here Eliu remedieth the sayd frowardnesse which hath bene discovered, to the end we should bethink vs of the euill that is in vs, and giue it ouer. True it is that these words are as it were crafed by reason of their shortnesse. And by cause it is set down thus, Behold thou sayest, or else albeit that thou say, be shall not see it. This saying may be taken also in the person of Job: as though Eliu vpbayed him to haue thought thus: Thou shalt not see God, nether shalt thou knowe what he is. But when all is wel considered, the sentence must be knit together, and therewithall it must also be distinguished thus: Although thou say then, be shall not see it. Hereby Eliu signifieth that men aduaunce themselves too much, and that they ought too consider their rudenesse and small capacitie. For it is not in them too see God, that is too say, too serche him to the bottom. True it is that we must alwayes looke vnto God, howbeit we must first beseeche him to giue vs eyes: And furthermore also wee must beholde him in the glasse that he offereth vs, that is too saye, in his worde and in his woorkes, and wee must walke in such sobrietie, as wee must not bee desirouic too seeke more than is lawefull or than hee giueth

vs leaue to do. There is then one maner of seeing God which is good and holy : which is to behold him so farre forth as it pleaseth him to shew himselfe vnto vs, and to distrust oure owne vnderstanding, so as wee desire to bee inlightned by his holy spirit, and not ouercurious and presumptuous to know more than he permitteth. But if we wil looke God in the face, and not suffer any thing to be hidde from vs, but will enter intoo his incomprehensible determinations, euen too the verie bottome of these depthes : it is an intollerable pride, and men do vtterly confounde themselues by it. Then let vs learne what meane we must holde too see God. VVe must not go to it with ouermuch hast, but we must be sober, knowing the small measure of our vnderstanding, and the infinite highnesse of Gods Maiestie. Furthermore, seeing he hath declared himselfe vnto vs, so farre foorth as hee knoweth it meete and conuenient for our welfare : let vs holde vs content with the knowledge that he hath giuen vs, and not fall to raunging here and there. Marke then howe Eliu sayth now vnto Iob, although thou say, I shall not see it : as if hee had sayde, thou art ouerhastie too speake, and thou thrustest thy selfe further in than thou shouldst. For consider what thou art, and consider what God is, and cast downe thine eyes, and forget the pride that is in thee. And afterwarde he addeth, there is iudgement before his face: or iudge thou : For the saying maye bee sette downe twoo wayes. If wee take, iudge thou : It is an exhortation too humilitie and repentance, as if Eliu shoulde say, wretched man I see thou listest vp thy selfe agaynst God, and what maketh thee too doo so, but bycause thou iudgest not thy selfe? Therefore enter intoo thy selfe, and looke vpon thine owne wretchednesse, and then will all thy pryde be plucked downe. Thus ye see the remedie that is giuen vs heere by the holy ghost, to reprove vs when we runne astray, and haue through our vnbeleefe conceyued anie wicked and hastie imaginations agaynst God. For if wee will bee brought into the right way, wee muste go downe into our owne selues, and examine our owne ignorance and sinfulness, and then shall wee bee ashamed, and forget the wandring conceytes wherewith we were caryed to and fro. Lo what sense and doctrine we ought to gather of this saying, if wee take it too bee set downe, iudge thou. But the very true meening of this Text is, that there is iudgement before God. And therefore Eliu concludeth, that men shoulde looke for it. Heere is a counterviewe betweene the face of God, and our sight : as if Eliu shoulde say, that God ceaseth not too bee righteous although it appeare not vnto vs. Then if we wil knowe that God gouerneth the worlde, and ordereth all things vprightly : wee must not measure him by the things that wee perceyue. And why? For Gods iudgement is too high for vs, & we cannot reach vnto it at the first brayde.

Therefore let vs marke well that God seeth what is good and rightfull, whereas wee are molte commonly blind : what is to bee done then? Nothing else, but euen tatie, according as the faythfull man must bee fedde with hope that he may yeeld himselfe pleasurable and obedient vnto God : and we knowe that it behoueth vs too hope when things are not visible to vs. Nowe haue wee the naturall sense of this text : It remaineth that wee apply the same too our owne instruction. Although thou saye iob shalt not see it. This sheweth vs, that wee muste not haue oure tongue at libertie to shoote foorth whatsoever we thinke concerning God. But wee must brydle our tongues, and holde our thoughtes as prisoners, assuring our selues that God intendeth to keepe vs in humilitie by concealing the reason of all his woorkes from vs.

Therefore let those that will not bee condemned by the spirite of God, take heede that they rushe not oute too farre. Marke that for one poynt. And why? It ought to be well considered, that we be not able to see God: howbeit (as I haue sayde alreadie) true it is that God graunteth vs the grace and priuiledge to shewe himselfe vnto vs, howbeit that is but so farre forth as he knoweth too bee expedient for vs. God being inuisible of himselfe sheweth himselfe in a glasse so farre as is conuenient for vs, that is to wit in his worde, and in his workes, but yett must we not be too inquisite of him. And this is also the cause why he sendeth vs alwayes to the meane, which he hath hidde, to allure vs to knowe of him. For he knoweth our ouerboldenesse, and also the sicklenesse of our witte, and that wee bee so vnconstant as it is pitie to see. Truly they are twoo great vices, when men are so ouerhardie, and also haue so disordered lustes. On the other side, there is ignorance or rather beastlinesse, and moreouer also frowardnesse. And therefore wee haue neede to be restrayned by the meane that God hath giuen vs, which is, to be contented with the things that are conteyned in the holy Scripture: assuring our selues that we shall be no more in danger of straying, if we follow that way without stepping out of it, and consider Gods workes, not to iudge of them after our owne fancie and liking, but only by hearing what he telleth vs by his word, and by suffering our selues to be taught at his mouth, so as wee desire to haue none other cunning but that. And furthermore, forasmuch as it is sayde, that our Lorde Iesus Chriit is the liuely image wherein to beholde whatsoever is good and conuenient for vs to knowe : let vs rest there, according also as it is sayde in another place, that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are layde vp in him. Then let vs marke well that wee bee blinde wretches, and that if wee will inquire of God by our owne wit, he shall bee hidden from vs, and we shall neuer come neere him, and much lesse bee able to come at him. And therefore we must learne to condemne our selues vtterly, confessing that there is nothing in vs, but meere brutishnesse. Haue wee once acknowledged that? Let vs pray God to inlighten vs by his holy spirite, that wee may not bee full of presumptuousnesse and pryde, to say, I am able to seeke them of my selfe. Let vs keepe our selues from suche diuelish presumption, and let vs humble our selues before God, praying him to inlighten vs. And heerewithall also, seeing he hath ordeyned bys worde to be the meane to shew himselfe vnto vs: let vs be as it were tied to it, and not attempt to passe beyonde it. Thus much concerning the first poynt that is shewed vs here. Nowe let vs come to this which is sayde, that there is a iudgement before his face, and that we must wait for it. I haue touched alreadie, that we must not esteeme Gods iudgements by our eyesight, for that is too short: and it is so dimme as is pitifull. VVhat then? Let vs vnderstande that God dwelling in vnapprochable light (as the Scripture sayth) reserueth to himselfe the knowledge of the things which are too profounde for vs. Therefore let vs conclude, that God is righteous although wee see it not, and that whensoever wee finde his dooinges straunge, and are offended at them we must thinke thus: wretched creature, thou hast eyes in deed, but they are too dimme, yea they are starke blinde. and although thy God inlighten thee, yea eue with some good portion, yett will he stil restraine thee, to the end thou maist doo in the honor to confesse that he is righteous. Seeing the that thy wit and vnderstanding are so weake: what a thing were it if thou wouldst cōprehend the infinit wisdom of God? Therefore refer the things vnto thy god which passe thine vnderstanding: for thou seest not the reason in that behalf, vntill thou beare wel in mind, & fully beleue this lesson in thy hart, that there is iudgement before the face of God Mark I say how it behoueth vs to correct the ouerboldeesse that is in vs, to the end we may cōfesse that although we might seme to haue cause to enter into disputation against god: yet notwithstanding he seeth the things that are hid from vs. And this is the comparison of the contrarie things that I spake of euen now. Then whereas it is sayde that there is iudgement in Gods sight: it is also declared vnto vs, that it is not in our sight: as if Eliu should say, God seeth, and not man: God knoweth, and man is ignorant. VVil we the referue vnto God his due honor? VVe must rid our selues of the vaine presumption wherein we are puffed vp by nature: for we would be to wise: and we are alwayes tickled with this diuelish lust of desirousnesse to inquire of the things that belong not vnto vs. Therefore let vs be contented to glorifie God, yielding vnto him that which is his owne: namely a wisdom that surmounteth all our vnderstanding and capacitie. But it is impossible that this should be done, without hope: for that is the stay that holdeth vs in the obeying of our God, and the thing that nourisheth vs in modestie and lowlinesse: and oute of doubt if we hoped not that things should go better, & that God would giue the such an end as we cannot now perceyue: it is certain that our minds should neuer be quiet. The let vs mark, that if we will giue god the glory which belongeth vnto him, by confessing him to be righteous: it behoueth vs to be hopeful. And although things go amis, so as al is in a broyle, and it seemeth that heauen & earth should be confounded together: yet must we rest vpon the promises that he hath giue vs, which are, that forasmuch as he turneth the darknesse into light (as he hath shewed in the creation of the world) and knoweth how to draw good out of euil: he will dispose the things that seemed to be vtterly out of order, as it shal be perceiued in the end that he hath a wonderfull wisdom. Neuerthelesse, that is not at the first brunt. Therefore here is a good doctrine & warning: namely that we must not iudge of things at the first sight: (for that were too halie & rash a iudgement) but hope must go before vs, and be as a lampe to shew vs the way. And what is the oyle of this lamp. That is to say, how are we inlightned by it. By sticking to Gods promises. For if we waite patiently till God worke according as he hath spoken with his mouth, and vntill his hand vtter it selfe in conuenient time: then shal we learne to be modest, and to glorifie him by confessing him to be righteous in al his doings: notwithstanding that we be troubled here, and seme to be in the middes of many guises. And this is the true studie of Christians. Furthermore, marke here how we be nowadays so easily caried, or rather vtterly driuen out of the way, bicause we haue no settlednesse, but are tossed with vnquietnesse, yea eue with bowling vnquietnesse, so as we would haue God to make hast according to our fancie. If he do not things as wee imagined in our minde: it seemeth to vs that all things are forlorne and past recouerie, bicause we vnderstande them not. For so long as we thinke but vpon our selues it causeth vs to be out of patience, and there is no obedience at all to be found in vs: and therefore so muche the more doth it stand vs in hand to put this doctrine in vre. So then when we see all things in hurlyburly, so as God seemeth to haue shut his eyes, and to haue turned his back vpon vs: let vs vnderstand that it is bicause of our sinne. Yet neuerthelesse, let the same confirme our sayth, and let vs be quiet, assuring our selues that it is Gods office too inioyne vs silence vntill conuenient time bee come, yea and vntill he knowe it to be conuenient. For it is not for vs to binde him to the stake, and to say, this thing must be done after this maner, and that thing after that. But we must learne to repose our selues in god, and then shall all pride be beaten downe, so as wee shall thinke all Gods doings too bee good, rightfull, and iust, although they seme straunge to vs at the first sight. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in this text. Now Eliu addeth, that Gods present visiting or punishing is not in his anger: and that he knoweth not in multitude greatly. Truly this text is somewhat hard, but the plaine meening of it in effect is this. That although God do now shew himselfe rough and sharpe: yet notwithstanding if we knew how dreadful and terrible his wrath is, we would say it is none of the things which we see in this worlde. And why? For he will not examine things to the vttermost. Hee searcheth not things to deepe: he doth but onely passe ouer them, and as it were with a glaunce (as men terme it) Hereby Eliu ment to shew, that when we be afflicted to the vttermost, so as God seemeth to thunder in such wise vpon vs, as if he would ouerwhelme vs: it behoueth vs to consider what his wrath is, and that if he would vtter it too the ful, it were able to destroy, not only some one mā, but also a hundred thousande worldes, yea and to consume them vtterly, and to bring them to nothing. Ye see then wherunto we be brought by the holy ghost. Furthermore it is a verie profitable admonishment, to assuage the afflictions that God sendeth vs. For what causeth vs too thinke that we be tormented out of measure? It is bicause that to our seeming God could not do worse: and we can not offend God more on our part, than whē we conceiue such an opinion of it. So then according to that which I haue shewed, let vs learne to cōsider what Gods wrath is, that is to say, how dreadfull it is. And although he shewe himselfe very rough towards vs: yet notwithstanding let vs assure our selues it is not the hundred part of that which we should feele, if he would execute such rigor vpon vs as we haue deserued. Seing the that we may know that gods wrath is such as is able in one minute of an houre to destroy a hundred thousand worldes, & that neither men in earth, nor Angels in heauē should be able to abide it, but heauen and earth, & all that else is besides, should be melted away like snow, yea & be brought vtterly to nothing: we ought to humble our selues, notwithstanding that god deale sharpe with vs, and send vs very rough punishmētts. Much more the ought we stil to be pacient, seing that god spareth vs, & bereth with vs. And in good sooth haue we not cause to giue him thanks, seing he vttereth not his wrath against vs as we are worthie? Is it not a sufficient matter to giue vs hart, & to cheere vs vp throughly in the mids of our afflictions, whē we consider [and can say in our selues] true it is that I am as good as ouerwhelmed, & it seemeth to be Gods will that I shall vtterly perishe, but yet is his rigor nothing so great vpon me, as I might feele it, if he had not respect of my feeblenesse? Forasmuch the as my God beareth with me, I will trust in him, and not cease to seeke him: for he giueth me still some signe that I may haue entrance to come vnto him. Behold I say, how we haue cause rather to blisse God in our afflictions whē we knowe that he beareth with vs. And there withall also we be taught to trust in him, seing that he openeth vs the gate to the ende we might still aske him forgiuenesse of our sinnes, and beseeche him too haue mercie vpon vs. And therefore let vs wey well these wordes of Eliu when he sayth, that Gods present punishing is nothing in respect of his wrath: wherfore wee must not say, what? The miserie is great, and I can indure no more. It is certaine, that if a man haue an eye to Gods wrath, and compare it with all that can bee indured in this worlde: hee shall finde that in verie deede all that can bee layde vpon vs heere, is nothing to it. Now seeing that all is nothing, and that God searcheth vs not with extremitie, but passeth ouer vs lightly, and as you would say glaucingly, so as he maketh a countenance to trie vs, but examineth vs not straightly, bicause wee bee not able too beare it: let vs learne to restreine our murmurings, and if our fleshe prouoke vs to impacience (as we be ouermuch giuen vnto it) let this remedie serue to correct that vice. How nowe wretched creature, what intendest thou too doo? VVilt thou spight thy God? Thou seest that he beareth still with thee, thou hast prouoked his wrath so sore, as thou mightest well deserue to be rooted out of the world a hundred tymes: thou art worthie to be drowned in the deepe of hell, and yet thou seest that he maketh his Sun to shine vpon thee: hee nourisheth thee with his bread, and mainteyneth thee in this present life, at his owne charges: Thou art not worthie to bee in the number of the works which he hath created, and yet he giueth thee respit till to returne vnto him. VVhen we thinke vpon these things, we haue wherewith to comfort our selues, that we might not be too much cumbred with impacience. Thus in effect ye see the doctrine that wee haue to gather in this text. And heere withall let vs marke, that although our Lord do not now visite vs in his wrath, nor examine things to the vttermost: we must not therupon fall asleepe: for the great day wil come, wherein nothing shall be forgotten. As now God winketh at things and punisheth not the wicked: they take libertie, as though they were scaped out of the Iudges hande, and should neuer yeeld an account: but they shall pay deare for the tyme, when they shall so abuse his patience, which would allure them vnto goodnesse, by giuing them respit too amende. Seing then that the wicked do so mocke at God: horrible vengeance must needs fall vpon their heade in the ende: and that shall be at the great day. Furthermore if God spare vs, let vs not cease to bee watchfull: and if he chastise vs, and beate vs with his roddes, let vs alwayes consider how terrible our wrath is, and therupon conclude that hee doth but summon vs. And why? To the ende we shoulde preuent his last iudgement. Therefore let vs alwayes thinke vpon the great day, and not rarie till wee bee taken tardie with the comming of oure Lorde Iesus Christ: but let euerie of vs condemne himselfe, when God stirreth vs therevnto. Furthermore let vs alwayes beare in remembrance, that God is oftentimes mindefull of mercie in the middes of his displeasure: and that the same is the cause, why he examineth not the great multitude of our sinnes. For howe great is the multitude of our sinnes? I pray you if euerie man would examine himselfe as he ought to do: should he not finde an infinite number of sinnes in him, yea and of so heynous offences as would vterly dismay him. But the cause why we consider not the greatnesse of our sinnes, is our hypocrisse which hindereth vs, and keepeth our eyes blindfolded. But if a man would examine himselfe throughly: he should finde himselfe a hundred thousand tymes confounded, before hee came halfe to his wayes ende. For God seeth much more cleereely than wee do. VVhen we haue spied one fault, God wil spie out a hundred thousande, yea euen of millions: what shall the heauenly Iudge do? So then let vs marke that God forbearth vs of his owne mercie, to the ende hee would not trie vs in the multitude [of our sinnes] that is too say, not searche vs too the vttermost. And Eliu sayeth expressly heere, in multitude greatly [or in great number] to signifie that it were impossible that any creature should stande out, if God of his goodnesse did not spare them, and continually abate the rigour of the punishments which we haue deserued by our sinnes. And herevpon (as I haue sayde already) wee must needs thinke that there is a farre other iudgement, than can be perceyued in this worlde, howbeit we knowe it not as yet, and God beareth with vs. And when wee bee come too the lowlinesse to condemne our selues, and to craue forgiveness at his hande, let vs not dout but that when we shall appeare before his iudgement seate at the latter day, all our sinnes shall be wiped out there: and let vs vnderstand that the examining of vs, which he doth now put vs to in part: is to the ende he may not examine any thing at all at the latter day, and that the remembrance of our offences may be so abolished, as they may come to account before him, but that we may be receiued there as righteous, as though there had beene nothing in vs, but all innocencie and soundnesse. Yee see then that it behoueth vs so too applye this doctrine too oure vse, as wee may learne so too walke in hope, as wee may alwayes go forwarde to the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christ, and also profite our selues when we see that our Lorde sheweth vs tokens of his wrath and vengeance as at this present: Alas, what calamities are too bee seene through the whole worlde? And we might say that God is vtterly alienated from vs, if wee had not his doctrine too sence vs withall. Surely when wee do throughly consider the outrageous iniquities that raigne euerie where: it appeareth plainly that God beareth with the worlde, and proceedeth not with such rigour as men haue deserued. Therefore let vs learne heereby to returne vnto him with the better hart, not doubting but he will receyue vs. And besides that, let vs holde our thoughtes and affections fettered and bridled: And forasmuch as Eliu hath heere condemned all wicked thoughtes, wandring wordes, and false ymaginations: let vs beseeche God, first too denze our heartes from all the wicked fancies wherein we be too much intangled, and therewithall to brydle our tongues, that we may not vtter any thing but to his honour, according to the request which David maketh, saying: Lord open thou our lips, that my mouth may set forth thy prayse. So then we haue good cause to pray God so too gouerne both our mindes and our tongues, that all our thoughtes and words may be to his honour. For if David who was so holy a Prophet, needed to craue this at his hande: what had we neede to do, which are so euill taught? Seeing it is so, let vs be well aduised that whensoever we think of God, we esteeme him good, wise, and righteous in all respects: and that whensoever we speake of him, it may be to call vpon him, and to yeelde him thanks for his goodnesse, which hee maketh vs to feele in these dayes, wayting till we be filled with it to the full.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to touch vs so too the quicke, as we may learne to returne better vnto him with true repentance, so b. thinking vs of our life past, as wee may amende it heereafter, and henceforth learne to giue our selues wholly too his seruice, in following his holy commaundements as they are shewed in his lawe, whereby wee ougto to rule our whole life. And so let vs say, Almighty God our heauenly father, we acknowledge and confesse according to the truth, that we bee not worthie to lift vp our eyes too Heauen, too present our selues before thee, nor too presume so farre, &c.

Eliu spake againe and sayde,

2. Heare me and I will argue vvith thee, for yet haue I vvordes to speake of God.
3. I will extende my knowlledge a farre off, and proue him to be righteous vvich made me.
4. My vvordes shall be voyd of vntuth, and the perfect of knowlledge shall be vvith thee.
5. God being mightie, yea being mightie in strength of mind, enuieth not, [or reiecteth not.]
6. He quickneth not the vvicked, but giueth iudgement to the afflicted.
7. He vvill vvill not turne avway his eyes from the righteous.

They that had heeretofore vphilde that God leaueth no sinne unpunished in this worlde, are beguiled as hath bene declared more fully already. And sure we see that God deserueth the punishment of many faults, to the end to make vs looke the further: For if he should as now execute a full iudging wherein nothing were missing: we should haue no occasion to hope for the coming of our Lorde Iesus Christ: he should haue no more to do in iudging of the world: for all would be done afore hande. So then Gods punishing of sinnes in this world, is not at all times, nor all after one rate: It is ynough that hee giueth vs some tokens and markes that he is Iudge of the world. The like also is perceyued in mainteyning the Godly: It is sayd that god gouerneth his seruants, and is the preseruer of those that commit themselves vnto him and that he deliuereth them from all their aduerities: yea, howbeit that is not done in such wise, but that he suffereth the Godly to be now and then afflicted, yea & seemeth not to be minded to succor them though they call vpon him. Therefore it behoueth vs so to acknowledge Gods providence, as we consider that he reserueth many things till the last day. And this is the matter that Eliu should treat of here. This Chapter then importeth none other thing, but that if we open our eyes, we may easily see that God holdeth the brydle of all worldly things, and sheweth hi melfe to be carefull ouer vs. True it is that we see not so perfect and good a state as were to be wished: no, it is faire wile of it. Howbeit the reason is apparant: namely, that God is mynded to exercise vs heere with manye battayles, and againe, that he intendeth to drawe vs further, namely too make vs to knowe that a day will come, wherein all things shall be stablished againe, so that whereas things go amisse as now, it is to the ende, that wee shoulde bee the more prouoked too desyre the appearing of the Sonne of God, too sette all things in order againe, according as it is his office, and as hee hath promised so to doo. But before Eliu treat of the foresayde matter, namely that God gouerneth the worlde, and disposeth thinges in suche wise, as his iustice is shewed by experience: hee vseth heere a Preface. Heare mee (sayeth hee) for I haue yet matter to speake concerning God. And what matter? I will extende my knowlledge a farre (sayeth hee) to proue that he which maae me, is righteous. Eliu in saying that he had yet to speake of God: sheweth that a faithfull man must not giue ouer the maintenance of Gods quarell, too the ende to stoppe their mouthes, whiche murmure agaynst him, or blasphemme him. And truly if wee had but a little peece of the zeale that is comaunded vs in the holy scripture: we woulde be much more earnest in mainteyning Gods honour than we be. It is sayde in the Psalme, that the reproches which are offered vnto God, ought to light vpon our heades, and so touch vs, as wee may feele them at the heart, and bee more greued and forie for them, than if men did vs all the outrage that were possible to bee thought. For who are we? If we were a hundred tymes misused: ought our owne honour too bee so much set by at our handes, as the honour of God? No. But yet we see the cōtrarie, so as if any of vs be defamed, by and by he will reuenge himseife, or at leastwise seeke iustice, and is neuer contented til his honor be repayred, and yet his honor is nothing. For what are we? But as for the name of God, that shall be rent in peeces: one shall villaynously skoffe at it, another shall spee we out cursed blasphemies agaynt it, and a thirde shall rayle at it: And this geere passeth and slipeth away amongs vs, no man is moued at it, and if we speake but one woorde agaynt it, wee thinke we haue done more than ynough. Therefore when we suffer Gods doctrine to be flaudered, his Maiestie blasphemed, and his name runne in mennes mouthes with reproch: therein wee shewe that there is not one droppe of good zeale in oure heartes, and this cowardlynesse of oures, deserueth that God shoulde disclayme vs for his children. For if wee tooke him for our father: coulde wee abide that men shoulde aduance themselves after that sort agaynste him? A childe that is of a good nature, woulde couer the reproch of his carnall father, although he were of no value. And what shall we then do, when the matter concerneth him that is the wellspring of all righteousness, and the king of glorie, and which deserueth all prayse, as the scripture speaketh, and as the effect it selfe sheweth. Then if we clayme him for our father, and yet notwithstanding haue our mouthes shette when men go about too peruert his truth, and his name is reuled, and too bee short, hee is made an open scoffing tocke, and wee bee not touched nor greued at all with it: are wee woorthie to bee acknowledged for his children? So then wee ought too marke this text betrer, where it is sayde, that there is yet more to be spoken of God. This worde yet importeth that when a faythfull man hath sette himselfe agaynste the wicked whiche impeache Gods honour, hee is not discharged for shewing onely that hee consented not vnto them: but as much as in vs lieth, we must to the vtermost withstande and resist those that offer wrong vnto God, and go aboute to diminishe or deface his glorie by any maner of meanes. We must I say, be their enemies to the vtermost, and neuer giue ouer the battaile, in so hoie and iust a quarell. But in the meane while, we see the wicked are a wayes readie to mainteyne euill caces: and in these dayes the wickeddest man shall finde most bearers and bolsterers, in somuch that a man might conclude, that if he will bee fauoured and borne out, hee must giue himselfe to ail euill. And againe euerie man will sell his conscience and his tongue for a little good cheere or some other suche corruption. These things are manifest, and yet in the meane while, they whiche say, they haue some zeale of God, are dumbe, and dare not open their lippes. Seeing then that these villaynes are so outrageous: I pray you shall there neede any other

recorde to condemne those that haue had no courage and stoutnesse too mainteyne Gods honour, than the wickednesse that is seene in the wicked, in that they doo so linke together in all euill. Thus as for goodnesse, yee shall not finde a man that will hazarde himselfe for it. The wicked may spight God in theyr mainteyning of wicked matters, vnder the colour of some present that shall bee giuen them: and in the meane while, no man shall haue the minde to mainteyne goodnesse. Therefore let vs learne to be more zealous of Gods glorie than we haue beene. And first of all, when we see men go about to overthrow the good and pure doctrine: let vs shewe what sayth there is in vs, and make confession of it, by withstanding Sarans lies, and such as seeke nothing but to bring troubles and stumblingblockes into the Church of God. That is one poynt. Againe, do we see God scorned and dallyed withall, and men talking of the holy Scripture to bring all religion in disdaine? Let vs be inflamed with a holy anger, for it is a cause which ought too moue vs, and grieue vs, when wee see Gods honour wounded, and his religion misused. So then let vs shewe that wee haue yet too talke of God. Thirdly, when wee heare blasphemyes flying abroade in the streetes, or in the markets, or in vittayling houses: let vs labour to resist them to the vttermost of our power, that we may ridde and clenze away such abomination from among vs. Wherefore as muche as in vs lyeth, let vs not suffer Gods name too bee reuyled. And for a conclusion, whensoever wee see any euill raigne: let vs cast a stoppe before it, and labour to amende it, and then will God do vs the honour too acknowledge vs for his Proctores and Aduocates. But if wee do otherwise, wee giue Satan the vpper hande, and are guiltie of betraying the name of God, for that we made no account of the thing which is principal, and so ought to be taken. This is it which wee haue too marke vpon the wordes where Eliu sayeth: that yet he hath still to speake of God. Afterwarde hee goeth forward with the same sentence, according also as it is a case, well woorthie that the faythfull shoulde imploy themselves in it too the vttermost, yea and streyne themselves about all their forces, for when he sayeth, that hee will extende his knowlege a farre: thereby hee sheweth, that when we speake of God, wee must lift vp our mindes higher than oure naturall vnderstanding mounteth. And in good sooth, shall a man euer attaine vnto God, if hee iudge according to his owne fancie and fleshy reason? No. But we shall rather darken his glorie.

So then, if wee will glorifie God, let vs learne to reach out our knowlege farre and wyde, according as example is giuen vs heere. And howe? For a man shall neuer reach out his knowlege as he ought to doo, too speake of God, except hee knowe that his Maiestie is higher than all our vnderstanding, and therefore that he must be faine to come downe to vs, and to lift vs vp vnto him. Thus must we humble our selues with all reuerence, to the ende that God may lift vs vp too him, and shewe himselfe to vs, and make vs partakers of the doctrine which otherwise wee couide neuer attaine vnto. Ye see then how we must reach out our knowlege a farre when we haue to deale concerning God. Nowe, were this well obserued, we shoulde profite after another maner than we do, both by sermons and lectures. But what? As for them that come too Sermons, howe are they disposed to receyue the doctrine that is set forth? It is ynough for them to come to the Church, and too shewe themselves there. And therefore they go they wayes as ill as they came, or rather worse: for it is good reason that god should punish the with blindnesse, which doo so despise the inestimable treasure of his Gospell. When men come thither lazily without any minde, and there fall into their dumps, and consider not that it is God which speaketh vnto them, that they might do him honour, and receyue the thing that is gone oute of hys mouth: are they not traytors to God, in yeelding so little honor to the doctrine of saluation? That is the cause the why God blindeth them. When we read the holy scripture, either we will bee provide, so as we do but ouerrun matters vpon trust of our owne wit, as though wee were sufficient Iudges to determine vpon all things: or else we mingle Gods worde with our worldly affections. And furthermore, we are so farre off from reaching out our knowlege a farre: that wee bee as it were forepossessed with our owne fond and trifling imaginations, and with our wicked lustes, which holde vs as it were locked and bowed downe, so as we cannot lift vp our heades vnto heauen. That is the cause why we see so slender profiting: and that such as beare the name of faythfull, knowe not what God is, neither do desire too knowe. Therefore let vs learne by the example of Eliu, to lift vp our knowlege, and to reach it out a farre when there is any talking of God: and let vs learne also to do him the honour, too dispose our selues too looke reuerently vnto him. For that also is an accomplishing of this saying of the holy Scripture, that God is neere vnto the lowly, and sheweth himselfe to such as distrust in themselves, without challenging to them any drop of goodnesse as of themselves. And finally as often as we speake of God, let vs not giue our owne braine the bridle, but let vs learne to reach out our knowlege further. Eliu addeth, that hee will proue him to be righteous whib he made him. Here we see wher vnto all our talke ought to tend whē we speake of God: namely to the mainteyning of his glory. And what doctrine soeuer is referred to that ende, we must hold it for good & holy: like as when men reason and dispute too diminishe the honour of God, it is certaine that there is nothing in them but frowardnesse, howe faire colours soeuer they pretend. So then whensoever we speake of God, let vs beare in minde to proue him righteous, that is to say, to yeelde him his duetie, so as he may bee magnified at our handes, and we acknowledge him suche as hee woulde bee knowne to bee, that all mouthes may bee shette, and haue no occasion to mislike of him. Thus yee see that the talke which we ought to haue concerning our God, must bee to sanctifie his name: according also as we desire in the prayer that wee vse euerie day. And Eliu addeth immediately, that his wordes shall bee voyde of vne truth, and that he will shewe vnto Iob that his knowlege is perfect.

Heere hee protesteth that hee will not mingle anie thing with the good doctrine, nor go about to disguise it. And surely it is one poynt further which wee ought to marke well, that when wee open our mouth to treat of God, and of his workes and worde, there must not bee any mingling with it, but purenesse must be kept, so as all that euer we speake be whole and sound. For as for him that mingleth good matter and euill matter together, what dooth hee else, but bring good meate, and well seasoned too the taste, which yet notwithstanding is poisoned? Euen so is it with all suche as make a fayre shewe, and do indeede alledge good and true sayings: and yet notwithstanding doo interlace them with lies and errors. Let vs marke well then that he which executeth the office of a Teacher, muste not onely regarde to haue good sayings, but specially indeuer too haue this simplicitie, that hee neyther adde nor diminishe anie thing thing from Gods pure doctrine. And therefore if wee will haue a weil ruled fayth, wee must go by that lyne, and take good heede, that in teaching, wee vse nothing to guide vs, but the pure will of God, and that all oure wordes bee referred and conformable therevnto. But if we handle things otherwise, and deale not with suche soundnesse and vprightnesse as God requireth, who (as wee say) wil haue his worde preached in singlenesse, I say if wee haue not that minde with vs: wee shall perceyue in the ende, that wee haue bene out of the way. Heere then wee be taught too receyue the pure and holy doctrine as wee ought too do, and to see that it bee not mingled. For what a thing is it, too mingle poyson with good drinke or good meate: This is the thing which wee haue to consider in Elius wordes. And whereas he sayeth, that bee will bee perfect in knowledge towards Iob. It is of some men referred vnto God, as if Eliu shoulde say, that in the ende Iob should perceyue, that it was not for him to set God too schole, as wee haue seene heretofore that hee went about to do: not of sette purpose, but bycause that by his murmuring it might seeme that hee woulde haue ruled God after his owne manner: and that bycause hee contented not himselfe with his dooings, hee woulde haue founde fault with him, and haue reuered his ordinance. For this cause (as some thinke) Eliu sayth here, that God shall be found perfect in knowledge. Howe bee it this saying ought rather too bee referred too him that speaketh: as if hee shoulde say, thou shalt perceyue that I am a faythfull teacher. His meening then is, that forasmuche as hee will speake in Gods name, Iob ought well too admitte his wordes, bycause hee woulde not mingle nor adde any thing of his owne, but handle the true doctrine perfectly, euen as he had receyued it of God. Therefore when a man that preacheth God, magnifieth his doctrine, it must not bee taken as though he aduanced himselfe too much: for we must exalt Gods truth about all loftinesse, so as nothing may deface it.

Thus yee see after what maner Eliu speaketh heere. It is not to vaunte himselfe in his owne person, but too the ende that the doctrine whiche hee bringeth, (according as it is of God) might bee receyued, and euery man humble himselfe vnder it. And doubtlesse it is a monstrous thing, when men fall too stryuing agaynste it. VVherefore let vs vnderstande that there is such a perfection in it, as all the worlde ought too holde their mouthes shette, and acknowledge that God shoulde bee so honoured when he speaketh to vs, as euery man ought too obey him.

But nowe let vs come too the generall matter that is conteyned heere. Hitherto Eliu hath vsed a Preface, and nowe hee entereth intoo the pleading of Gods cace, and sayth, that God being strong despyseth no man, Verely (sayeth he) that is of strength and courage. Heere hee taketh a grounde too separate God from men, and too take him out of their number, too the intent we shoulde not thinke of Him as of oure selues. For the verie cause why wee iudge amisse of him, is for that wee woulde alwayes fashion him after our smalnesse, as who shoulde say there were not an infinite difference of power betwixt him and vs. Then if men go about to resemble God vntoo a mortall man, it is a defacing of his Maiestie, and yet for all that, it is more than ordinarie, insomuch that wee finde it in all caces by experience. If God vse any rigour, wee fall too surmising this or that, and take occasion too repine agaynste him: and if hee threaten vs, wee are not awहितe moued at it, For wee beare oute selues in hande, that his anger will passe o-

uer. And what is the cause of so beastly a presumption? It is for that wee discern not God from his Creatures. Also on the contrary part, when God promifeth too receyue vs too mercie, wee cannot bee perswaded that it is so. For wee bee letted and hindered by oure owne imaginations [whiche make vs too thinke] what? I haue offended him so muche, and so muche. VVee make him alwayes lyke a mortall man, and therefore it is sayde in the Psalme, Looke howe farre the Hea- uens are from the Earth, so farre are my thoughtes from yours. And hee confirmeth the same saying by his Prophete Esay. Howe nowe sayeth hee, thinke yee that I am angrie after your manner? Thys serueth too shewe vs, that although wee haue prouoked hym too the vttermoste, yet will hee bee mercyfull still: and that although wee bee too too vnwoorthie, yet will hee not ceasse too reache oute his helpe vntoo vs.

So then wee see that this doctrine of Eliu is not superfluous, but exceeding muche for oure behoofe, bycause there are verie few that can withholde from mingling God with men, so as no difference can be perceyued betwixte hym and his creatures, and yet notwithstanding it is tolde vs, that there is greater difference betweene God and vs, than there is distaunce betweene Heaven and Earth. Therefore wee muste not measure his thoughtes by ours, nor speake any thing of him after oure owne imagination: For that were an vtter peruerting of all. Then let vs remember howe Eliu meening is in effect, that G O D oughte too bee so exalted aboute all Creatures, as menne may not presume too iudge of him after their owne naturall reason, nor after the disposition of things whiche they see heere bylowe: but consider that hee is a farre other thing, and as farre differing from vs, as the day differeth from the night. And for prooffe heereof, he sayeth, that God being strong reiecteth no man. For what is the cause that a mortall man seeketh too hurt his neighbour, and puncheth him with his elbowed too ouerthrow him, or too make him too stumble by some meanes or other? Euen the enuie and spight that one beareth too another, and also the feare that they haue whiche maketh them too saye, suche a one may doo mee harme, and if suche a man bee aduanced I shall bee plucked backe by it.

So then, bycause there are so manie infirmities in men, they are alwayes afrayde, least their neighbours shoulde bee aduanced too muche. That is the cause why they are full of contentions and quarelles: That is the cause why they woulde alwayes haue them diminished that are in too great authoritie and credite. That is the cause why menne labour after that sort too bring their neighbours lowe. Nowe let vs see if we can finde anie such poynt in God. No, no: For hee is too greates too enuie vs, hee passeth not what men say. For could wee eyther hurt God, or diminishe his honour though wee were neuer so great? There is no king nor prince that can aduance hys Throne aboute the Clowdes: but as for God, hee is aboute the Heauens, yea and aboute the Angelles: and as for men, what are they? The Prophete Esay speaking of mennes pryde, when they woulde so aduance themselves, sayeth that they are like Grasshoppers. Yee see that when Grasshoppers skippe, they make a great leape, bycause their legges bee long, but yet are they sayne too fall by and by too the grounde againe, or else they be as Frogges.

Thus yee see what comparison the Prophete setteth downe, too scorne the vaine gloriousnesse of men.

For admitte wee coulde flee aboute the Clowdes, admit wee were fellowes with the Angelles: yet wee see that they do worship the soueraine Maiestie of God, and are fayne to hyde their eyes with their winges, according as it is sayde in the prophecie of Esay. God then is not a-
E/say. 6. 2. frayde that wee can doo him any hurt, neyther will hee beare vs any enuie as though we were able too anyo him: his Maiestie shall alwayes continue vnappreached spight of our teeth. Seeing it is so, wee must conclude that there is no proportion betwixt him and vs, nor ima-10 gineth that when God is offended hee hath good cause to bee angrie, for feare least men shoulde bereeue him of his right.

True it is, that men are blameworthy for so doing, but yet can not any thing prejudice him at all. So then there is no infirmitie in him, that hee shoulde entie hys creatures: for he is great. And Eliu addeth moreover, that hee is great in strength of heart, or that he is mightie in vertue of minde. Herein Eliu toucheth another vice which is in men. For euen they which are mightie, and ought 20 not to enuie their inferiours, are notwithstanding so womanish hearted, that they are afrayde of them: according as wee see, that euen kings and princes whiche are of a spightfull nature, are sorie when they see any vertuous man. And why? For there is no true noblenesse in themselves, to say, God hath ordeyned me too aduaunce men of vertue, and to esteeme them and honour them: but cleane contrariwise, forasmuche as they bee bace minded themselves, they would haue all the world like them, and are ashamed to see an honest man. If there bee a prince 30 that would wallow in all filthinesse, and keepe a stewes in his Court: It greueth him to haue his lewdnesse discovered, whereas whoredome reigneth euerie where, yet doth he seeke still to get more libertie to giue himselfe to all lewdnesse. For asmuch then as men are seene to bee so bace minded: Eliu sayeth, that wee must not imagine God too bee after that fashion. And why? For besydes that hee is mightie, and men are not able to reache vnto him, hee is also mightie in vertue of minde, hee lyketh well of vertue, Iustice pleaseth him, he alloweth 40 goodnesse, and hee seeketh by all meanes too shewe that the more vertue that there is in men, the better hee is serued and honoured. For the thing wherein the glorifying of God consisteth, is that men shoulde bee vertuous. If a king see any of his subiectes more woorthie of commendation than himselfe, it mislyketh and greueth him. Why so? Because the thing whiche is in others wanteth in himselfe. But it is not so with God. For why? Haue men any goodnesse of their owne nature? No: but wee muste bee faine too receyue it of 50 God, hee is the well spring from whence it muste come.

Seeing it is so, God needeth not too feare that his honour should be darkned by mens vertues. But mark: here what we haue to consider: wee shall neuer knowe God to bee righteous and mightie in himselfe as wee ought to do, if wee consider him but by our naturall wit. And why? For oure mindes are too grosse and heauie too mounte so highe. But when wee see the vertues and 60 graces which he dealeth vnto men: those are fayre myrrours and liuely pictures wherein hee sheweth himselfe: and the more that men walk in righteousnesse, the more is he continually magnified, as in the thing wherwith he is serued and honoured. So then wee see nowe, that wee must no more match God with men, nor iudge of him after our guize and fancie: but he must be viterly separated from them according as in verie dede the heauen is not so farre off from the Earth, as there is distance betwixt him and vs, as I haue alledged alreadie out of the Psalmes and the Prophete Esay. And nowe after that P/s. 103. b. 11. E/say. 55. c. 9 Eliu hath spoken so, hee addeth that which I haue touched alreadie: that is to witte, that although many things bee out of order in this worlde: yet a man may perceyue the markes of Gods prouidence. And vndoubtedly, although God doo not as nowe keepe one vnchangeable rate: yet notwithstanding it is well scene, that God is aboute all the things in this worlde: and that if hee guided not the sterne, there woulde bee a horrible confusion euerie where. Therefore let it suffice vs too haue heere some markes of Gods prouidence, too the ende we may giue him his due glorie, and say, Lorde thou arte Iudge of the worlde howe soeuer things fall out. And although thou leaue many sinnes vnpunished, and cause the righteous and innocent too suffer many afflictions: yet neuerthelesse, wee perceyue that all things are guided by thy hande, and thou haste souereyne dominion over all things. Yee see then what Eliu treateth of heere, and first of all hee sayeth, that God quickeneth not the wicked, that he giueth iudgement to the afflicted, and that he turneth not away his eyes from the righteous.

These sentences whiche Eliu taketh, are generall: and also it behoueth vs generally too conclude, that God is righteous euen when wee perceyue not any signe of his righteousnesse. And wee muste remember the thing that hath bene declared afore: which is, that whert wee see that things are not set in so good order and perfection as wee woulde wishe: it must put vs in minde, that God will one day iudge the worlde in the person of his sonne, according too the article of our beleefe, that Iesus Christ must come too iudge both the quicke and the deade: and truly (as I haue sayde) if all things were disposed as were too bee wished: what a matter were it? VVee shoulde no more looke for the last resurrection. Doo wee then see that God executeth not all his iudgements, but reseructh some too himselfe? Let the same confirme vs in the hope of the last daye, and of the comming of the Lorde Iesus Christ, vntoo whome 40 God his father hath giuen all power, too the intent hee shoulde appeare in his Maiestie, too right all things that are oute of order, and too set them at a stay. And when wee see that God punisheth some offences, and delyuereth those that are his: whether it bee our selues or others, let the same suffice vs too allowe of his prouidence. I see that God hath punished suche a fault: then muste I conclude that hee hath shewed mee as it were a myrrour of his iustice, and that the wicked shall come to account before him. For why, he accepteth no persons, hee is not an earthly Iudge that will doo good iustice by 50 startes, so as if there bee some fault committed, it shall bee punished with great rigour, and in the meane while, many others shall bee let slippe through some briberie or parcialitie, and so shall the Iudge be quite and cleane chaunged.

This is euident, insomuch that all the Iustice in the worlde, yea euen the best that is too bee founde, is but the euilnesse bycause it proceedeth not of a good and founde minde that holdeth out continually. But there is no suche thing in God: he is not moued with fauour, nor corrupted wyth rewardes. What then? Hee iudgeth according too the truth. Seeing it is so: wee muste needes conclude, that when God punisheth an offence, therein he sheweth vs that nothing escapeth him but that all our woorkes must come too account before him, and that although they be hidden at this day, so as they be not perceyued at the first, yet we shall be neuertheless guiltie when we come thither.

So then, let vs learne too practise this lesson that is shewed vs heere, that is to wit, that God turneth not away his eyes from the righteous, nor quickeneth the wicked. And howe shall we knowe that? Not alwayes, nor all after one rate, as I have sayde afore: but yet God giueth vs sufficient proofes, too conclude that hee watcheth ouer the Godly, to the ende to mainteyne them, and that hee keepeth them in his protection, pitying them, and deliuering them from all daungers. I say, wee see suche examples heereof, as wee must needs haue this matter fully settled and concluded in vs. Furthermore, we see also that God lifteth vp his mightie hande too repress mennes iniquities, howbeit not alwayes: For hee lea- ueth many of them unpunished, winkyng at them, yea and making counteraunce, as though hee fauoured the wicked in many caces. But I haue shewed alreadie, that the same must confirme our sayth, and that wee muste bee fenced agaynst such stumbling blockes, by knowing that God reserueth those things till the latter day, which hee accomplisheth not as nowe. But howe soeuer the worlde go, we see that inasmuch as God punisheth such offences, hee hateth and abhorreth sinne. And therefore it behoueth vs to iudge therevpon, that he quickeneth not the wicked. But as this doctrine is set downe heere too teache vs too glorifie God in all respects: so also let vs marke that it must edifie oure sayth, and teache vs the feare of God. Do we then see that God turneth not away his eyes from the Godly, but hath pitie vpon them to helpe them? Let vs bee stablished in truste of his goodnesse, that wee may resort vntoo him as oft as wee bee afflicted. Haue wee scene that God hath deliuered any man, or that he hath deliuered our selues? Let the same make vs to returne too him, and say, howe nowe? My God hath made mee too feeble by experience, that hee is readie too helpe all suche as trust in him: and the

Scripture sayeth vntoo vs, Come vnto mee all yee that labour, and are heauie loden, and I will refreshe you. Ye see then, that all the recordes which God giueth vs, witnessyng that hee will not turne away his eyes from the Godly, muste confirme vs in the promises of his goodnesse whiche hee giueth vs. Also on the contrarie part, whereas it is sayde, that God quickeneth not the wicked: let vs learne to take the vse of it. Do wee see any crime punished? Let it prouoke vs too walke in feare, and to say, there is no dallying in this cace with God. Why so? For hee chasteneth such a one to the intent too instruct vs by his harmes. For it is a great fauour that God sheweth vs, when hee giueth vs such examples of his rigour and wrath, as we neuer thelesse without being touched, maye take warning: too eschue his vengeance, which was readie for vs, and which he might haue made vs too feeble.

Thus yee see that all the examples of the chastisements and corrections which God doth in this worlde, ought to serue too our learning. True it is that wee can well say, God is righteous, and such a one hath his due reward: we can skill to condemne such as haue done a misse, and too allowe the corrections that God sendeth them: but in the meane while, we applie not the thing too our owne vse, and yet were that the principall poynt. When I see that God punisheth a man, I must enter in too my selfe, and looke if I bee not attained with the same vice, or whether I bee not as guiltie in some other respectes. And therevpon I must humble my selfe, and waike more aduisedly than I haue earst done. Furthermore, we haue yet one other frute too bee taken of the chastisements that God sendeth. Therein wee see also that God hath care of his children. If God beate downe those that haue troubled one and wronged another: why doth he it but too take our quarrell in hande? So then we ought to be the better minded to serue God, when we see him set himselfe agaynst our enemies, and thunder vpon them, after he hath suffered them to haue their scope for a time. And therefore (as I haue declared afore) we ought to bee the more confirmed to leane vnto his promise by sayth, without doubting that hee will shewe himselfe a father towards vs. And therewithall we must bee hilde in his feare, that wee may preuent all the vengeance which we see too light vpon the wicked, and vpon the despisers of his maiestie.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feeble in such wise, as we may learne to bee sorie for them, yea and to be angrie and greeued at our vices, and sinfull lustes, so as wee may seeke earnestly too haue his righteousnesse raigne in vs, and too bee reformed too his holy will, and that moreouer forasmuche as wee haue too fight agaynst the temptations of this present life, hee will giue vs armour to defende our selues withall, that although we knowe much miserie and wretchednesse in our selues, yet we may not doubt but that he will vphold vs, and supplie our wantes by his grace, according as we knowe that all perfection of vertue and goodnesse is in him, too giue the same vnto vs, according as hee knoweth vs too haue neede. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, bringing back all poore ignorant soules, &c.

After

After that Eliu hath generally sayde that God turneth not his eyes from the righteous, but hath a care of him: and contrarywise, that hee quickneth not the wicked: he addeth particularly for the better prooffe of Gods prouidēce, that he giueth iudgement to the afflicted. For if a poore man that is vtterly destitute of succour, and an outcast in the world, is neuertheless deliuered from vexation and trouble: the same muste needes procede of God, yea I say, it muste needes be fathered vpon God. For if we haue no stay in the worlde, and yet haue strong and mighty enemies: what is to be sayd, but that we are vndone, and that there is no more hope of our life? Then if we recouer, it is manifest that God worketh in that behalfe. So, it is not without cause that Eliu doth purposely set downe this saying for a prooffe that God gouerneth all things here beneath. Also he setteth downe a second example of Gods prouidence: namely the gouernment of Princes and of men that sit in the seate of Iustice: wherein wee perceyue, that God is righteous, and that he will not haue things to be out of order. And although there be not a continuall rate euenly kept at all tymes (as was declared yesterday) yet notwithstanding when wee see that there is any order in the world, therein we may see as it were in a glasse, that God hath not so lette looce the reynes to all confuzion, but that he doth still shewe vs some signe and token of his iustice. And vndoubtedly if a man consider on the one side what the nature of man is: and on the other side after what maner the gouerners and magistrates and such as haue the swoorde of iustice in their hand do discharge themselves: he shall see and easely discern it to be a miracle of God that there is any common weale amongs vs, yea and we must needes know it and perceyue it. I say that the nature of men is such, that euery man would be a Lord and Mayster ouer his neyghbours, and noman by his good will would be a subiect. Seing then that our Lord suffereth not the strongest to preuaile, but that there is some feare and obediēce towards those that are in preheminance: therein it is to be seene, that God doth not onely brydle, but also fetter mens nature, to the ende that the sayd pryde auance not it selfe so high, but that publike gouernment should bee aboute it. And agayne wee see that all men are giuen to euill, and their iustes are so boyling, that euery man would haue libertie to do as he list, and no man be vnder correction. Therefore it is to bee concluded that the state of gouernment commeth of God, and that therein hee sheweth that his creating of men was to the end they should behaue themselves honestly and modestly. And for the second poynt, we see how Kings and Princes and such as are of meaner state, behaue themselves when God hath armed them with the swoorde of Iustice, and how they turne all things ypside downe, in somuch that it seemeth that they intended to spite God, and to disdain his ordinance. Now if they which ought to mainteyne peaceably the order that God hath set, inforce themselves to ouerthrowe it, and fight as it were of set purpose to bring things to confuziō: and yet for all that the state of gouernement continueth still in the world, and things are not so vtterly confounded, but that there abide still some marks of the thing that God had stablished: Is it not too be seene therein, that God is double righteous? And therefore it is not without cause, that Eliu, after hee hath spoken of the succoring of the poore by God, addeth immediatly one other kinde, namely that God stablisheth Kings, and that not for one day, but too the intent that the same order should stand for euer in the world. True it is that there are many changes off and on, and that there fall great alterations vpon Principalities and Lordshippes: and therein God sheweth also that it is his office to pull downe the prowde. But yet neuertheless, euen in despite of men and of all their rage, there shall some order remayne still here bylowe, I say euen in respecte of tyrants. If a King reygne wrongfully, so as hee be a despizer of God and full of crueltie, outrage, and vnstabile couetousnesse: yet notwithstanding he muste bee sayne to keepe some shadowe and countenance of Iustice, and hee cannot go beyond it. Whereof commeth that, but bicause God sheweth himselfe there? And therefore lette vs learne to profite our selues in such wise by the things that are seene in this world, as God may be glorified at our hands, as he deserueth: and specially when wee see him deliuer the poore that are vtterly oppressed, & nother haue, nor hope for any succour at mens hands: let vs there consider his mightie power and goodnesse, and dispoze our selues to yeeld him his due prayze. This (say I) is the thing that we haue to note. Howbeit herewithall, to the intent to proue our selues to be Gods children, let vs beware that we lend our helping hand to such as are wrongfully persecuted, & that according to the abilitie which God giueth vs, we do succour such as are trode vnder foote, & haue no means to reuenge or beare out themselves. VVe must (I say) do our indeuer in that behalf, and streyne our selues to it in good earnest. Secondly, sith we see gouernours and men of authoritie so froward and spitefull, and yet notwithstanding that God suffereth them not to fall quite out into all disorder: there let vs humble our selues to honour his prouidence, assuring our selues that if he restrayned not their wickednesse, we should be ouerwhelmed with an horrible fludde, and all should bee swallowed vp and drowned out of hand. Therefore it behoueth vs to magnifie God in that we see there remayneth some iustice & good order, although that such as reygne and holde the swoord in their hand, be vtterly wicked and giuen to all naughtinesse. So then, let vs consider the same, and let vs (as much as in vs is) mainteyne the order of iustice, for so much as it is a soueraine benefit that God bestoweth vpon mankinde, and that therein also it is his will to haue his prouidēce knowne vnto vs. And sith we see that Princes and Magistrates and all officers of Iustice are so far out of square: let vs be sory to see the order so peruerted which God had dedicated to the welfare of men: & not only let vs abhor such as are the enemies of God, & withstand the order of gouernment which he had set ouer the: but also let vs know, that they be the frutes of our sins, to the intēt we may impute the fault & cause of the whole mischief to our own selues. Thus ye see what we haue to remēber in this text. Now let vs come to that which Eliu addeth: He sayeth that if the good men, or else if the great men of whom he had spokē, whom God had exalted to high degree and dignitie aboute the rest of the world, bee at any time set in the stocks: I say if they be at any time brought downe, euen to shame and reproch, so as men put them in pryson and fetter them, and they be tied to confuzion with cordes: yet notwithstanding God forsaketh the not in such necessitie, but maketh them to feele their sinnes, and telleth them the faults that they haue comitted, to the end that vpon knowledge of them, they may amend them & returne into the right way, and he openeth their eares, to the end they should bethinke themselves the better, and know themselves. Eliu then sheweth here, that whē God seemeth vnto vs to shet his eyes, and to regard no more the gouerning of men: he hath iust cause so to do: and that although wee thinke it straunge, yet muste wee acknowledge that he is iuste and rightuous in all his doings, and that wee haue cause to glorifie him. Truly it behoueth vs to beare continually in minde all the things that haue bene treated of heretofore: that is to wit, that things are not ruled in this worlde all after one rate, and that God reserueth a great part of his iudgements which he intendeth too execute, vnto the latter day, too the intent that wee should alwayes liue in hope, wayting for the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christe. And it muste suffice vs to haue some tokens whereby to perceyue the things that are tolde vs here.

Nowe then, the intent of Eliu is to preuent a stumblingblocke that menne might conceyue, when they see good and rightuous folkes trampled vnder foote, and God layeth them open too the tyrannie of the wicked, and the worlde troubleth them without cause, so as although they haue not done any bodie wrong, yet neuerthelesse menne ceasse not too molest them. For when wee see that: it seemeth too vs that God thinketh not vpon the worlde, ne looketh so farre as vnto vs, but letteth fortune alone with the rule of all things: Lo how our eyesight is immediatly dazeled at the beholding of things that are out of order, and there is nothing more easie with vs than to stumble. For this cause Eliu sheweth vs here, that although good menne be persecuted, or else if such as were aduanced too great estate be ouerthrowne, so as God seemeth to confounde heauen and earth together: wee muste not therefore bee too sore dismayed in our mindes. And why? For God hath some iuste reason to do it, which wee be not able too conceyue at the firste brunt. But lette vs tarie with patience, and wee shall knowe that God will make such afflictions to do vs good, and that they tende to a good ende. And why? For then (sayeth hee) doth God shewe them their finnes that are so tormented, and maketh them to perceyue what they be: & that is to the end to bring them to good amendment.

Nowe then, here wee see, firste of all that wee muste not deeme things by outward apparance, but gage deeper & seeke the cause that moueth God to do the things which wee thinke straunge at the first sight. It seemeth cleane contrarie to all reason, that a good man should bee so persecuted and that euery man should ouerrune him: howbeit God knoweth why he doth it. Therefore wee must haue an eye to the end, & not be to halie to shoote forth our verdict at the first dash, as they do which iudge at all auentures. Now then what is the ende of our afflictions? It is to make vs to perceyue our finnes: and it is a very notable poynt, whereof wee may gather a very profitable lesson. True it is that we heare it oftentimes spoken of: neuerthelesse we cannot heare of it too much: for we know that afflictions are so irksome to vs, that euery of vs falleth to chafing as soone as wee feele any strype of the rodde at Gods hande, and wee cannot comfort our selues nor keepe our selues in patience. And therefore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke well this doctrine, that when God suffereth vs to bee vexed euen wrongfully as in respect of the world: euen then doth he worke our welfare, in that it is his will to make vs feele our finnes, and to shew vs what we be. For in time of prosperitie wee be blinde: and surely wee shall not know aright what is conteyned here, vnlesse God bring vs too it by his chastizements. Are wee at our ease and in pleasure? Euery of vs falleth asleepe and flattereth himselfe in his finnes, in somuch that our prosperitie is as a drunkenesse to cast our soules into a dead sleepe. And (which woofe is) when God letteth vs alone in peace, although wee haue offended him a thousand wayes: yet we cealle not to sooth our selues, bearing our selues in hande that we be in his fauour, & that he loueth vs because he scourgeth vs not.

Yee see then that menne cannot perceyue their owne finnes, if they bee not driuen by force to knowe themselves. And therefore seeing that prosperitie maketh vs drunken after that sort, and that when we be at rest, euery man flattereth himself in his finnes: it standeth vs vpo to suffer God patiently to scourge vs. For affliction is the true schoolemistresse to bring men to repentance, to the ende they may condemne themselves before God, and being so cōdemned learne to hate their finnes wherein they weltered afore. Therefore, when wee knowe the frute of the chastizements that God sendeth vs, wee will beare them with a meelder and quieter minde than wee do. But it is a piteous case to see howe rechelesse wee are, bycause wee know not that God procureth our welfare by affliction vs after that maner. Furthermore lette vs marke well, that wee muste not looke vpon the visible hande of God for the feeling of our finnes. For it may come to passe, that God will giue menne the brydle, so as they shall persecute vs, yea euen vniustly, when wee shall not haue done them any wrong. But yet euen in that case it behoueth vs to learne, that God calleth vs vnto his schoole. For his forbearing too smyte vs with his owne hande, and putting of vs into the handes of the wicked, is too tame vs and meeken vs the better: and then doth hee put vs too the more shame. Then if the wicked haue their full scope, so as it lyeth in their hande to torment vs, and they doo the woofst that they can vnto vs: It is all one as if God shoulde tell vs, that wee bee not woorthie to bee beaten of his owne hand, and that he intendeth to shame vs. So much the more therefore must wee bee prouoked too thinke vpon our finnes, and too bee sorie for them, and therewithall too marke how Eliu addeth, that God dooth then open our eares. That saying betokeneth two things in the holy Scripture. For sometimes it signifieth but too speake too vs: and sometimes it signifieth too touch our hearts in such wise as we heare what is sayde too vs. God therefore openeth our eares, when hee sendeth vs his woorde, and causeth the same to bee sette before vs: and agayne hee openeth our eares, or hee vncouereth or vnstoppeth them (for the Hebrewewoorde doth conueniently importe as much) when hee suffereth vs not to bee deafe too his doctrine, but giueth it enterance into vs, to the ende wee may receyue it and bee moued with it, and that the power thereof may shewe it selfe. These (I say) are the two fortes of opening our eares, which wee dayly perceyue God to vse towards vs.

Also hee openeth the eares of those whom hee afflicteth, in that hee giueth them some signe of his wrath, thereby too teache them to bethinke themselves better than they haue done. If a man demaunde, what then doth not God speake too vs when wee bee in prosperitie? Yes surely doth he: but his voyce cannot come vnto vs: for we be fraughted aforehād with our owne delights and worldly affections. And vndoubtedly wee see, that when men haue their fill of good cheere, and may make merry at their owne pleasure, and liue in helth and welth, they ouerjoy themselves. There is none other talke with the then, but of sporting: in such wise as God is no more heard among them. But afflictions are messengers of his wrath, and then are wee touched with greefe for offending him, so as we call our selues home againe. And so afflictions muste generaly serue for instruction too such as receyue the, so as they may drawe homeward vnto God, from whom they haue hilde themselves aloofe before.

Marke that for one poynt. Yet notwithstanding men suffer not themselves to be governed by God, vntill he haue softened their hearts by his holy spirite, and opened the passage for the warnings that he giueth, and perced mens eares that they may yeelde them to his seruice and obedience, as it is sayd in the Psalme. This is it which we haue to marke. And therefore when wee be afflicted, first let vs remember, that it is all one as if God should speake vnto vs and shewe vs our sinnes, and indited vs to the intent to drawe vs to repentance. Howbeit forasmuch as wee be dull vpon the spurrs, or (which more is) wee be vterly stubborne and deafe vnto all the warnings that he giueth vs: It behoueth vs to pray him too perce our eares, and to open them in such wise to his instructions, as the same may turne to our profite: and that he suffer not the ayre onely to be beaten, without touching of our heart: but that he moue vs too come and returne vnto him. Otherwise let vs be sure wee shall do nothing but chafe at him, and reiect his corrections: according as experience sheweth in moste men, that such as are smitten with Gods scourges amende not for all that, but rather wexe woorse and woorse. Then sith wee see such examples, let vs learne that all is to no purpose till God open our eares, that is to say, till he haue made vs to heare him speake to vs by the woorking of his holy spirite, and also to obey him in that which wee haue so heard. Lo what we haue to marke vpon this streyne. Now he addeth immediatly, that if they beare and obey, they shall spende their dayes in weale, and their yerces in glory: but if they berken not too him, they shall passe by the swoorde, and dye without knowledge. Here Eliu sheweth vs yet better, the profite that wee haue by being in aduersitie. It is vndoubtedly a great benefite, and which cannot bee sufficiently valued, when we be drawne to repentance; and that whereas we were in the high way to damnation, our Lord bringeth vs backe to himselfe. I say it is a thing that ought to allwage all the sorrowe of our afflictions. Howbeit there is yet much more in it: namely that our Lorde sheweth vs by prooffe, how profitable the same is for vs, to the end wee may be deliuered from our aduersities and succored by him, and he shew himselfe fauorable to vs by that meanes. Seing then that all this is found by experience: haue wee not cause to be glad when God deliuereth vs after that sorte? For if he should suffer vs to be sorted in the pleasures of this worlde, in the ende wee would growe paste grace, and therefore he is fayne to remedie it in due season. And if he do it by afflicting vs, and therevpon deliuer vs to the intent wee should perceyue his hande: is it not a singular prooffe of his fauour, and of our fayth? If God should suffer vs to weter in our own filthinesse and to settle in our owne lees (as the Prophets terme it) wee would rotte away as I haue sayde afore: and besides that, we would not esteeme his grace to wards vs to be such as he sheweth it by taking vs out of the aduersities wherevnto we were fallen. Lo here a double benefite that redoundeth vnto men by Gods correcting them after that manner. For first and foremost they be brought backe vnto him: and secondly they perceyue his fatherly goodnesse when they be deliuered by this grace. Thus yee see what wee haue to marke in this streyne. Nowe a man might demaund, yea, is it so? are we sure that Gods intent is to drawe vs to repentance, when hee scourgeth vs himselfe, or when he suffereth vs to be troubled by men? VVhat can wee tell whither his purpose and will be such or no? Herevnto we answer: In asmuch as wee see that afflictions last but for a time, and God deliuereth vs from them: lette vs vnderstand thereby, that he mindeth not to vndo vs vterly, but is contented that wee be beaten downe and humbled vnder his hande. But if our neckes be of brasie to withstand him, so as wee will not bowe for the corrections that he sendeth vs: wee do nothing else but continually double his strokes. Then on the contrary parte, if wee feele our sinnes so, as wee craue forgiveness of them, and hee perceyue vs to bee rightly touched: then maketh he our aduersities too turne to a wholesome medicine to vs, and therevpon he deliuereth vs from them.

VVee see all this (I say) euen with our eyes. So then lette vs not grudge any more when wee see God sende such troubles into the worlde, nother lette vs bee offended at it as though hee had his eyes shet. For he knoweth well ynough what he doth, and hee hath an infinite wisdom which appeereth not too vs at the firste dash: and in the end we shal see that he hath disposed things in good order and measure. Also lette vs learne herewithall, not to be too much grieued when wee bee afflicted after that manner, assuring our selues that God doth by that meanes further our saluation.

Agayne, would wee bee healed when wee bee so in trouble and payne? would wee haue a good and desirable end of them? Then lette vs folow the way that is shewed vs here, namely to heare and obey. How to heare? By beyng taught when God holdeth vs as it were in his schoole, so as our afflictions may bee as many instructions to resort vnto him. Then let vs heare these things, and lette not that slippe out of the one eare which entered in at the other: but lette vs obey, that is to say, lette vs yeelde God such obedience as wee ought to do: and lette vs not seeke anything else than to frame our selues wholly vnto him. Lo by what meanes wee may bee ridde of our aduersities. But what? wee muste not maruell though menne linger in payne, yea and bee plunged dayly deeper and deeper in their miseries: for which of them giueth eare vnto God when hee speaketh? It is apparant what a number are afflicted and tormented, and it is euident that Gods scourges are occupied euerywhere now adayes. But how fewe are there that thinke vpon them? Yee shall see a whole Realme oppressed with warres till they can no more: and yet shall ye scarce find a dozen men among a hundred thousand, that heare God speake. Behold, the yerkes and lashes of his whippes do sounde and roare in the ayre: there is horrible weeping and wayling euerywhere: menne crie out alas and wo is mee: and yet of all the whye they looke not too the hande that smyteth them, according as the Prophete vpbraideth the stubbornharted, that whereas they feele the strokes, yet they perceyue not Gods hande.

VVee see the lyke in plague times and dearth. So then, is it any woonder if God sende incurable woundes, and put that thing in vre which is sayde by the Prophete Esay: namely that from the sole of the foote to the crowne of the head, there is not any soundnesse at all in this people, but all is like a leprosie, so as they bee rotten and filthie; and their sores past recouerie? Is this to be wondered at, seing that now adayes menne are so thanklesse to Godward, that they shet him out of the doores, and will not heare him that they might obey him? wherefore whensoever we be beaten with Gods scourges, let vs learne to come by and by vnto him, and to herken to the warnings that he giueth vs, so as we may feele our sinnes & millike of them. That done: lette vs be hartely sorie for them, to the ende it may please him to haue pite vpon vs. If wee go to woork after that sorte, God will not forgente his owne charge of instructing vs and of deliuering vs from all our aduersities. But if wee will needes play the restie lades, hee will hamper vs well ynough, according ding as it is sayd here, that we shall passe by the sworde and bee consumed without knowledge, that is to say, in our owne folie. Whereas it is sayde that wee shall passe by the sworde: the meening is that the woundes shall bee vterly vncurable, so as we must hope no more for any healing, for there shall be nomore remedie for vs. If wee be not wilfull when God warneth vs of our faults: he will shewe himselfe a good Phisition towards vs in purging vs of them, at leastwise if wee bee not past amendment. But if there be nother reason nor amendment in vs, so as we chawe vpon the bridle without feeling of our sinnes to be forie for them: lette vs assure our selues that all the afflictions of this worlde shall be deathfull vnto vs. If wee learne not to returne vnto God when he calleth vs, and giueth vs space of repentance, that is too say, if wee come not in tyme conuenient, and enter when the gate is open to vs: I say if we do not so: all the chastizements that were giuen vs for our welfare, do turne to our greater damnation, and they muste be as many summonings, insomuch that the fulnesse of all miserie muste bee accomplished vpon vs. So muche the more must wee bethinke our selues, that wee prouoke not such vengeance of God vpon vs wilfully. For is it a small matter that it is sayd to vs, that the wilfull sorte must be wounded by Gods owne hand, namely bicause menne (asmuch as is possible) do desie him and will not yeeld vnto him when he is so fauourable to them as to warne them, and giueth them an enterance vnto him? And in good soothe, when menne checke at God in that wise, is it not an open defying of him? Is it not a treading of his grace vnder foote? But God cannot away with such spitefulnesse: for (in his Prophete Esay) he sweareth by his owne maiestie, that when menne make a scorning and say, lette vs eate and drinke when God calleth them to repētance: it is a sinne that shall neuer be blotted out. Beholde I say, God is so displeasid with that sinne, as hee sweareth that hee will beare it in remembrance for euer. So much the more therefore ought it to prouoke vs to humble our selues, when God giueth vs any forewarning: assuring our selues that he procureth our welfare in that behalf, to the end we should not shake off his yoke when he intendeth to lay it vpon vs, nor beate backe the strokes of his roddes which hee giueth vs, as though he smote vpon a Stith. And it is sayd expresly, that such as giue no care vnto God shall die without knowledge, that is to say, their owne folly shall vndo them. This is sayd to the end that men should be left without excuse. True it is that wee will sheeld our selues with ignorance when we go about to qualifie our faults, or else to wipe them quite away. VVee will say, I thought no such thing, I wist not of it. But let vs learne to know that when any mention is made of mens ignorāce: it is to condemne them the more bicause they played the beasts and had no reason at all in them. And euen so doth the Prophet Esay speake thereof. The very cause (sayeth the Lord) why Heil is open, and why the graue swalloweth vp all things, and why all my people are consumed, is for that they had no knowledge. God complayneth there of the sinners for casting themselues wilfully into destruction: and therewithall sayeth that that befell them for want of knowledge: yea but immediatly he vpraydeth the Jewes that they were become brutish. For the Lorde on his behalf doth sufficiently warne vs, that it is long of none but of our selues that we be not well taught. Truly God is a good scholemayster, but we be ill scholars. God speaketh to vs, & we be deafe: or els we stoppe our eares to the intent we would not heare him. So then, the ignorance whereof Eliu speaketh here, is wilfull, bicause men cannot finde in their hearts that God should poynt them their lesson, or teach them to come vnto him, but had leuer to folow continually the common trace, and therefore shet their eyes & stop their eares. Thus ye see an ignorāce that is ful of wilfulnesse and stubbornnesse. Now it is true that for a time the wicked do like well of themselves when they feele not Gods hande. Howbeit it is so much the worse for them, as wee see examples of it day by day. If a man speake to these vnturists that are giuen to aughtinesse, and threaten them with Gods vengeance: they do but nodde their head at it, & make a mocke at it, bearing themselves in hand that it is but a sporting matter. Againe, they take sermons in scorne, and turne all the holy Scripture into skofing, to the ende it should haue no more reuerence nor authoritie. VVe see this before our eyes. Howbeit, they do alwayes impayre their case: for surely this saying shal not fall to the ground, namely that whosoever will not heare God in affliction, must needs perish without knowledge: that is to say, the ignorance wherein he is ouersotted must cause him to haue the greater fall, and plundge him the deeper in Gods curse. Now sith we see this, let vs learne to be teachable: and assoone as God speaketh, let vs giue eare to him and be ready to submit our selues to his woord, and let nothing hinder vs from returning vnto him. This is the thing which we be taught in this sentēce. And surely our own nature would otherwise alwayes egge vs to striue against him, as it is sayd here. Furthermore here appeareth mēs foolishnesse, in that although they will not be counted fooles and vnduized: yet they labour to excuze themselves by follie and ignorance, when it cometh to the making of their account afore God. But all this shal not auayle them at al. And therefore it stādeth vs the more in hand to labour for humilitie betimes, and to resort to this comfort that God giueth vs when he sayeth, that hee teacheth vs by double meanes. For on the one side he maketh his woord to be preached vnto vs: & on the other side he beateth vs with his roddes, to the end that euery of vs in his own behalfe should be moued to returne into the right way. Therefore let vs haue our eares open to receyue the doctrine that is set afore vs in the name of God, to the end he speake not to deaf folkes, or as it were to blockes of wood. And therewithall also let vs be pacient, to abide the afflictions that he shall send vs: & when any thing falleth not out to our liking, let vs not therfore cease to magnifie God and his grace still, assuring our selues that by that meanes he maketh vs to feele our sins, to the intent we should not be so saped in them as to perish. Ye see then that vnlesse wee will spite God wilfully after we haue heard his woord, it behoueth vs also to vnderstand what he intendeth by his chastizing of vs, and by sending of aduersities vpon vs, on which side so euer they come: for there shall neuer happen vs any thing but at his hand. By and by Eliu addeth, that the Hypocrites of heart do put too wrath, and that they crie not when they be bound: that their soules shall die in youth, and that they shall perish with the vborne mongers. He sayeth Hypocrites of heart: and why doth he terme them so? He meeneth those that are imbrued with naughtinesse, and haue a backenooke to shrinke into from God, and cannot be drawne to any soundnesse. For wee shall see many poore soules that sinne through oversight, bicause they be vnconstant, so as they bee easly thrust out of the way, and yet there is no malicious nor rooted wilful stubbornnesse in them. But there are other some which are Hypocrites of heart, that is to say, which haue in them the roote of contēpt & of all stubbornnesse, so as they mocke God and haue no reuerence of his woord, but the Diuell hath so bewitched them, that they condemne the good & follow the euil, or at leastwise allow it, & could find in their harts harts to delight in it & to feede it Therefore let vs marke well that whereas Elia speaketh here of hypocrites of hart: he meeneth such as are so wholly giuen ouer vnto Satan, that they not only sinne through ouersight, but are so wholly framed vnto euill, as that they be fully bent (as they say) to doing of mischief and to mocke God: and of such maner of mē there are to many exāples to be seene. For if a man cōpare those that are vnconstant and offend through frayltie, with the wicked & the despizers of god: the number of the wicked will be far the greater. And so let vs marke, that it is not without cause that Eliu calleth them hypocrites of heart, or frowardharted, that is to say, vtterly giuē to extreeme naughtinesse & maliciousnesse, so as they will not in their aduersities by any meanes submit themselves vnto God, but rather do put to wrath. And let vs marke wel this saying of putting to wrath: for it is as much as to kindle the fire still more and more, and to throw wood into it to increase it. And in good sooth, what do the froward forte when they striue and stomacke agaynst God in that wise? Do they amend their cace and state? Alas, they do but heape vp wood more and more, and the wrath of God muste needes burne the whotter. So then let vs marke, that if we resist Gods chastizemēts, thinking to beate them backe by our wilfulnesse & frowardnesse: we shall but increace wrath, and Gods curse shall augment more and more, till we be vtterly cōsumed by it. Now whē we heare this, what haue we to do but to pray God, firste to purge vs in such wise, as wee may not haue the sayd rooted stubbornnesse and priuie spitefulness in vs: but that although we haue done amisse through infirmitie, yet there may alwayes bee some roote of the feare of god in vs, so as we become not vtterly past amēdment. Also let vs euer indeuer to inure our selues to the sayd sobernesse and singlenesse of hart, to the end we be not so snarled in our sinnes, as to like well of them and to foster them. And moreouer let vs marke well, that if wee will worke wyles & pollicies with God, our market shall not be amended awhit by it, but we shall rather increace his wrath towards vs. Ye see then that mē ought to looke well to the amēding of their euill doings, seing that Gods curse shall be so increaced vpo them. And here is expresse mention made of the increacing of Gods wrath, bicause men thinke themselves to be scaped, whē God hath deliuered them frō some one mischaunce, for then they thinke all the worst is past. But wee thinke not vpon the meanes that are hidden from vs, namely that God will anon after bring foorth new rodde, that he will draw new swordes, and that he will suddenly thunder vpo vs when we looke not for it. For asmuch then as wee are not sufficiently a-fraid of Gods wrath: therefore it is purposely sayd that the same increaceth, and that we heape it more and more vpo vs: in so much that a hundred thousand deaths must needes wayte vpon vs, when we shall haue despysed the message which God sent vs to bring vs backe againe and to guide vs into the right way. Therefore when we shall haue despysed Gods warnings after that sort, we must be fayne to feele his horrible vengeance vpon vs, whereas otherwise he protesteth that he is alwayes ready to cōforte such as submit themselves willingly to his good wil.

Esay. 1. b. 5.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgemēt of our faults, praying him that his correctiōg of vs and our feeling of his stripes may not be in vayne, but that we may learne thereby to returne vnto him, so as we may not tarie tū. he shewe vs some signe of his wrath, but that for asmuch as wee be dayly allured by his word. (& that after so louing and gentle a fashiō as we see,) we may not grow hardharted, but rather giue diligēt care to that which he shall say, that wee may preuent his iudgement: and that whensoever he listeth to execute any rigour vpon vs for our sinnes, wee may not therefore cease to haue an eye continually to his promisse, and to hope that after he hath made vs to feele our owne miseries, he will deliuer vs from them, namely vpon condition that wee learne to be forie for them and to forsake them. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and nacions of the earth, &c.

15. He setteth aside the poore in their affliction, and openeth their eares in their oppression.
16. Truly he would plucke thee out of the mouth of distresse & set thee in a large place, vwhere there should be no stryghtnesse: and thereste of thy table should be full of fat.
17. Thou haste filled the iudgement of the vicked: but yet shall iudgement and iustice holde out.
18. For behold the vvrath, to the ende that he destroy thee not vvith tūne abilitie, and that the multitude of giftes deliuer thee not.
19. He vvill not regard thy greatnesse, nor all thy prouision, nor all thy force.

WE haue seene heretofore, that men gayne nothing by struing agaynst God, but rather impayre their cace. For their hardhartednesse increaceth Gods vengeance, and kindleth the fire of it more and more. And now moreouer it is sayd for a conclusion, that such as wil needes play the rebelles after that maner against God, shall dye in the storme of their youth and with the rebornongers: as if a man should say in our common language, looke vpon yonder viie ribaulde, he will be hanged. Euen so is it sayd that the despizers of God shall die with all their strength. For when they see theselues at their ease, they be full of fiercenesse & pryde: but yet shall God consume them well ynough. And Eliu doth new againe set downe that which he had sayd afore: namely, that God openeth the eares of those whom he afflictesh. And not without cause is this repeted forasmuch as it is hard to make mē beleue it, & yet notwithstanding we may well cōsider that this doctrine is more than necessary for vs. For afflictions are hard and cōbersome to vs, in so much that we chafe & fret and cannot abide Gods hand: but rather thinke he doth vs wrōg, bycause we know not the fruite that commeth of it. Therefore it cannot be told vs to oft, that God openeth mēs eares when he afflicteth thē: and for the same cause it is sayd also, that God setteth them aside [or shoeth thē out] in affliction. True it is that some translate it Deliuere, according also as it is taken in that sense. Howbeit it is not ment here that God taketh them out of their affliction, but it is sette downe in [or by] affliction. So then it is a similitude that Eliu vscth: as it hee shoulde say, that God shoeth out and gathereth to himselfe those whom he chastizeth, bycause that when menne are in prosperitie, they wander and dote in their owne imaginacions: but as soone as God layeth his hand vpon them, and maketh them to feele his rigor: it is all one as if he should take them aside to himselfe, to shew them their faults, and to bring them to repentance. Now we see in effect what Eliu ment to say. And let vs marke well, that the opening of mens eares by affliction, is by cause that whyle wee liue in ease and pleasure, our eyes are blindfolded, according as the Psalmes sayeth, that when men are in prosperitie, their eyes stroute with fatnesse, so as they see not a whit: and therefore they be vterly sotted in their sinnes. Also wee haue our eares stopped in prosperitie, and cannot heare a whit: and therefore our Lord had neede to open them with afflictions. Truly this doctrine is sufficiently proued by common experience, and we neede not to seeke any exposition of it as of a darke thing. For we see that such as are not pinched with any aduersitie, cannot away with any correction. As soone as they are but spoken too, they are in a chafe: and this is to be seene not only in euery seuerall person, but also in the whole bodie of a realme. So long as there is no warre, pestilence, nor famine: we see that if men be rebuked for their sinnes, they murmur at it, and there is nothing but resistance with tooth and nayle. And why so? As I haue sayde, it is bicause mens eares are stopped with fatnesse, and cannot abide that God should in any wise tell them of their sinnes. Or else if men be not so proude as to strise agaynst admonishments: yet shall it litle auayle to speake to them, it is to no purpose to finde fault with them, they passe not for it. Why so? For euery man is full fraught aforeshande with his owne delightes and pleasures. To be shorte, wee be neuer touched, till Gods hande nippe vs by chastizing vs. And that is the cause why so many calamities happen to the worlde. For in asmuch as men giue no eare vnto God, ne make any account of his woord, longer than he vserh force of hand agaynst them: when he seeth them so puffed vp with pryde, and that he can not otherwise weeld them: he tammeth and subdueth folke by mayne force. And yet the same is not ynough at all times: for how many are there to be scene, which resist Gods hand of wilfull stubbornnesse, and continue alwayes hardharted, so as they growe woortie and worse when they feele the strypes? And this is too common a thing. But in this place it is precisely spoken of those to whom God intendeth to shewe fauour. For in afflicting men, he ameth at twoo endes. As for the reprobates, he purposeth to make them vnexcusable: and as for the godly, hee intendeth to tame them in such wise, as they may returne to him with a lowly mind. So then, in this sentence there is no mention made, but of such as God will not suffer to perishe, and for that cause doth he chastize them. Nowe if it be needefull that God should worke so towards his chozen: what had he neede to do generally to all mankind? Here is no mention made but of those whom God knoweth and auoweth for his children, and whose saluation he intendeth to procure by gouerning them with his holy spirit: and yet notwithstanding, euen they should haue their eares stopped, and they should be sotted in their owne pleasures, if God drewe them not to himselfe by afflictions. Therefore let vs learne here, that there is a horrible frowardnesse in our nature. Furthermore although our Lord haue touched vs, so as we haue some good will & desire to come to him: yet let vs be sure that we haue still neede of this help, namely that our Lord should pricke vs and spurte vs foreward, and by all meanes possible subdue vs to him. And it standeth vs in hand to serue our owne turnes with all the troubles & aduersities that he sendeth vs, so as we may apply them to the sayde vs, assuring our selues that there would be nothing but rebellion in our flesh, if it were not subdewed after that maner. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in minde. Furthermore lette vs learne, not to be stubborne against God when he afflicteth vs: but seeing wee know that his intent is to open our eares: let vs pray him that our afflictions may so auayle and profit vs, as we may come vnto him, and he make vs to go foreward still in the good way when he hath once brought vs into it. And to bring that to passe, let vs learne not to gad after our own lustes, as wee see most men do, who are caried away, and when God calleth them to him, runne from him, and can finde no way to come to him. Therefore let vs set our selues aside, that is too say, lette vs as it were bee gathered vnto God, and not be so sotted in our owne vanities and wicked affections, as wee see our selues to much giuen too them. Thus ye see in effect what wee haue to remember in this sentence. Nowe hee addeth immediatly, that God will plucke a man from the brim (it is properly from the mouth) of anguish and affliction, and set him in a large place where he shall bee no more in distresse, and the rest of his table shall be full of fatte. The woord Rest may be taken as wel for the things that are set vpon the table, so as it shall bee furnished with all good things: as also for the ease and quietnesse that shall be at the table. And this is purposely spoken vnto Job, bicause he had felt Gods bountifullnesse: and doubtlesse Eliu vpbraydeth him with his vnthankfulnessse. Come on (sayth he) hast thou not knowne heretofore that God made thee to prosper? VVhence came all the riches which thou diddest possesse, but of the bounteousnesse which God shewed towards thee? And surely he would still shew himselfe the same, if thou wart meete to be hadled so gently at his hand. It is certayne then that he would go through as he began: but thou hast persecuted the iudgement of the wicked. Thou seeest then that thou canst not abide that God should do thee good. Now it is true that Job is accused partly wrongfully. Neuerthelesse it is not without cause that Eliu condemneth him for grudging against God, and telleth him that iudgement and iustice shall hold out, notwithstanding all his murmuring. In the meane whyle, wee may gather a god lesson out of this veise: which is, that whē God scourgeth vs, we must cal to minde the good that he hath done vs, to the end we be not troubled, but consider that the chastizemēt of his hand are not done without cause. And that is the poynt also wherevnto Dauid bringeth vs: for after that God had exalted him to the seate of the kingdome, and giuen him so many victories agaynst his enemies: whē he came to be extremely afflicted, and it seemed that he should be vterly ouerwhelmed: he acknowledged that for asmuch as we be Gods creatures, it behoueth vs to be in his had, that he may dispose of vs at his pleasure, and wee must beare patiently the chastizemēt which he sendeth. Therefore let vs learne to apply this sentence to our instructiō, so as when we be beate with Gods roddes, we may call to minde what benefites he hath bestowed vpon vs, to the ende wee may yeeld our selues wholly to his will, and acknowledge it to be good reason that hee should turne vs to and fro at his pleasure. And therewithall, this remēbring wil also serue to asswage our griefes: for if we had neuer felt other than rigor at Gods had, we would be so far out of pacience in our afflictions, as wee should haue no heart to call vpon God, or to flee to him for refuge. But when wee knowe that hee hath shewed himselfe a father towards vs, and drawne vs to him by gentlenesse: then maketh he vs to feele, that suche as trust in him and suffer themselves to be gouerned by his hande, are happie. Thus ye see what giueth vs courage and comfort, euen in the middes of all our troubles. And therefore let vs marke well,

2. Sam. 15. f.

well, that when wee be pinched with aduersities and afflictions, the things that wee feele presently muste not so amaze our wittes, that we should not thinke vpon Gods goodnesse, and vpon the comforts that he hath giuen vs. For it were a goulfe of hell to thinke vpon nothing but our present chastizements. VVhat then? Lette vs mingle Gods goodnesse with his rigour. Haue we receyued good at Gods hand? Then lette vs not ceasse to flee vnto him when he afflicteth vs, hoping that he will bring our troubles to a good end, seing he hath made vs to feele already by experience, that such as do so referre themselues vnto him, do finde him a good and pitifull father. Thus yee see what the holy Ghost ment to teache vs here by the mouth of Eliu. Nowe let vs come to the verse where it is sayde, that Iob had fulfilled the iudgement of the wicked. True it is that these woordes may also be taken, as though it were sayd, that he had filled iustice and iudgement, with the iudgements of iniquitie. But the true meening is, that Iob had ouershot himselfe so farre, as to cupple himselfe with wicked men. Neuerthelesse, this is not ment of his life, as though he had bene a theefe, a whoremonger, or a murtherer, or as though he had bene a blasphemor or a looce liuer: Eliu ment none of all those things: but the meening is, that Iob had not glorified God in his aduersities, but had repyned to much against him, yea and had gone aboute to exalte himselfe, as though God had done him wrong, and vsed crueltie towards him. Thus yee see wherein Iob is condemned here. Not that he had led a leude life: but for that he had not borne his aduersitie paciently ynough. And that is called a fulfilling of the iudgement of the wicked, that is to say, an agreeing to their fashions and enormities. For wee haue also to note, that nothing is more precious vnto God, than the glorie of his owne name. True it is, that when menne giue themselues, some to whoredome, some to outrage, and some to gluttonie: therein Gods iustice is impeached, and the order that hee hath set among vs is peruerted and broken: and (as much as in vs lieth) Gods maiestie is alwayes defaced. But yet notwithstanding, when a man blasphemeth God openly, and humbleth not himselfe vnder his hand: no doubt but it exceedeth all other sinnes, and is to be condemned more grieuouly. Therefore wee ought to marke well this streyne, where Iob is vpbayded with fulfilling the iudgement of the wicked. Now, that we may take the more profite of this sentence: it behoueth vs to marke firste of all, that as soone as a man steppeth out of the way, streytwayes he beginneth to intagle himself with the wicked, and (as much as he can) bereeueth himself of Gods grace. Howbeit we stumble not so grossly at the first brunt. For it will seeme vnto vs that the faultes bee but meane. But in the end we runne so farre as to blaspheme God, and to despize him in such sort, as the very Diuell himselfe shall stirre vs agaynst him, and we shall be inflamed as it were with a rage or madnesse to spite him, and that cannot be done but to our destruction. Lo what befalleth vnto men. But as for Iob, it was not so with him. For he had liued so holily, that he was as a mirrour of angelical perfectiō. VVe haue seene what he hath protested heretofore: namely how he had bene the defender of the fatherlesse, the maynteyner of the widowes, the eye of the blinde, the foote of the lame, that his table had bene free for al poore folkes to come vnto, that he had clothed the naked with the woull of his sheepe, & that he had not abused his credite to oppresse any body withall, although he had the world at will, and might haue done many extortions. And yet notwithstanding we see he ouershot himselfe when Gods hand pressed him with such vehemencie. VVhat a thing is it then if we despite God wittingly and willingly, as I tolde you euen now* that when men steppe out of the way, forthwith (as much as in them is) they separate themselues from God, and take the high way to cast themselues into Satans snares? I therefore let vs take good heede to our selues, and though we haue liued neuer so rightuouly: let vs be sure that if wee be not hilde still by the grace of God and by his holy spirit, we shall soone giue him the slip, in somuch that wee shall be as good as giuen ouer, euen in the turning of a hand. And if there be such frayltie in vs that wee may so soone fall into euill: what shall become of vs when wee shall haue gone forward & continued a long time in prouoking Gods wrath, and (as much as lay in vs) quite quenched the light of his holy spirit? VVherefore let vs bethinke vs well to walke in such feare, that vpon knowledge of our owne feeblenesse, wee may not be blinded with any presumption, but rather pray God to guyde vs and hold vs with his mightie hand, and not suffer vs in any wise to fall: And that if he happen to suffer vs to swarue, he neuerthelesse so hold vs vp, as we may not come to the full poynt of iniquitie, but that as soone as we shall haue done amisse, we may by and by be sorte, and flee to his mercie. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in this verse. And that we may be hild the better in the feare of God: lette vs marke well, how Eliu addeth, that iudgement and iustice shall hold on still. As if he should say, that men may well play the mad bedlems, but yet shall God continue still in his full state, and in the end (of force) become their iudge. Though men aduance themselues neuer somuch, yet shall they not for all that come vnto the maiestie of God. VVe may well take counsell agaynst him: but we shall neuer attayne so high. And although we could plucke the Sunne out of the skie: yet could we not touch God. Therefore let vs learne, that here men are warned, not to skirmish agaynst God as they are wont too do, as though they were able to ouermatch him and to get the vpper hand of him: for we know that (as it is told vs here) iudgement & iustice shal hold their owne still. Now that we see the intent of Eliu, lette vs apply his sayings to our vse. I haue told you already, that men make no boanes at all to pleade agaynst God. And why so? For they measure him by the knowledge that they haue of themselues, and conceyue not the infinite maiestie that is in him: for that would soone dash all their prittleprattle. And therefore whosoever we be tempted to set our selues agaynst God, and to grudge agaynst his iustice: let it come to our remembrance, to thinke what we shall gayne by it. For yet shall iudgemēt and iustice hold out still: that is to say, we cannot let that God should not reigne, nother can we further our deuce at al agaynst him. So then, seing that Gods iustice is infinite, and that his iudgements shall continue euermore in full strength & force: what remayneth for vs to do, but to shrinke in our heads, & to submit our selues wholly vnto him? Thus is it that we haue to beare in minde, if we purpose to receyue good instructiō of this text. And lette vs not beguyle our selues with vayne presumption, as we see that most men beare their own eyes wittully: but let vs yeelde God his duectie, that is to wit a rightuoufnesse that cannot be diminished by vs, and a iustice which wee cannot by any meanes preiudice.

60 VVhen wee haue once concluded that: then shall wee be more aduised and sober than we haue bene wont to be, and wee shall not haue our tunges filed to plead with God, but wee shall with all humilitie acknowledge our faultes, and be sory that wee haue offended him. And if wee be in trouble: wee shall perceyue that it is for our behoote to be chastized at his hande, and that that schoole is passing profitable for vs, considering that we herken not to his woorde, except hee driue vs thereto as it were by force.

Thus yee see what we haue to remember concerning this lesson. Now it is sayd, that his being angrie, is to the ende that aman should not be confounded in his abilitie: for there (sayeth he) there were no remedie: he will not passe for golde nor for siluer, nor for all the force of the world. Lo here a goodly confirmation of that which we haue touched already: that is to wit, that Gods causing of vs to feele his wrath, is to the end wee should not be vtterly destroyed: for if he spare vs, wee do nothing else but harden more and more. VVhen men haue once stepped awry, and God beareth with them: the more that he forbearth them, the more do they grow brutish. For although that in vsing gentlenesse towards vs, his intent is to winne vs by that meane: yet notwithstanding our nature is so froward, that in steade of comming to him, we drage still from him. To be short, we see it is to common a thing among men, to dally with God when he vseth them gently, and to do nothing else but mocke at his goodnesse and patience. For asmuch as it is so, God must needs vtter his wrath, or else we should all of vs perish, and his long forbearing of vs would be an augmenting of our damnation. And that is it which Sainct Paule meeneth when he sayeth, that Gods afflicting of vs is to the end we should not perish with the world. Therefore it behoueth vs to be of good comfort in the middes of our troubles, seeing that God hath a regard of our saluation, and procureth the same by shewing himselfe rough towards vs. For we cannot abide that he should be a louing father to vs, and that he should handle vs tenderly: wee abuse his goodnesse continually: and therefore he is fayne to make vs feele his displeasure, or else wee should vtterly perishe. This is it in effect which Eliu ment to say. Nowe, were this well put in vre, truely it would be no payne to vs to blisse Gods name in our adueritie. In steade that wee gnash our teeth, and euery of vs stor neth and thinketh that God doth vs wrong, or else conceyue such bitterness as our hearts are shet vp, and we cannot consider our finnes: wee should bee gentle and meeke, and take pleasure in the minding of Gods gracious goodnesse. But what? Although we confesse this doctrine to be true: yet when it cometh to the putting of it in vre, we shew full well that we haue quite forgotten it. Yet notwithstanding it is not without cause that the holy Ghost doth so often lay afor vs and bring to our remembrance, that Gods shewing of himselfe angrie with vs, is bicause he loueth vs, and that if he should alwayes shew vs a louing countenance, it woulde ouerflowe vs and destroy vs. Therefore it behoueth vs to feele his anger effectually. Neuerthelesse, the same is a record of his goodnesse, and a meane whereby he calleth vs to him, to the intent wee should not follow the way of destruction whereinto we were entred. Lo how wee ought to be put in minde of the ende and marke whereat God ameth when he scourgeth vs. Herein shall wee be warned once agayne, howe stubborne our nature is. Is it not a shame that whereas he would handie vs gently, and as it were dandle vs in his lappe, we spurne at him with our feete, and scratch him, and (to be shorte) cannot away with such goodnesse and gentlenesse, which he would be readie to vse continually towards vs? Is it not to be sayd that we be of too slauish and charlish a nature? Truely the Scripture auoucheth, that it is Gods nature to be gentle, long suffering and louing, to beare with the weake, and to shewe mercie although men haue offended him. Seing it is so: surely he transformeth himselfe, and after a fort followeth not his owne nature, when he chastizeth vs and sheweth himself hard and sharpe towards vs. Neuerthelesse he is fayoe to vse such roughnesse by reason of our wilful stubborn-nesse, bicause we be wilde beasts, and sling so farre out of square, that when as he would gather vs gently home to himself, we fall by and by to biting of him and to kicking agaynst him. Therefore it behoueth vs to thinke vpon our owne frowardnesse as oft as God vseth any rigour towards vs. And therewithall wee must also take comfort in our aduersties, for asmuch as wee see that God doth neuer forget his mercie, in somuch that euen when he seemeth full minded to taunder downe vpon vs, as hee striketh vs with his one hande, so he setteth vs vp agayne with the other: and if he send vs to the graue, it is to lift vs vp afterward aboute the heauens. Seing then that God doth in the middes of his anger shew vs his goodnesse & yelde vs record of it: haue wee not wherewith to comfort our selues in him? And this comfort ought out of hand to ingender quietnesse of conscience. If we be afraid of Gods rigour, and thinke that he will destroy vs: then is it vnpossible that we should be pacient. Contrarywise also seing that God sheweth vs that he is not minded to destroy vs vtterly, but that he is a father to vs if we flee to him for refuge, and repayre to him with humilitie: the same ought to rid our hearts from all rebelliousnesse and bitterness, and make vs to submit our selues to his obedience, so as wee may say, Lorde, sith thou art so good to mee, suffer me not to strue agaynst thy hand, specially seing it is so fatherly. Thus ye see, that to the end we may be comforted in our afflictions, it behoueth vs to yelde our selues in subiection vnto God, that he may gouerne vs, and to thinke well of his iustice, to the ende that wee kindle not the fire of his wrath more and more through our rebelliousnesse, as hath bene sayde of it afore. And this is sayd purposely: to the end that God do not vtterly ouerthrow him and consume him with his abilitie. This serueth to abate mens pryde in that they will needes strengthen themselves continually agaynst Gods hand. And for that cause Eliu addeth, that there shall be no ransoming: for we may well bring great presents, but yet shall nether gold nor siluer be able to deliuer vs from the hand of God: but rather the same shall be an occasion to destroy vs. And here wee must vnderstand, that God intendeth to abate mens aduancing of themselves agaynst him. For if one man be riche, another in good credite, and a third in good estimation and woorthip: wee make bulwarkes of these things agaynst God, & we thinke our selues well ynough fenced to withstand his hande. Or if wee haue not that foolish conceyte: yet will there alwayes bee some blockishnesse in vs. For vntill such time as men be brought to nothing, so as they knowe there is nother strength nor ought els in them: they thinke themselves able to withstand God. VVhat is to be done then? Let vs learne that all our abilitie is lesse than nothing, specially when wee haue to deale with our God, for he will do no more but blowe vpon it. VVee may well gather together all the strength in the worlde, not onely which might be in any one man, yea though he were the strongest that euer was: but also all the strength that is in all creatures aboute and beneath: and yet shall it be nothing woorth at all if wee haue the hand of God agaynst vs. And therefore lette vs marke well, that if we wil humble our selues before God, we must dispatch away all vayne presumptuousnesse, and not thinke wee haue any thing remayning in vs: in so much that although we think we haue some courage and strength in vs for a time, yet it behoueth vs to know that all the same is but a smoke, if it please God to consume vs. And therevpon let vs returne vnto God, praying him to giue vs abilitie by his power, that is to say, to make vs to rest alwayes vpon him, knowing that wee hold our life and all the appurtenances thereof, of his onely free goodnesse.

nesse. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne where it is sayd, that God will destroy men with their abilitie, and that they shall bee consumed notwithstanding all their strengtb. And whereas it is sayd that there shall be no ransoming: it serueth to expresse the better the thing that we come to say. For although all men graunt, that nother gold nor siluer are able to raunsome a man from the hand of God: yet we see that they fall asleepe in their riches, credit, and such other things. And when they haue graunted that they cannot withstand God: yet doo they make bulwarkes of them, as though they were able to beate backe all harmes, and so they fight agaynst God. How so? whence commeth such presumptuousnesse? Beholde, a worme of the earth, which is but carion and rottennesse, aduanceth it self agaynst God: & must not that needes be a horrible and more than beastly blockishnesse? Yes surely. Specially when a man is riche, so as he thinketh he hath l. wore not what to be esteemed for, or that hee would purchase himself estimatiō by vaūting himself so farre as to lift vp himselfe agaynst God: although he speake not one woorde, yet is he so doted, that he beareth himselfe in hand, that his gold and siluer are able to deliuer him. Then must wee not regard what men confesse with their mouthes: but wee muſte haue an eye to their doings, which giue a true prooffe of the sayde Diuelish pryde, namely of trusting in their gold and siluer, and that in steade of putting it to good vse, they gather such a pryde by meanes thereof, that they fall to iuiting agaynst God. Then seeing it is so: it behoueth vs to thinke well therevpon: for the holy Ghost vseth not here any superfluous speech. True it is that at the firſte biuie it may seeme needelesse to tell vs that God regarde th nother gold nor siluer. For who is he that knoweth not that? the very babes haue skill to say as much. Yea, but in the meane whyle, the wisest (that is too say, they that take themselves to be wyfest, and are so counted among men) are so blinded at euery turne, as they beare themselves in hand that they may be bought out with gold and siluer. For vnder colour of somewhat which they haue, for that men feare them and honour them: yee shall see them so befotted, as they take themselves no more to be mortall men. They thinke not that God can in one moment ouerthrow them: for if they beleued that, they should neuer haue the sayd diuelish pride of exalting themselves after that fashion agaynst God. Now sith it is so: lette vs learne to profite our selues better by Gods chastizements than we haue done. Furthermore although he smyte not vpon vs: yet let vs haue the wit to fare the better by the corrections which he sheweth before our eyes. For God vseth such goodnesse, as to teach vs by other mens harmes, and to set such chastizements before vs, as may serue to our instruction. Therefore let vs thinke vpon it, and not

aduance our selues agaynst him. Moreover, seeing we cannot bring any thing to redeme our selues out of his hand: let vs resort to the raunsome which he hath giuen vs in the persone of his owne sonne, accordinge vnto St. Peter telleth vs, that we be not bought with gold nor siluer, but with the precious blood of the vnspotted Lamb. Thus ye see that the poynt wherevnto we must come for the concluding of this text, is that after wee once know that we be bereft of all meanes to scape Gods hand, and that we should of necessitie be vterly consumed, but that he vseth pitie towards vs: wee must vnderstand that he hath giuen vs a good remedie, in that it pleased him to offer vp his onely Sonne in sacrifice for vs: for then were we fully raunsomed, and that is a sufficient discharge to put away all our faults, so as the Diuell shall not haue any interest in vs. For although we were ouerwhelmed with the infinite multitude of our finnes: yet notwithstanding if the blood of Iesus Christ answer for vs, it is a sufficient satisfaction for all our offences, and ynough to appease the wrath of God. Ye see then wherevnto our refuge must bee. But we cannot come to the blood of Iesus Christ, vntill wee be bereft of all statelincesse, as well past as to come. Past, to the ende wee may consider that wee should vterly perishe in our finnes, & be quite and cleane ouerwhelmed if God had not giuen vs this meane of being purged by the blood of his Sonne. And to come to the ende, we be no more caried away with such rage, as to lift vp our selues agaynst God, as though wee could scape his hand, but rather holde our selues in such awe, euen with a willing minde, as wee looke not that God should cheyne vs vp lyke wilde beastes, but as euery of vs may bridle himselfe of his owne accord. Let vs haue such modestie in vs, as not to attempt any thing agaynst him: but whensoever it shall please him to chastize vs, lette euery of vs thinke thus in himselfe: Go to, my God chastiseth mee for such a sinne, and after such a maner: and it behoueth mee to make my profite of it. Therefore let vs not be deafe when God warreth vs after that fashion: but let vs looke narrowly to our selues, and be watchfull according to the examples that he giueth vs, to the intent we growe not past grace, and so the thing befall vs which is spoken heretofore, namely that wee heape vp continually a greater wrath and a more horrible vengeance of God vpon vs.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our finnes praying him to giue vs such repentance of them, as we may resort wholly vnto him, to submit our selues fully to the guyding of his holy spirite, that wee may walke rightly according to his good will, in such wise as his name may be glorified in vs, all our life long. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heavenly father &c.

20. Consume not the night to roote out the people vnder them.
21. Keepe thee from turning to iniquitie, for thou hast chozen it rather than affliction.
22. Behold, God exaltech by his povver, vwho is like him to teache?
23. VVhom hath he set ouer him in his vwayes (or vwho bu. b overlooked him in his way?) vwho shall say vnto him, thou haste done amisse?
24. Remember thou to magnifie his vvorke vvhich men behold.

El knowe it is a good and profitable thing to thinke vpon Gods workes. And that also is the thing whence wee muste fetch all our learning and wisdom through our whole life. But specially in the night time when wee be alone by our selues, wee haue leyſure to be occupied in applying our mindes to that studie. For we overpasse the things that we see a day times: but in the night we thinke vpon them with more leyſure and settlednesse, and we comprehend them better. Neuerthelesse wee muste keepe a measure in musing vpon Gods workes. That is to wit, if they be to high for vs and passe the reache of our vnderstanding, wee muste stoppe there and glorifie him, specially when it pleaseth him too conceale the reason of his doings from vs. And that is the cause why he sayeth in the text, that we must not spend the night in musing to much how the people are rooted out vnder them. It is good to seeke how God rooteth out nacions, to the end to learne humilitie. For it behoueth vs to reason in this wise: namely that if God passe not to destroy a whole countrie and the inhabters thereof: what shall become of any one poore man? Shall one man be proude and thinke to haue an euerlasting state, when he seeth before his eyes that God sweepeth away a great multitude of people in the minute of an houre? Ye see then a profitable comparison. How? If God spare not a whole countrie when they haue offended him: what shall become of me in whom he knoweth an exceeding great number of sinnes? For I am but a wretched creature. Furthermore when wee shall haue muzed vpon such things, and now and then our mindes are troubled and amazed, by reason of fundry doubts that come in our heades, which we be not able to resolue: what haue we else to do, but to holde our selues within such sobrietie, as to reuerence Gods iudgements although we comprehend them not? Therefore it behoueth vs to take good heede to Gods workes: but yet must we beware that we ouershoot not our selues in making to long and deepe search of them. And that is the cause why we be forbidden in this text, to consume or swallow vp the night. Marke that for one poynt. And further let vs marke, that whereas it is sayd, that the people are rooted out vnder them: it is to magnifie Gods power the more, in that he causeth me to sinke as it were into a bottomlesse pitte in the same place that he shall haue given them to dwell in. If a whole nacion were driuen out before our eyes, and conueyed into some farre Coutrie, and continued still the same that it was: that were no matter to make vs too wonder so much. But when suddayne chaunges come in the world: it will seeme that God maketh men to melt away like snow. And in very deede we see that some Countrie hath bene very well peopled, and now at this day it is layde waste. VVhat is become of the inhabters? True it is that they be scattered here & there: but yet the remembrance of them is as it were razed out, forasmuch as a man cannot poynt them out to knowe where they are become. Thus yee see what is imported in this sentence, where it is sayd, that nacions shall be rooted out of their place, and as it were vnder their foote, as though the earth had opened and swallowed them vp, so as a man might not perceyue the print of their path. VVhen God worketh after that fashion, it is a wonderfuller thing, than if the people were remoued from place to place, and that it were seene how God dislodgeth a whole countrie too giue them a newe dwelling. And hereby we be warned, that in considering Gods iudgements, wee muste looke higher than our owne wittes can reach vnto: for that is the cause why we feare not God so much as we ought to do. Yet notwithstanding we diminishe not his power, in not fearing the highnesse that is in him, which ought too make vs afrayd. Therefore as oft as we set our mindes to the considering of Gods iudgements which he executeth in this world: let vs learne to consider with our selues, that it is to high a thing for vs, & that when we haue thoroughly thought vpon it, we must be faine to stop short, for our wittes reach not so far and wide. Besides this, here is also one other good admonition: which is, that God needeth not to vse the inferiour and visible meanes, if he list to consume vs: for when wee stand fastest, he can make vs melt away. The earth that beareth vs to day, shall fayle vs [to morrow]. Although we haue none enemy to assaile vs, and although God sende no great armies agaynst vs:

truly he needeth no more but to giue vs one angry looke, and we shall be consumed, yea euen without putting any hand vnto vs. He shall not neede to change our place, he shall not neede to remoue vs a farre off, hee shall not neede to cast vs downe to breake our neckes: for when we stand surest vpon our feete, and we seeme best able to hold our selues in good plight: euen then shall we soonest perish if God be agaynst vs, and no man shall bee able to rid vs from his hande. Seing that this is tolde vs, lette vs learne to humble our selues and not to haue any other foundation than the souerayne power from aboue. And forasmuch as God promiseth to reache vs his hand, let vs trust therevnto and referre our selues wholly vnto him, therewithall acknowledging our owne vanitie and vn-sufficiencie, to the end wee be not puffed vp with any presumption that maketh vs drunken. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to beare away in this verse. Now it is sayd immediatly, keepe thee from turning to iniquitie: for thou haste choozen it rather than affliction, or elle by cause of affliction: for the Hebrue woorde and maner of speache importeth both twayne. First & forme st Lob is warned here, that he should not turne vnto euill. And vnder that terme wee meane not cyther robbrie, or murder, or spitefulnesse, or such other like things: but we vnderstande the hartburnings agaynst God, and the grudgings and rebellings that proceede of impatiencie. The cause then why it is sayd that Lob must keepe himselfe from turning vnto euill, is for that he shewed not himselfe to bee pacient ynough in submitting himselfe vnto God, and in acknowledging his rightuousnesse during the time of his aduersitie. And it is purposely sayd vnto him, that he should stand vpon bis garde: for it is a harde thing too forbear falling, when we be pinched with aduersitie. Againe, looke what is sayd vnto Lob, ought to serue vs all. And so lette vs take this saying as an exhortation of the holy Ghosts to vs all in common, that we should be watchfull when we afflicted, so as we swarue not aside vnto euill. VVhat is the reason? For as soone as Gods hand toucheth vs, we be greeued out of measure, and there needeth no more to put vs out of pacience. Specially if the affliction be great and violent, then are we viterly dismayed, what stoutnesse soeuer there were in vs afore: and whereas a man would haue thought vs to be inuincible, we be quite out of hart, and wote not where to become. Seing then that there is such frayltie in vs, it standeth vs in hande to looke well to our selues, and to do our indeuer to holde fast that which is good. Yea verely: for although a man strayne himselfe to the vttermoste, yet shall he haue much a do to stand out, that hee stumble not by some meanes or other. Yet notwithstanding we haue cause to be of good cheere, for somuch as we see that the spirite of God considereth how harde our battels are. For if wee labour to keepe our selues from euill, lette vs not doubt but that God will holde vs vp euen when he seeth vs at the last cast. And if we holde on and inforce our selues therevnto, although there be feeblenesse in it, and that we do not our ductie to the full: yet will God accept the paynes that we indure and take them in good weorth. Behold the thing that ought to giue vs courage. But yet must we be diligent in that behalf, according to that which is shewed vs here. Therefore let vs not flatter our selues, but sticke to it that wee turne not aside vnto euill, that is to say, that we be not ouermuch greeued when God beateth vs with his rodde. I say, let vs labour to keepe our selues from struing agaynst him, that wee murmur not at his iustice. For (as we haue seene heretofore) it is extreeme wickednesse when men list vp themselves after that sort agaynst God, and are so stubborne as they cannot thinke well of his doings to glorifie him in the same. And although it appeare not to be such an euill in the iudgement of men: yet doth God esteeme it as a most heynous crime, and not without cause. VVherfore as oft as wee feele any aduersitie, let vs looke well to our selues, that we be quiet and submit our selues wholly vnto God. And that is the thing which Eliu sheweth more evidently when he addeth, that Iob had chozen euill rather than affliction, or by cause of affliction. Both these translations tend to one ende: which is, that Iob bare not his cace peafably with humbling of himselfe, but lifted vp himselfe agaynst God in his affliction, and considered not that it behoued him to haue stouped vnder the hande of him that hilde him in his power. If a man aske how Iob can be condemned of such sturdinesse, seing he is set before vs as a mirroure of pacientnesse: I haue answered that question already: namely that God accepted him for pacient. And certesse that vertue is commended in him, not onely by the record of mortall men, but also by the record of the holy Ghost. Yet notwithstanding that is no lette but that he had imperfection in him, and did amisse in some respect. Now if Iob hauing indeuered himselfe to be quiet that he might glorifie God, and knowe & publish his mightie power, was blamed neuerthelessse: I pray you what shall become of vs? if we make comparison betweene the pacientnesse that was in him, and the hartburnings and repinings that are in vs: we are so coy, that if God do but ticke vs with his little finger, we are by and by in a pelting chafe, and there is nothing else with vs but murmuring and spiting. Seing then that we be so farre of from the vertue of Iob: do we not deserue to be a hundred times more condemned than he? And therefore let vs vnderstand, first of all that although affliction be sent vs to tame vs withall: yet doth it stirre vs to rebelling agaynst God: not of it owne nature, but bicause of our sinfulnessse. VVhen God chastizeth vs, it is to the end to deale the better with vs: according as he sheweth vs our finnes, to the intent that in condemning them wee should seee to him for refuge, and hauing knowne him to be our iudge, beseech him of pardon and grace, & learne nomore to delight and sooth our selues in our vices. Thus ye see to what end God chastiseth vs. But we turne our afflictions to the contrary: for in steade of stouping vnder Gods hand, we do nothing but fret and grinde our teeth, and storne. To be shorte, wee cannot abide to be eyther poore or sicke, or to suffer any other miseries in this worlde, but wee would fayne that God should let vs alone in peace, yea and that he should gouerne vs after our owne fancie, and not do ought at all to our misliking. And so by reason of affliction we swarue aside vnto euil. Seing then that there is such a frowardnesse in vs, that the meanes which God ordeyneth to holde vs in awe vnder his obedience, are turned by vs to the cleane contrarie, in so much that they make vs to play the wilde beastes, and to chafe agaynst him, and to kicke agaynst the spurre: seing (I say) that there is such sinfulnessse in vs: lette vs learne to resist it as much as is possible. And seing that Iob, for all that he could do, is blamed here to haue chozen iniquitie in his affliction: let vs cōsider that the same will much more happen vnto vs, if we looke not well about vs. Furthermore whereas it is sayd, rather than affliction: (for that is the most conuenient and fit translation, notwithstanding that both of them (as I sayd) do come to one end): that maner of speaking hath a certayne grace in it, whereof wee may gather instruction. It is sayd then, that Iob choze iniquitie rather than affliction: And howe? VVhen a man chafeth agaynst God, doth he therefore scape his hand? No: but he holdeth not himselfe in his aray, for aduersitie ought to make vs to stoupe, but wee fight agaynst the hand of God. True it is that our so doing is in vayne, for wee shall bee disppoynted of all our hope, and wee shall gayne nothing by it: but yet for all that, as oft as we gnath our teeth after that maner agaynst God through impacience, our meaning is (if it were possible) to be no more subiect vnto God. And that is the cause why I sayd that this saying importeth a good doctrine. For if we perceyued thoroughly that all such as cannot yeeld meckely vnto aduersitie, are loth to be subiect vnto God, and could finde in their hearts to beste backe all his force: wee would abhorre impacientnesse much more than we do, yea and we would thinke it to be an intolerable blasphemie. Then if we sticke not to chafe and turmoyle when Gods hande is vpon vs: it is a token that we be not acquaynted with that which is sayd in this text, namely that all such as are vnpatient are loth to be subiect any more vnto God, and would fayne haue the soueraintie and authoritie abolished which he hath ouer them. This is a thing that ought to put vs in minde to be more pacient than we haue bene wont to be, whosoever it pleaseth our God to frame vs to humilitie. And after this Eliu addeth, That God exalteth by his power, and who is like him in teaching? or who is such a teacher as he? Orther some translate it, who is he that russeth or casteth forth as he doth? For the Hebrew woord betokeneth also to cast or throw. Neuerthelessse, the proesse of the text sheweth, that forasmuch as Gods wisdom is treated of here, it is better to take the woorde for to teach or to taske men to a lawe or doctrine, according as the woord betokeneth most commonly. Nowe then it behoueth vs to take this sentence after the first maner: which is, That God hath not his lyke in teaching. This is not referred simply to the woord of God, but also to the inward power which God vttereth, when it pleaseth him to touch vs to the quicke, and to perce our hearts in such wise as we come to him. Truly whensoever Gods woorde is preached, or when men reade the holy Scriptures, then is God our teacher, and it is he with whom we go to schoole, and it may wel be sayd that there is no teaching like vnto his. For when we shall haue bene taught by men all our life long: yet shall there be nothing but vanitie in vs, vntill we be grounded in the wisdom of God, bicause there is no substantialnesse, but there: all other things vanishe quite away. And in good faith, were the wise men of this worlde neuer so highly learned and sharpwitted: yet was their vnderstanding darkened continually with some cloudes, in somuch that there was no certaintie in them, but they were euer newe to seeke. As much is to be sayd of all such as are taught of men. Therefore it is a very true saying, that there is no teacher like vnto God: for we shall neuer be taught perfectly, till we haue knowne the woord of God. But Eliu proceedeth here yet further: that is to wit, that we be then taught of God, when it pleaseth him to touch our hearts inwardly by his holy spirite, and that hee woorketh after such a sort as wee know his maiestie and obey the same. But there is not that creature to be found, which can do that: that is the peculiar office of God and of his holy spirite, yea and he referreth it wholly to himselfe, and experience sheweth that he onely is woorthy of that prayse. For though we should reade the holy Scripture continually without ceasing, and that it were expounded to vs by men of excellent skill and great cunning: yet should all their labour be vnauayleable, and we shall profite nothing at all vntill God enlighten vs by his holy spirite, touch our hearts and soften them, perce our eares (as hath bene seene heretofore) and open our eyes, so as our hearts which are as hard as flint may be turned into flesh, and we bow vnto his obedience. Vntill such time as God do this: it shall be to no purpose for men to speake to vs, for all their teaching will slip and vanish away from vs, and yet shall neuer be able to take roote in our mindes. Therefore not without cause is it tolde vs here, that there is no teacher like vnto God. Furthermore this is not sayd, only to the ende wee should repayre vnto him to be rightly taught: but also to the end we should learne not to be selfwise in the discourses and imaginations which we conceyue. And why? For that were the next way to shet our selues out of the doore, that wee might not come to Gods schoole. 10 What is to be done then? let vs learne to be vtterly ignorant, till our Lord haue taught vs his will. And moreover let vs content our selues with the knowledge of that which we haue learned at his hande: and whatsoever else cometh in our head, let vs thrust it vnder foote, assuring our selues that it is euery whit of it but leasing and faisehood. Thus ye see what Eliu ment in this streyne. And that also is the cause why he sayeth, Behold, God exalteth or aduanceth by his power. Hereby he sheweth, that if God worke with vs, we must not go about to know the vttermost of all things that he doth, as we may trie the workes of men: for in as much as we haue them before our eyes, wee behold them and seeke euery corner of them, and also wee be able to handle them with our hands, and toASSESS them and turne them at our pleasure. It is not so with the workes of God. And why? For he exalteth in his power: that is to say, hee is wonderfull in his doings. Therefore men must not attempt nor preace so farre, as to search the vttermost of his doings, or to iudge at aduerture of them and to giue bridle to their rashnesse, when they comprehend not all that is in them. And why? Seing that Gods workes are so high, (as which do proceede of his infinite power,) it behoueth vs also to stay at them. For wee be couched here by lowe, there is a great distance betweene them and vs, and we cannot flie so high. Wherefore let vs holde vs contented with that which God sendeth, and suffer our selues to be gouerned by his holy spirite, and nother couet nor desire too knowe any thing, saue that which he shall haue shewed vs. To be short, let vs be his scholars, assuring our selues that all our wisdomes consisteth in bridling our owne fancies, so as they raunge not abroad. Nowe wee see what the meering of Eliu is. And therefore for the better confirming of the matter which I haue dealt with heretofore, let vs follow the sayd admonition. It hath bene sayde that it is a good thing to apply our minde to the considering of Gods workes, so be it that we deale soberly, acknowledging the steddemesse of our owne vnderstanding. Therefore whereas it is sayd, that God exalteth in his power: lette vs vnderstand that he intendeth not to let vs wander after our own liking. And therefore let vs not be so proude as to say, that his workes are to be esteemed as mens workes: but let vs assure our selues that he will haue men to magnifie them and to honour them. Furthermore for as much as wisdomes fayleth vs, and yet notwithstanding our fleshe tempteth and tickleth vs to be desirous to seeke more than is lawfull for vs to know: let vs beare in minde that there is none like God in teaching, & therefore that it behoueth vs to come to him, to the end that he may enlighten vs, and that our mindes may be gouerned by his hande and direction. 60 When we be taught in that schoole: we shall profite ynough in Gods workes, and therewithall wee shall haue wherewith to barre all our own curiosities. And vndoubtedly it behoueth vs to be alwayes watchfull, that we may restreine our selues. For although the faithfull be modest, and framed along while aforehande to receyue instruction at Gods hande: yet notwithstanding there are still some curiosities fluttering in their heads, so as they be haled away, and many imaginations come in their minds, causing them to say, why is this? and why is that? But let vs alwayes come backe to this cōclusion, that for somuch as we be not able to comprehend Gods woorkes, no nor any creature else is of power to do it: it behoueth vs to come vnto him, and hee muste not onely teach vs by his woorde, but also enlighten vs and order our thoughts, and bring vs vnder his lure, to hold vs fully in awe. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to remember in this sentence. Now it is sayd anon after, who shall ouersee him in his way? And who shall say to him, thou hast done amisse? or else, whom hath he set ouer him in his way? for the Hebrue woord signifieth to giue preeminence and lordship, and sometime to visite or oversee. Neuertheless the meening of Eliu is euident ynough: namely that it is not for mortal creatures to controll God, or to make search to finde fault with his doings, and to blame thē as though he were misaduised and knewe not howe to order things as they should be. This is the summe of that which is contayned here. Now to the intent wee may gather a more familiar doctrine of thi sentence: lette vs set it downe for a ground, that men muste be iudged by God, and that they haue not authoritie to be iudges ouer him. That is the thing which is shewed vs here by these woordes which Eliu vseth. Will wee then iudge God? It is high treason: for wee vsurpe that which is his. It is written that all knees shall bowe before him. And why? To come before his iudgement seate, as Sainct Paule declareth in the fouretenth to the Romanes. Seing then that God reserueth the iudging of vs to himselfe alone: what remayneth for vs to do, but to abstayne from that Diuelish boldnesse of desiring so to cōtroll him and to striue agaynst him, as though there were any fault to be found in his doings and hee were blameworthy, and that wee were of some better discretion and skill than he? Nowe were this well put in vre we should see another maner of modestie in men to like of God, and whereas blasphemies stush out of mens mouthes, wee should heare Gods prayes found euerywhere, so as there should be one agreeable melodie too magnifie his inestimable rightuousnesse, wisdomes, power, and goodnesse. But what? Although eueryman confesseth at the first blush that it is good reason that God shoulde worke after suche a maner as no man might aduance himselfe agaynst him: yet notwithstanding all men do it, and there are very fewe that can refrayne such pryde, when they see themselues inclined thereto by nature. Therefore it standeth vs the more in hand to holde fast the doctrine that is giuen vs here by Eliu, or rather by the holy Ghost: which is, that wee must be mindefull to magnifie Gods woorkes, yea euen those woorkes of his which are knowne to men. Now then, after that Eliu hath sayd that noman can reprove God in any of all his workes: he telleth vs that wee must remember to magnifie them. And why? For at length wee shall finde men to be conuincid by experience, that God doth not any thing but in all vprightnesse and equitie. Therefore lette vs consider it, that our mindes may be restrayned, to the end wee fall not to straying and to gadding ouer all the fields. And it behoueth vs to ioyne these two sentences together as they be matched here. The firste is, who is he that can say vnto God, thou hast done amisse? And the other is, That wee must remember to magnifie him. Truly moste men can well ynough presume so farre, [as too accuse God of misdealing:] and in very deede a man shall heare nothing but grudgings agaynst God: and although he be vpright in all poynts, yet do not menne cease to finde fault with him: but yet for all that they be not able too reach vnto him. And that is the cause why Eliu skorneth

that foolish ouerweening of theirs, in that he sayeth, that no man is able to charge God with any misdealing. Men may well spew out their blasphemies: but yet shall they vanish and shedde away like water, & in the meane while God shall continue in his perfect state still, and laugh such presumptuousnesse of menne to skorne, when they will needes rush after that maner against him. Then lette vs marke well, that such as hold not themselues in such modestie as I haue shewed that they ought to do, shall not auaile at all whē they haue replied neuer so much against God. And why? For he hath not set any persone ouer himselfe. Herein it is shewed vs that men are ouerfoolish and destitute of reason, when they dispute so against God: VVhy? for who hath set them in any such office? If a man should take vpon him to iudge those ouer whom he hath no authoritie, and to set taskes and tallages vpon them, and to giue sentence vpon their doings: would the world think well of such presumptuousnesse? would it not take such a man to be a starke foole? But wee bee farre more fond in lifting vp our selues against God. If a poore Begger should giue away Dukedomes and Lordships, and appoynt Iudges and Licutenants in a countrie: euery man would laugh him to skorne. But we do much more when wee take vpon vs to rule God and to giue him his lesson. And what a presumptuousnesse is that? If wee would take in hand to subdue all Princes to our lure, it were not so greate and furious statelinesse as this. Nowe then Eliu sheweth here, that if wee be tempted to iudge ouerhastily of Gods workes, and that our reason waxe to bolde and proude: we must come to this poynt to say, VVhat? when all things are throughly considered, is it meete for vs to looke vnto God to controll him, or to spie out his doings to finde faulte with them when they haue passed his hands? Haue we the ouersight of him? Is it for vs to examine his wayes? Then if wee be once fully resolued of that poynt, it will be ynough to barre all curious questions, and to hold vs in awe. For (to be short) it behoueth vs to conclude, that Gods shewing of his workes vnto vs, is to the end that we being vnder the, should looke vpon them and consider them. It is sayde here, who is he that shall ouersee [or ouerlook] him? This saying importeth much: for there are two sortes of looking vpon Gods woorkes. The one is when we perceyue our owne smalnesse, and acknowledging that wee do but creepe here by low, do lift vp our minds aloft by faith, asfuring our selues that wee be not able to comprehend so high and profoūd secrets, and (to be short) when with our sayth there is matched this lowlinesse of honoring the things that are vnknowne to vs. Thus yee see one good maner of looking vpon Gods workes: for it is vnder him. Therefore when we be so lowly and meekeharted, and hauing considered our owne measure, do lift vp our heads and cast vp our eyes, desiring reuerently to know what it pleaseth God to shew vs, and no more: then do we looke vpon Gods woorkes vnder him. But contrarywise it is sayd in this text, who is he that shall ouerlook him [or looke aboue him] in his wayes? Lo here a contrary way of looking, when men aduance themselues and mount about with their Ergoes and with a desire too ouerlook Gods workes as though the same were vnder them. But when they mount after that maner, they muste needes breake their neckes: for what maner of ladders haue they? Agayne, let vs labour asmuch as wee can in our vayne imaginations, and it is certayne that wee shall haue no fundation to beare vs vp. So then it is an vntoward and cursed fashion of looking vpon Gods workes, when menne steppe to him as though they would thrust all his doings, vnder their feete, and call him to account, and sit in iudge-ment vpon him as though they had superioritie to ouerrule him. Let vs keepe vs from such diuinish pride: for it is added as an appurtenance, that wee muste remember too magnifie Gods woorkes. And that is the second sentence, which I sayde was to bee matched with the other former one. But why is it sayde, that wee muste remember it? for it seemeth that Eliu might haue sayde at one woorde: Magnifie thou the workes of God: but he sayeth, Remember thou. VVhy so? For wee be willingly occupied about our owne wicked imaginations, which hinder vs from yeelding God his deserued and due glorie. And therefore it standeth vs in hande too quicken vp the remembrance of our minde, seing we be so forgetfull of God. As for example. VVhen wee should thinke vpon God, the first thing that will come to our thought, shall bee some illusion of Satans, to make vs fall in a rage, or to cast vs into despayre, or to snarle vs in some distrust, or else to make vs tumble into our destruction.

Yee see then that our wittes are ouerwrapped with such ignorance, as wee thinke not vpon God, and in the meane whyle Satan is wylie ynough too put some wicked fancie in our head, to turne vs away from God if it were possible for him. True it is that many menne know not what this meeneth: for they be vtterly blockish: but they that know it are warned to bethinke them of the disease that is rooted in all menne. And forasmuch as wee may bee tempted with wicked conceyts: therefore it is sayde that wee muste bethinke our selues, and not suffer God to bee as it were buried, but call too remembrance that which God himselfe hath printed in all menne, that is to wit, that the Creature muste not exalt himselfe agaynst his maker: and the same muste serue vs for a brydle too holde all our affections in captiuitie, and too thrust them vnderfooote, so as wee may say, wretched creature, where art thou? Commeth thou here to dispute agaynst thy God and to subdue him? Is it reason that thou shouldst take vpon thee to controll him, and make him too passe as it were vnder thy hand? what a malapertnesse is that? then if men enter into suche an examination of themselues: it will driue away all the lewde imaginations that come in their mindes, and are a hinderance too them to magnifie Gods woorkes as becommeth them. And therefore lette vs beware that the Diuell put no lewde conceyts in our heads, but lette vs warde them a farre of by magnifying Gods workes as they bee woorthie. And how shall wee magnifie them? not by iudging of them after our owne knowledge. No: but wee must honour them although they passe our reache: and although wee perceyue not the reason why they bee done, yet lette vs not cease to say, Lord thou art iust, righteous, and full of equitie.

Thus yee see that the thing wherein we must occupie our selues all the time of our life, is too knowe that the greatnesse and excellencie of Gods workes is such, as we cannot yeelde them such prayse as they deserue, without aduancing them aboue our selues. And Eliu also sayeth exprelly, that men know them, to do vs to wit, that when menne haue fought their fill agaynst God, (according as wee see that pryde alwayes in vs): yet in the end we must needes be ouercome. For God will peradventure suffer vs to inquire of him vnaduidedly: but when we haue so giuen the brydle to our foolish lustes, and Satan hath carried vs away in our fleshy affections: in the ende wee shall perceyue (howbeit all to late) that God is righteous, and that he shall continue so, spite of our teeth. So then seing that experience sheweth that Gods workes deserue all prayse, what is to be done? Shall wee take vpon vs to inquire of all his doings to the vttermost? let vs shunne that:

that: and let vs rather learne to honour him with all humilitie, and in so doing to yeeld him the rightuousnesse which he deserueth, and to confesse that his wisdom, his iustice, his goodnesse, and his mightinesse appeare in such wise in all his workes, as he must needs be knowne to be such a one as he is, that is to wit, a most louing father towards those that are his, and a iust iudge towards those whom he hath forsaken.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so too touch vs, as we may vterly condemne our selues before him, namely to the ende wee may be acquit through his mercie: & that therewithall it may also please him to remedie all the vices that are in vs, and so to clenze vs, as we may draw neerer and neerer to the heavenly life. And forasmuch as wee be so much inclined to pryde and presumption, as we cannot bow vnder him as were requisite: let vs pray him to graunt vs the grace to submit our selues to him with al humilitie & feare, so as we may be fit to receyue instrustio, both by his woord, & by his holy spirit, to the intent that in all poynts and all respects wee may yeeld him his dew honuour, and he guyde vs as obedient children vnder the government of their father. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, &c.

28. He maketh it to come from heauen, and it shreadeth dovvne vpon the multitude of men.
29. VVho can knovv the diuersitie of his Clovveds, and vvhat is the heape of his Tent?
30. He stretcheth out his light and couereth the rootes of the Sea.
31. By them doth he execute iustice vpon the people, and giue abundance vvherevvith too liue.
32. He clotheh his dry streames vvith the clovveds, and commaundeth them to go agaynst them.
33. His companion brings him tidings of strife, and there is anger in mounting vp.

We haue too beare in minde the matter that was glaunced at yesterday: namely howe it is shewed vs here, that although me would shet their eyes, yet can they not bring to passe that God shoulde not set himselfe afore them, and that his workes shoulde not be knowne to them. Herby wee be warned, that if any man know not God, the same cometh not of simple ignorance, but rather of stubborn-wilfulnesse, by cause he turneth away from him. For (as I haue sayde afore) Gods woorkes are to manifest vnto vs: they shew themselves euerywhere: and therefore we cannot be ignorant of them, except wee list our selues. In respect whereof it is sayde, That men behold them a farre of. For this similitude importeth, that they bee so excellent, and that there is such a greatnesse and maiestie in them, that although there bee a farre distance betweene them and vs, yet are wee able to see them. VVee knowe that if a man be farre off from vs, our eyesight will not resche thither, but it fadeth by the way: or if there bee a great Castle, it will seeme to be but a little cabban if wee looke at it a farre of: and a whole Towne will seeme to be but a twoo or three houses. Thus doth farre distance diminish the outward appearance of things, which are great when wee see them neere at hand: VVe haue experience ynough of it in the Sunne. For it seemeth to be scarcely twoo foote broad: and yet notwithstanding if a man know the reason, and the things which the Philosophers and those that are acquaynted with the secretes of nature do shewe, hee shall perceyue that the Sunne is much greater than the whole earth. And here it is sayd expressly, that men beholde Gods woorkes a farre of. How farre of? So farre, as our eyesight must needs be vterly dazed. But yet as farre of as it is, wee perceyue howe God woorketh: and therefore it foloweth that there is such a maiestie in Gods woorkes, as wee ought of duetie to honour him therein. Nowe then lette vs marke, that such as glorifie not God as they should do, cannot cloke themselves with ignorance: for it is but a vayne couert, by cause his woorkes cannot but be knowne vnto them. In so much that if wee alledge that our eyesight is too weake, and that Gods woorking is too high for vs: it is to be replied, that although Gods woorkes be not nigh vs, yet wee ceasse not to perceyue them, so farre forth as is needefull for the magnifying of them. And although our eyesight be very feeble, yet is there such a greatnesse, excellencie, & worthinesse in Gods woorkes, as we haue some incling of them. Therefore lette vs learne to apply our mindes to the knowing of the things that God sheweth vs. Furthermore let vs marke also, that it behoueth vs to know God and his woorkes according to our owne measure. If he shew himself a farre of, let vs content our selues therewith. True it is that we may well desire to haue him to come neere vs: and on our part also it behoueth vs to streyne our selues from day to day, to haue a more familiar and full knowledge of him and of his woorkes. But yet for all that, we must walke in humilitie, & if God list, not not to be knowne to the full, but only in part: let vs holde our selues to that which pleaseth him. And in the meane while (as I sayd) let vs not play the purblind or starkblind buffards wilfully: but let vs suffer God to shew himselfe to vs, and when he hath shewed himselfe and wee know him, let vs honour him & yeeld him his deserued prayse. Now herewithall Eliu sayeth, that by cause God is great, we know him: not, nother is there any numbering or accounting of his yeeres. This sentence should seeme to repugne that which I haue sayd already: for to know & not to know, are things vterly contrary. VVe saw in the last verse, that although God be far off from vs, yet notwithstanding his woorkes are so great that we see them: and now it is sayd, that God cannot be knowne. But by the knowing that is spoken

ken of here, it is ment that we cannot comprehend God in such wise as he is in his maiestie: wee come farre short of that: it is ynough for vs that we haue some little taste of it: we be not able to cōprehend the infinite light that is in him: it suffizeth that wee haue some little sparkes therof. Thus then ye see in what wise God is not knowne: namely in that our capacitie is so small to conceyue and cōprehend him. Yet notwithstanding his meening is not to be vtterly hid frō men: for he sheweth himself ynough to be honored at their hands. Therefore this knowledge which we haue of God, is not to be able to determine of him, and to say throughly what is in him: but yet neuerthelesse we are vnexcusable if we honour him not, for so much as he hath shewed himself in such portion vnto vs, as he knoweth vs able to beare, and as is for our profite. Now we see after what maner we behold God, and how he may be knowne of vs: that is to wit, by looking at him as it were in a glasse when he claddeth himselfe with that visible maiestie which is seene in heauen and earth. Lo in what wyze he ought to be looked vpon And for that cause it is sayd, that the creatures are as his seate: those are his ornaments: and as a Prince that appareleth himselfe in his royaltie to haue the more reuerence: euen so Gods ornaments are in the heauen and in the earth: and there it is that he must be looked vpon. For as for his substance or being, that is inuisible and hidden from vs. But he vitereth his vertues in such wise, that although wee were blind, yet might we grope them, according also as S. Paule vseth the same similitude in the 17. of the Actes. Seing it is so, let vs learne that we do then see God, when we consider his workes: for his mightie power appeereth there, and sheweth vs that he deserueth well to bee glorified at our hands. But yet must wee not presume to knowe him perfectly, so as we should be able to define what his glory is: for that passeth all our vnderstanding: wee muste cast downe our eyes and confesse that he dwelleth in vnapprochable light. Therefore our knowing of God is but in part: and therewithall it beloneth vs to confesse, that we be so ignorant and weake, as it is ynough for vs to haue some tast of Gods maiestie, and we must hold our selues at that stay sith we see that our wits fayle vs, and that we be as good as forlorne. I say it behoueth vs to holde our selues within our owne slenderesse, praying God to rid vs of this mortall flesh, to the intent we may behold him as he is, when we be become like vnto him, as it is sayd in S. Iohn: and furthermore that in wayting for that day, he reforme vs presently after his owne image, to the end we may behold him the better. For thereafter as God clenseth vs from all our fleshy vices, and from all the heavy drosse that wee feele in our selues: so maketh he vs the meeter to behold him. And so vpon the knowledge of the weakenesse of our owne wittes, wee haue to pray vnto God to reforme vs more and more, to the end we may profite and increace in his knowledge. VWhereas mentiō is made of the numbering of his yeeres: and whereas it is sayd, that they cannot be reckened: truly a man may thinke it rude geere at the first blush: for in asmuch as God had no beginning, it needeth not to bee sayd of that euerlastingnesse, that the yeeres thereof cannot be reckened: and therefore that saying might seeme superfluous. But if wee consider what Eliu aimed: we shall finde that saying greatly to our profite. And why? As I haue sayde heretofore, men are so caried away with pride, as they find fault with Gods doings, and will needes controll him. And whereof cometh such saucinesse, but that in effect they thinke theselues wizer than God? Now to beate downe such ouerweening, it is sayd here, that a man cannot reckon the number of Gods yeeres. Therefore whēsoever we would be iudges ouer him, and are tempted with the sayd presumptuousnesse and desire to mount higher than becometh vs or is lawfull for vs: lette vs bethinke our selues thus: wretched creature, thou art but as a snayle, it is not past three dayes ago since thou camest first vpon the earth (I meene euen them that haue liued a foure or fiftescore yeeres) & yet thou wilt take vpon thee to iudge thy God. And in what plight art thou? For when thou shalt haue reached to the very creation of the worlde: it is nothing in comparison of the euerlastingnesse that is in him. So then, thou seeest now thine owne follie, and that thou art out of thy wittes when thou enterest into such a maze, as to go aboute to iudge him. Therefore let vs learne, that here is not only told vs that Gods age is endlesse: but we muste also compare it with the shortnesse of our life, according as we be warned to do. For we know that wee be transitorie and slippe away like a shadow. Then must we compare the sayd shortnesse [of our life] with the endlesse time of God, and the euerlastingnesse which hath nother time nor bounds: and that will serue well to keepe vs from aduancing our selues into such presumption as we haue bene woonted to. Thus wee see in effect what Eliu telleth vs here. Now must we come to the declaratiō of that which he sayeth concerning Gods workes. For he alledgeth the Rayne, thunders, and vapours, and such other like things, as Hayle, tempests, and whirlwindes. VWhen wee see those things, God giueth vs suche signes of his maiestie, as wee muste needes honour him, or else wee be to vnthankfull and blockish. True it is that God hath other workes higher and harder to comprehend than these: but the intent of the ho'y Ghost was, to teach vs grossely according to our rudenesse and homelinessse: and therefore Eliu setteth downe here an exāple of the workes of nature, which we say are common. VVe neede not to go to schoole nor to be great Clerkes to haue knowledge of Rayne, of hayle, of fayre wether, and of the chaunges that we see in the ayre. True it is that the reasons of them are not very common and ordinarie. For if a man should aske a poore sillie soule how Rayne is ingendred he could not resolue him of it, bycause wee see not howe the water mounteth vp, nor also howe the water can be ingendred in the ayre, and it might seeme a thing agaynst reason. So the playne countrymen cannot discourse the things that are to be knowne by Philosophie: as how the rayne is ingendred by drawing vp of the vapours or steames, in somuch that when the Sunne striketh vpon the earth, for asmuch as the earth is full of holes, and not so cloce shet but that there are little vaines in it: he draweth vp the vapours aloft, and by little and little they become thicke, and when they be in the middes of the ayre, there they ingender Rayne. For by that meanes the moistures are drawne vp by little and little, vntill that al of the growripe to giue vs rayne. Agayne the countryfolke vnderstand not whereof it cometh to passe, that there is not so great heate in the middle roome of the ayre, although the same be neerer to the Sūne. For the cause of it is, that the heate setteth it self here vpon the earth as vpon a harth, whereas in the ayre it spreadeth abroad in such wise as it cannot rest there. And that is the cause why hayle is ingendered there, as we see. It is a straunge matter, in so much that we would hardly beleuee it if it were not a common thing among vs, that the hayle should thicken in the ayre, and that although the Sunne be neerer thereto than to vs, yet notwithstanding (as we see) there must needes be a great coldnesse there. The ignorant therefore haue no knowledge of these things, nother can they finde out the reason of it, but are amazed at it. Howbeit although wee know not the reason, yet the thing it selfe is sufficiently knowne, knowne, in somuch that it appeereth that the drawing vp of the vapours from the earth after that maner, and the ingendering of Rayne afterward, and also the holding of the rayne in the ayre after it is ingendered there, (according as it is sayde that the clowdes are bottels, barrels, or tubbes) are a wonderfull worke of God. And in good sooth if there were barrells in the ayre to hold the water in, it were not a notabler miracle, than too see the clowdes hanging ouer vs. VVhat letteth that they fall not downe to ouerwhelme vs and to destroy the earth? 10 Muste it not needes be an excellent power whereat our wittes must be amazed? This is the cause why I sayd that without any going to schoole, or without any curious great booke learning, a man shall find sufficiēt knowledge of Gods workes in the order of nature, to make him vnexcusable, bycause the same is so common among vs. As for example, when wee looke vpon the rayne, hayle, thunder, and such other like things, the same shewe vs a certayne maiestie of God to make vs afraide, so as wee muste needes be moued spite of our teeth: for by that 20 meanes our Lord inforceth vs to know the maiestie that is in him, notwithstanding that we through our vnthankfulnesse indeuer to quenche it to the vttermoste of our power. Now then we see why mention is made here vnto vs of the rayne & such other like things. Not bicause that God hath not other workes more wonderfull and excellent: but to the ende we should not pretend ignorance: for the holy Ghost setteth before vs the things that are seene and knowne of the whole world. Seing it is so, what haue we to do but to worship God, yeelding him his deserued honour: & to beate downe al pryde in our selues, 30 so as we learne to submit our selues to his ordinance, and allow whatsoeuer he doth or dispozeth? Howbeit, it will bee good for mee to expound the woordes, before I gather the generall doctrine. It is sayd, that God restrayneth [or holdeth backe] the droppes of water. And it serueth to expresse better his excellent power, which would not bee beleued if men sawe it not with their eyes. If a man should tel vs that the droppes of water were hild vp, (that is to say, that the water which is so fine and furtle a thing 40 that it sheadeth and soketh away and hath no fastnesse in it, is neuerthelessse hild vp in the ayre, notwithstanding the great number of the droppes, and the great quantitie of it:) we would thinke it straunge, if we had not experience of it. If water were a firme and substantiall thing, there might well be some mountayne of it for God to hold together. But wheras there are a hundred Millions of drops in one little clowde, and euery droppe is of it own nature readie to fall away and to disperse all the rest of the bodie, (as soothly nothing is more sheading and slipperie 50 than water, in somuch that looke how many little portiōs there are, so many diuisions there are) and yet notwithstanding they are all hild together: if we knew it not and perceyued it not, wee would neuer beleue it. Must wee not needes then acknowledge an infinite power in God, when we see the things that could not be beleued? And so Eliu in saying that God holdeth together the droppes of water, ment to expresse better the mightie power that God sheweth vs in holding vp the rayne in the ayre. And afterward he sayeth that of his vapour he maketh Rayne. If a man demaunde whereof rayne is ingendered: I say, of nothing. The vapour of it owne selfe would not rize vp from the earth, which hath hir steames within hir holes, for that is hir nature: but the rizing vp of it is by the drawing of the sunne, which sucketh vp the moysture to hale it vp on high. Otherwise what ropes needed there [to draw it vp:] VVere it possible to beleue it, if wee sawe it not? But it is seene manifestly. Yee see then that the vapours which were nothing, (that is to say which appeared not at al in our sight,) do rize vpward agaynst their nature. And when they be vp aloft, rayne is made and fashioned of them: and afterward the earth is moystened with it, and bringeth forth frute, and men take their nourishment thereof. Behold our Lord drieth the earth by drawing the vapours from it after that maner: and it is asmuch as if a man should drawe the sappe and iuice out of a thing, so as he should leaue nomore strength in it. Ye see then that it withereth. But God findeth a contrary meanes. VVhē he hath so dried the earth, and drayned as it were the bloud and substance out of it: he moysteth it agayne with the same, and we see that rayne giueth abundance of frutes, according as it is shewed here. Seing then that we perceyue it to be so: muste it not needes be that we are couicted of the Maiestie of God which we would not consider before? Although then that we shet our eyes, yet doth God (spite of our teeth) shew himself to vs, & his maiestie is visible to vs in all sortes. Immediately it is declared, that God hath as it were his Paultions [or Tents], according as we know how it hath bene declared heretofore, that the clowdes and all the cope of heauen are termed Gods Paultions or Tents. And diuers times it is sayd Psalm. 104. 4.3. that the clowdes are his chariotes, namely bicause he guideth them and maketh them to go foreward, or else doth as it were walke vpon them to make his triumphes. Thus ye see how God is presented vnto vs as a Prince, in that he vseth the heauen as his palace, and his maiestie sheweth it selfe there. Agayne, the clowdes are as yee would say the pillers of his Paultion, to the ende wee should be the more moued to consider his royal workemanship. Then seing it is so, let vs learne to yeeld God that which is his owne, and let not his glorie be defaced through our vnthankfulnesse. Moreouer it is not for nought, that wheras this similitude hath bene set downe already heretofore, Eliu repeteth it here yet once agayn. For we know the foolish curiositie that is in men. They will needes behold God as he is in his owne being. But they cannot. So much the more heede therefore must we take to these 60 maner of speeches which are agreeable to our infirmitie. Behold, God is visible vnto vs: but in what maner? He dwelleth in his palace: and will we then preace vnto him? would we know him according as our capacitie cā beare? Let vs go to that palace. Howbeit let vs not enter into it with a frenetike boldnesse to comprehend all Gods secretes. For seing he dwelleth in a palace, he must at leastwise haue as much power as a worldly King who is but a frayle creature. So then let vs content our selues with the sight of that excellent palace, to honour his maiestie. And if it please him to come neere vnto vs, it behoueth vs to come before him with all reuerence, and not to passe our bounds. Behold (I say) what we haue to consider in this maner of speech, where the Clowdes are termed the pillers of Gods palace, and are sayde to holde vp his Paultion, or else to be ioyned to it as a parte of it. For it serueth too shewe, that it is ynough for vs too taste what Gods maiestie is, so farre soorth as hee vtereth the same too vs by his workes. Eliu speaketh also of the effects of Rayne. He sayeth that God executeth his iudgements vpon men and giueth abundantly whereof to liue. VVhereby he meeneth that God will (when hee listeth) make the rayne to serue to sette soorth his goodnesse: so that if he minde to shew himselfe a fosterfather towards men, the Clowdes shall bring him wherewith to further thē. For like as if a Prince intend to succour a Couētrie that suffereth famine, he will appoynt menne to bring victualles thither from a farre off lothe by lande and by water: euen so the Clowdes bring vs Gods prouision, namely when hee vtereth his infinite infinite goodnesse towardes vs. Contrariwise, when he purposeth to shewe his rigour, the Cloudes execute his vengeance vppon vs, and hee vttereth his displeasur there. And why? For when Raynes are outrageous they doo great harmes, and make such fouldes that both hay and Corne are swept away. Moreover there followe other wastings also, according as it is diuerse tymes seene, that the Sea drowneth a great Countrey. Ye see then howe God dooth by rayne execute his iustice, and also on the contrarie part make vs to feele his goodnesse. And that is the cause why it is sayde, that he couereth the rootes of the Sea. For when wee beholde the raine and the Cloudes: at the first brunt it toucheth vs and maketh vs afraide, and it is meete also that wee should be stricken with some feare. But when God withholdeth the waters, so as they poure not downe vppon the worlde, ne swallowe vs vp here at the first dash: that maketh vs to perceiue Gods prouidence the better. Now then we see what Elius intent was. And finally hee sayeth, that God will mingle darkenesse and light together. For when the Sunne shineth, there commeth no we and then suche a sodaine storme, as men are abashed at it: as in the Sommer tyme the weather shall bee so calme and fayre as can bee deuysed, and in the turning of a hande, ye shall see such a tempest, as it shall seeme that the worlde shoulde go too wrecke. And who dooth that? Muste not hee needes bee an excellent mayster which commaundeth it? Must not that excellencie of God be wonderfull?

Furthermore it is sayde heere, that God commaundeth the Cloudes too mount vp, and againe, hee commaundeth the fire which is in the aire, that is to say hee commaundeth the streamings which being of fire nature are whote and drie. God then commaundeth them too iustle agaynst the Cloudes that are about too mounte vpparde, and thei vppon followeth a battell, as if two armies incountered together with mortall anger. Euen so is it in the incounther that is betweene the Cloudes, and the drie gleames that are about. Then is there as it were an anger when these Creatures meete, and eche of them is as yee woulde say at deadly foade with other. And who doth that? Needes must God be the commaunder of it. For if wee shoulde say it were done by haphazarde, we shoulde bee too brutish, and the verie babes might laugh vs too scorne: for there is no man but hee knoweth that God woorketh heerein, and that hee ruleth from aboue. Ye see then in effecte what wee haue too gather of the woordes. But the cheefest matter is to gather the doctrine that is conteyned heere. Truly the woordes are right worthie to be well weyed, too the intent that they maye bee referred too the ende whiche I haue touched. Howebeit by the way we haue to remember heere, that there needeth no great cunning too proue vnto vs, that there is but one God whiche reigneth and guideth the worlde, and disposeth all the order of nature according to his owne will. Why so? For if we haue liued neuer so little while in the worlde, so as wee haue but seene it raine a three or foure tymes: beholde God, yeeldeth vs sufficient recorde of his Maiestie, so as there is no more excuse for vs if we shette our eyes: for (spite of our teeth) we shall vnderstande, that there is a God which overruleth all things that wee can see heere beneath. Thus ye see what wee haue to remember. And heereby we see that suche as scoffe at all religion, and are not moued at the Maiestie of God, are as good as bewitched by Satan. For (as I sayde) wee neede not to lauge gone to schule too learne this lesson. Yet notwithstanding, there are men euen of great skill, that thinke not theselues wyse ynough, if they despise not God. And howe is it possible that they shoulde become so beastly? It is (as I sayde) bycause God hathe vtterly giuen them ouer, and they be so dulle that Satan raigneth in them, yea euen with such darkenesse, as they be not worthie to be accounted for men. Notwithstanding, let vs marke therewithall, that they haue alwayes fore hartbytings: and although they labour too weyre out all knowledge of God: yet haue they such a heartburning in their conscience, as they are faine (spite of their teeth) to feele the maiestie which they would vtterly abolish: and they can not shift it off, but that God must pursue them, and shew himself to them.

Then let vs conclude, that the thing which is conteyned heere, is seene by experience: which is, that if menne doo but open their eyes, they muste needes beholde a Maiestie in all the order of nature: and that although they shette their eyes, yet dooth God make them too feele him. Lo what we haue to marke heere in the first place. Truly this doctrine deserueth to bee layde oute more at large shewebeit, forasmuche as wee haue spoken of it heretofore, it suffizeth too call too minde what I haue earst declared, without tarying long vpon it.

But by the waye let vs marke, that the holy Ghost doth here set downe those woorkes of God which are lest knowne to all men, both to great and finall, too the intent that vppon the knowing of them, euerie manne shoulde take the more courage too prayse and honour God when they knowe him. Why so? If the manner of teaching in the holy Scripture were curious and high, so as none coude fasten on it but the learned sort: wee woulde drawe backe, and moste men woulde take occasion to say, Alas, what can I do? I neuer went to schole, and God vouchsafeth not to shewe himselfe but to learned men. But when as we see that God chaweth oure morselles too vs, and dresseth vs like little children, and frameth himselfe too our rudenesse, giuing vs things in suche wise, that euen the smallest and ignorantest may haue their part and share (as menne terme it) of them: I pray you ought not wee too take the more courage too learne and vnderstande what God is, and too comforte ourselues in the great goodnesse which hee sheweth towardes vs? For if he had not an inestimable care of our welfare, he woulde not vouchsafe too come downe so lowe. But sith it is his will to stoupe vnto vs in his creatures, and forsomuch as hee seeing what is meete for vs, sheweth himselfe to vs in such wise as we may conceyue him: perceyue we not therein how much he loveth vs, and howe he procureth our saluation? Ye see then what wee haue too beare in minde. And therefore when as mention is made vnto vs of Raine, Cloudes, Whirlewindes, and Haile, let vs not imagine but that GOD coulde reason more clearly with vs if he listed. For who gaue witte too the Heathen Philosophers too treat so well and skilfully of the secretes of nature? It is God that gaue them that knowledge. But in the meane while he teacheth vs after another fashion. And why? For he will haue men to preache and set forth the doctrine of saluation vnto vs, to guide vs too his owne kingdome, and he will haue it not onely to make vs kings and princes, but also to lift vs vp aboue the whole worlde, to make vs fellowes with the Angelles, and to mount aboue the heauens.

Forasmuche then as God intendeth too lift vs vp on high: he commaundeth downe vnto vs too make vs all partakers of the benefites that are conteyned in his woorde. Wherefore let vs learne not too despise the holy scripture ture as a common thing : but let vs vnderstande that Gods minde is to frame himselfe to our infirmitie after that maner. Ye see then what we haue to marke. Herewithall let vs learne also not to despise Gods workes because they bee common among vs. VVhat is the cause why we esteeme not Gods doings to bee a myracle, but for that we be inured to them by custome? I see it raine: verie well, I am not moued a whitte at it, bicause it is an ordinarie matter too mee. But surely it is a villaynous vnthankfulnesse, that whereas God doth dayly worke a myracle, wee shoulde bee as it were dyled thereby, and not thinke vpon it any more. So then although rayne, hayle, and the ryfing of rempests by the order of nature, bee ordinarie things : yet let vs not forbear too marke well all those things, and to consider by percelmeale how oure Lorde layeth foorth the infinite treasures of hys power and maiestie, to the ende to be honoured at our handes. Thus ye see what wee haue to beare in minde. Howbeit before I passe any further, it might be demaunded to what purpose Eliu alledgeth these things, seeing hee reasoneth of a farre other matter: which is to shewe that God is incomprehensible in his doings, and that men must not presume too striue agaynste him, nor too mainteyne their owne quarells as though they were rightfull, and that God were cruell in afflicting them. This seemeth too bee nothing at all to the purpose. But I haue resolued this question alreadie. Onely I will say a worde of it sleightly, to reue the remembrance of the thing that hath bin spoken heretofore at length. VVhich is, that the inferior things are set generally heere afore vs, to make vs mount vphigher to Gods secrete and incomprehensible iudgements.

VVhen wee see the raine, the clowdes the stormes, and the hayle, surely they bee naturall things (as men terme them:) they serue for this transitorie life, and they concerne the worlde, and things heere beneath. Yet notwithstanding we be so confounded by them, as we be inforced to reuerence the maiestie of God. For when we shall haue inquired, how it is possible for those things to be done: our wittes sayle vs, and there remaineth nothing for vs, but too humble our selues before God. Now if these small and lowe things compell vs to honour God, and that our infirmitie bewrayeth it selfe therein: what shall become of vs when we fall to mounting about the Clowdes, yea and about all the Skies, and when we come to the euerlasting purpose which God holdeth there as it were hidden in himselfe? Then if it come too that poynt, I pray you what shall become of mennes wittes? They may well sifter and fiske about: but a man may sooner breake his necke a hundred thousande tymes, than attaine vntoo God. Yee see then, what the manner of Elius teaching is heere. For by these things whiche seeme small because custome hath made them common among vs, hee sheweth that God in his highnesse ought of duetie too bee honoured at our handes: for wee shall neuer comprehend what hee is. And why? VVee comprehend not what the Clowdes are, but our wittes misse of that? For we see it is no stryuing in this behalfe agaynste Gods doings. Shall I go set an order in the Clowdes, to say, it must not bee so or so, and that it is but a tale of a tubbe, that the raine is ingendred of the vapours of the earth, and that the Sunne draweth vp the things here beneath after that maner by the heate of his beames? Shall wee (say I) stoppe God from disposing all things according too the order which hee hath set in nature? Alas, that were too damnable an outrage: euerie man will graunt that. Nowe seeing that oure weakenesse sheweth it selfe in these small things, whiche are ryfe and common, and which God setteth before our eyes: (for yet neuertheless, we know that it behoueth vs to fall down there before God to worship him, & to confesse that our vnderstanding is nothing at all, especially sith it comprehendeth not the things that we see day by day:) much more reason is it that wee shoulde brydle oure wittes, and reyne them short when we come to his secrete determinations and iudgements, which hee executeth not euerie day, and which are not so common and ryfe among vs. And why so? For it is a diuelishe pride when a man will mount so high, and therefore he must needes fall into so vtter ruine, as he can neuer get vp againe. Then let vs kepe vs from this stateliness of desiring to rise vp against God, namely in his secrete determinations which surmount the whole order of nature, and all the things that we are able to comprehend by our vnderstanding. This is in effecte the thing that Eliu looked at and aimed at. Nowe by the way let vs marke for an ende and knitting vp, that whereas it is sayde, that God executeth his iudgements, and giueth men abundantly wherewith to liue: It is to the ende we shoulde knowe, that all the order of nature is in Gods hande, and that the ayre is not gouerned by it selfe, nor the raine commeth at the appoyntment of the Sunne. How then? For we see contrarie effects. Beholde, water drowneth men and sweepeth them quite away: and againe, it mainteyneth them. Yee see heere two contrarie woorkings: nourishment on the one side, and wasting on the other, so as God destroyeth and ouerwhelmeth all. Both these twaine we see: and what is the cause thereof, but that God ouerruleth things from aboue. So then, let vs learne to magnifie God in this, that wee see him applie his creatures too such vse as hee thinketh good. Furthermore, when on the one side we see his rigour: seeing that hee myndeth too punishe our sinnes, wee ought too consider that therein hee sheweth himselfe a Iudge, to the ende we shoulde condemne our selues before him, and flee for refuge to his mercie, forsomuch as he vttereth the treasures of his goodnesse, and sheweth himselfe liberal. VVhich thing he doth at such time as he declareth himselfe to haue a care of vs by sending vs prouision by the Clowdes, wherby he maketh the earth frutefull: to the ende it shoulde yeeld vs sustenance. VVhen we see this on the other side: let vs bee satisfied with the goodnesse of our God, to put our whole trust therein, and to rest thereypon, concluding that sith hee sheweth himselfe a father in the cherishing of oure bodies, which are but fraile carkesses: much more reason it is that seeing hee hath fashioned vs anewe vnto hys owne glorie, we should not doubt but he is chare of our saluation, and that he sheweth himselfe a father in that, more than in all the rest. This is it that we haue to marke in this streyne, where we see that God as nowe applieth his creatures to his owne pleasure, vsing them on the one syde, as Roddes too execute his iustice, and on the other side, making them too serue our turne, even by employing them too releue the necessities of this present lyfe. Therefore let vs beare all these things in minde, that wee maye bee taught in his feare, both too reioyce and rest in his goodnesse, and also too settle our trust wholly vpon the same.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs perceyue them better than we haue done: and that therewithall we may knowe that we must mislike of our selues still more and more, to the ende to correct the finfulness that is in vs: & that forasmuch as it hath pleased God to drawe vs alreadie vnto him, we may consider the grace that he hath begonne in vs, and thervpon take corage too go forward still more and more, till wee bee come to the perfection that he calleth vs vnto, and neuer be wery of traveling thitherward: and that in the meane season we may haue our eyes open to behold his goodnesse, power, iustice, and wisdom which he sheweth vs: and he reforme vs wholly to his obedience, so as we may seeke nothing but to dedicate our whole life to his seruice. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs &c.

The. cxliij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xxxvij. Chapter.

Also my hart trembleth at it for feare, and it leaperh out of his place.

2. Herken to the noise of his voice, and to the sound of his mouthe.
3. He directeth it vnder the vvhole heauens, his light is vpon the vvinges of the earth.
4. Again he brayeth vwith a greate sound, he thundreth vwith his myghtie voice, and he taryeth not after that his voyce is heard.
5. God thundereth terribly vwith his voyce, he dooth vvonderfull things, and vvhich a man cannot comprehend.
6. For he commaundet the snovve to fall dovne vpon the earth: and [likevwife] the fyvete shovvers, and the raynes of greate force.

His serueth at leastwyse, that whyle we be in this world we shuld haue our eyes open too consider the woorkes of God that are neere vs and easie to be scene, though we be no learned nor deepewitted folk. For euen the veriest idiots perceyue the order of nature to bee such, that they see the maiestie of God there as in a mirour. True it is, that wee ought to lift vp ourselues yet hygher too consider well what God sheweth vs. Howbeeit (as I sayd) we ought at leastwise to consider the things that are present afore vs. Notwithstanding, it is not ynough too vnderstand that God hauing created the world doeth also gouerne it: it behoueth vs to knowe moreouer to what ende the thing ought to be referred. If we knew no more but that it is God which sendeth rayne and faire wearher, it is God that thundereth, it is God that maketh the lightenings to run flasing through the ayre: that were an attributing of a soueraigne power vntoo him, and so should he bee knowne to bee almightie. But there is yet more: For when God sendeth rayne, it is not only to shewe what he can do: but sometimes it is his mynd to challize men for their sinnes, and other tymes it is his intent to yeeld forth the treasures of his goodnesse and bountie. So then it is not ynough to haue knowne that God is almightie, and that all creatures are in his hand and at his disposition: but we must marke also how and after what maner hee vseth them: that is to wit, to iudge the world with, when he hath borne long ynough with our sinnes: and againe to make vs feele his fauour, and to knowe him to be our father and fauour, and the partie that maynteyneth and nurrissheth vs. VVe see then that Gods iustice, goodnesse, and wisdom must be linked with his almightinesse. And why? To the intent we may on the one side be taught to feare him, and to walk in his obedience: and on the other side rest our selues vpon him, seeing we haue so fayre recordes of his loue, and that we may call vpon him, assuring our selues that hee regardeth vs and pitieth vs, and that we be vnder his protection, and that if we resort vnto him when we be destitute of counsell, he will instruct vs by his holie spirite.

Nowe then wee see, that the order of nature beeing well considered, serueth not onely too set out a soueraigne power in God, to the ende men shoulde honour him by acknowledging him too bee almightie: but also to make vs immediately too take holde of his grace and goodnesse, too rest therevpon, and to seeke oure whole refuge there. Also it behoueth vs too knowe, that men shall not scape vnpunished, bycause hee sheweth them before hande, that all things must come to account before him. And that is the thing whiche Eliu hath treated of, according as it was shewed yesterday, that by raine, hayle, and tempestes, God doth sometymes iudge the worlde, and sometimes giue men abundantly wherewith to liue.

And now he addeth, That his heart leaped out of his place at it, and that he was afrayde at the sight of such things: as if he shoulde say, that our knowing of God must not be a gazing in the ayre after our owne lykings, and in the meane while to conceyue but only some dead thoughts: but it must bee a liuely touching of our heartes, and of all our powers to the quick. And this is general to all men. But the vnbeleeuers (do as muche as they can) kill this feare wherewith they ought to bee touched, whereas the faythfull make their profite of it, and willingly prouoke themselues to the sayde awfulesse, to the ende too doo homage with all reuerence to the Maiestie of God.

Then let vs beare in minde, that Gods manifesting of himselfe vnto men, is not onely to put some fleeting conceyte intoo them, so as they might say, There is a God, and fall too reasoning of him: but also therewithall too giue them a liuely instruction inwardly, so as they maye become the better minded. This (say I) ought to bee in all men. Howebeeit wee see that the vnbeleeuers doo (to the vttermost of their power) beate backe the feare which they haue conceyued, and labour too play wyth God, and to get libertie to be quite and cleane oute of awe of him. Lo at what poynt the faythlesse sort are, so as they fight agaynst their owne naturall vnderstanding, and indeuer themselues too become brute beastes, that there may not be ought in them to trouble them any more. And why do they so? For God is agaynst them, forsonuel, as they be giuen too all euill. They see that God cannot away with them, and therefore they shunne him, and labour too ridde him quite away, lyke as an Outlaw or a Theefe woulde faine that there were no ciuill Magistrate in the worlde, to the ende that his sinnes might escape vnpunished. In like cace is it with all worldelings: forasmuch as they cannot disbarre the hande of God, so long as hee siteth in his maiestie too iudge: they woulde faine exempt themselues from his iurisdiction: and that is the cause (as I sayd) why they labor to quench the light of reason which was giuen thē. But they cannot bring it to passe: and therefore they are as Mules that chawe vpon theyr brydles, and fall to repynning agaynst God, and howsoeuer the worlde go with them, they growe hardhearted, and waxe euerie day more blockish than other, till God haue giuen them quite ouer, so as they feele no more remorse of mynde, as Sainct Paint speaketh of them. And surely it is the extreamest of all miseries, and the verie vpspottedte of theyr decay, when they feele no more grieffe, that is too say, whē they haue no more remorse of conscience, but beare with themselues in sinning, and go on still in their common trace, according also as Salomon sayeth, that the wicked man is then come to the gulfe, and dungeon of iniquitie, when hee hath no more feeling to returne vnto God, and to humble himselfe, and to mislike of hys faultes. Contrarywise, when the faythfull are touched with the Maiestie of God, they kinde the fyre more and more, like as if a man hauing alreadye some Coales or fyrebronde, shoulde kinde it more. Euen so deale all they that couet to walke vprightly. For after that God hath once touched them, and that they themselues by beholding the order of nature, haue once perceyued that there is a soueraine Maiestie, which guideth and governeth all things: they applie that reuerende feare to their owne instruction, so as they pricke and prouoke themselves in their heartes, too resort vnto God, bearing him continually in their remembrance. And as oft as they haue occasion too looke vpwarde or downewarde, they prepare themselues too the knowing of God, so as they gaze not aboute at aduenture, but bethinke themselues thoroughly aforehande, that they must looke vpon God the maker of all things. VVe see then that whereas the wicked and heathenish sort labour to become blinde, and therewithall to waxe hardhearted agaynst God, and finally too become brute beastes, voyde of vnderstanding and discretion: the faithfull take profit of the knowledge which god giueth thē by the meanes of his creatures, and cōsequently the said light increaseth & groweth strong in them, & they inforce themselues to it to the vttermoost of their power. And that is it which Eliu mēt here by saying, that his beare trembled and leapt out of his place. True it is, that the wicked shall be afraid of thunder and lightning, and spite of their teeth the Maiestie of God must touch them, to make some secreete alarum within them: but yet for all that, they dispatche away such thoughtes, and treade them vnder foote. On the contrarie part, suche as desire to knowe God, do vppon occasion of such beginning, set and applie their whole studie to aduantage themselves by that feare and dreade which God sendeth into their heartes. Furthermore, Eliu vseth goodly similitudes here in describing the thunder, lightning, froit, & tempestes. He sayeth that a man may bear Gods voyce, yea euen a voyce of great noyse (sayeth hee) and a sounde that proceedeth out of his mouth. Heere Eliu speaketh not of the woorde, which is dayly preached vnto vs, for vs to take learning by it, and wherein God doth familiarly shewe vs his goodnesse: but by Gods roaring voyce, and by the noyse that proceedeth out of his mouth, hee meeneth the thunders that are made in the ayre: and therein hee declareth by a similitude, that our Lorde hath a manner of speeche which is able too make all Creatures too quake, And not onely in this place, but also in the nine and twentieth Psalme it is sayde, That the voyce of God thundereth, the voice of God maketh the Mountaine of Libanus too rore, the voyce of God cleaueth the greete trees, the voyce of God maketh the Hindes to cast their Calues, the voyce of God is hearde in the Mountaynes, the voyce of God maketh the whole Earth too shake.

This voyce is none other thing, than the same noyse that is made by the thunder: neuerthe lesse it serueth too reprove men of their vnthankfulnesse, in that they giue not eare too Gods thundering: according also as it is a common prouerbe when men play the madde men, too saye that they are so lowde, that a man could not heare God thunder for them.

Yee see then that the Scripture vpbraideth vs with such blockishnesse, and bereeueteth vs of all excuse. For if men say, Tush we neuer had any learning, the scripture was neuer opened vntoo vs: what then? Did it neuer thunder in all our life? Did God neuer speake? Haue we not conceyued such a maiestie in him, as we ought of right to stoupe to honour him, and to submit our selues vnder his obedience? But all that we do, is to no purpose, we bee as bad as brute beastes, there is as it were a madnesse in vs matched with pride, if we cannot consider that he hath all authoritie ouer vs. Ye see then that men are sufficiently conuicted when it thundereth. For they ought to consider the voyce of God, namely the greate and lowdsounding noyse whiche maketh the ayre too roare.

Againe, if men say they bee ignorant and as it were in darkenesse: what matter makes that? The lightnings do as it were clyue afunder the Skies, and wee see suche a brightnesse, as God sheweth himselfe sufficiently, yea euen to take all couert from vs, that no man might flatter himselfe in his hypocritie, nor go about too iustifye himselfe, as though wee had knowne nothing of God. For the lightning is ynough to shewe vs the glorie that is in him. Thus ye see why Eliu speaketh heere of the greate noyse and sounde that proceedeth oute of Gods mouth. And hee enlargeth the matter bycause menne are to retchlesse, and if one tell them in fewe woordes, the matter which I go aboute to lay forth, they haue no greate regarde of it, it slippeth away from them out of hande.

Heere therefore Eliu standeth longer vpon his matter, and pursueth it further, bycause wee ought to consider well the order that is in the thunder and lightning, and also in the raine and deawes, and in all the stormes that we perceyue. And he speaketh expressly of sweete and gentle showes, and also of the boystuousnesse and violence that are seene ostentymes in that behalfe, as in pursuing that which he had touched alreadye concerning Gods iudging of the worlde, sometime by sending raine from heauen, and sometime by giuing abundance of food. For if a sweete raine come in due season, it will make the Earth frutefull: but [otherwise] the raine will marre and destroy all the benefites whereby we looke for sustenance. Therefore wee perceyue both twaine of these things in God: and that deserueth well to be considered. Also that is the cause why it is sayde, that God dooth wondrous full things whiche wee comprehend not, by the thunders which hee sendeth. For in verie deede, after it hath so flashed, and that the Lightning hath flouen throughout, and the Thunderclappes haue bene heard: immediately there commeth a tempest, and God letteth the raine, and the storme, and the hayle to poure downe without tariance: and whersoever the dint of the tempest lighteth, there insue incredible things. For ye shall see a man consumed to ashes. He shall keepe still his shape, and hardly shall yee finde a hole so bigge as a pease, and yet notwithstanding the man shall bee quite consumed. A hard swoorde shall bee vtterly molten, and the scabber that yeeldeth shall be whole still. Trees shall be sometime rooted vp, sometime wrung afunder, and sometime vtterly consumed, so as there shall be nothing left of thē. As much is done too houses. To bee short, if a man consider all the effectes of a tempest, they be things that could not bee beleued, if they were not knowne by experience. And therefore it standeth men in hande to humble themselves, considering the weaknesse of theyr owne witte, and the mighty nesse of Gods woorkes. If wee bee not worse than blockishe, wee muste needes learne heereby, too submitte our selues vntoo him, and to honour him, and to yeelde him all glorie and soueraintie. This in effect is it that Eliu sheweth vs. But first of all let vs beare in minde what hath beene touched: that is to wit, that it is not ynough for vs too conceyue God too bee the maker of the worlde, and too father all power vpon him: but we must also knowe him to bee our father, bycause he draweth vs too him with so gentle and louing a care, as if we were his owne children. VVhat earthly father dooth so much for those that are descended of him? Then to knowe rightly what God is, it behoueth vs too taste of his goodnesse, which hee vttereth too vs, and maketh vs too feeble, and whereof wee receyue the frutes and the ioyment euen in this mortall lyfe. Now when we do so taste Gods goodnesse: it is too leade vs further, that is too witte, that wee shoulde trust in him, and consider that hee hath not put vs into this worlde, to the ende wee shoulde perishe as brute beastes: but too bring vs too the euerlasting heritage whiche hee hath promised vs. Therefore wee may well grounde a right trust in God, by reason of the benefites which wee receyue of him: and wee may well conclude, that oure soules are more precious to him, than our bodyes: and that if he vouchsafe too sende vs the things that are requisite to mainteyne vs in this worlde, he will not leaue the cheefe poynt. VVe see then, that if wee had our eyes open to beholde Gods prouidence, and the order of nature that is set afore vs: the same woulde serue too teache vs too put our whole trust in him. And when wee repose such trust in him, wee may also call vpon him, assuring oure selues that sihe hee watcheth ouer vs, our prayers shall not bee vnknowne vntoo him, but hee will accept them. Lo what we haue too put in vre. And surely it woulde be our true wisdome, if wee could minde these things, and settle our thought vpon them. VVe shoulde fare the better all our life long. But what? VVe do nothing else but wander in sonde speculations, and therefore we reape none other rewarde but oure owne vanitie. VVe see howe men are intangled in these earthly things: and if a bodie speake to them of the heavenly kingdome, they vnderstande him not: for surely they be not worthie of it,

So muche the more then behoueth it vs too take heede to that which is conteyned heere: namely that we acknowledge the goodnesse of our God in that he nourisheth vs, and that wee bee bolde too call vpon him as our father, and too flee too him for refuge, seeing hee sheweth himselfe to bee our father, and that we haue so good a gege of it, in that he not onely telleth vs it by hys owne mouth, but also hath his hande open too make vs feeble wherewith. On the other syde, let vs learne too feare, when wee see him execute his iudgements, yea, euen by meanes whiche sometymes are for oure welfare. So then let vs learne there, that God myndeth to subdue vs to himselfe, and too teach vs to serue him, and not to prouoke his anger wilfully: but rather to come vntoo him with all reuerence, sihe we knowe that hee is armed with such power to reuenge himselfe of the dyspyfers of his maiestie, least he poure oute that greate and terrible puissance vpon vs. And that also is the cause why Sainct Peter bringeth vs too these considerations, namely, that God did once destroy the worlde, and wipe away all the inhabitors of the Earth by water, which notwithstanding is the beginning thereof. If a man demaunde whereof, or of what stuffe the worlde was made: wee see in the holy Scripture, that it was a confuzed matter, which God did let downe at the first beginning, and that the same was water, wherein there was nothing but depth and confuzednesse. VVell then, yee see that suche was the originall beginning of the worlde: and when God intended too destroy all mankinde, wherewith armed hee himselfe? Hee sente a flood. Yee see then, that the water from whence wee drawe oure lyfe, and whiche hath beene as it were the groundwoorke of the whole worlde, hath neuertheless beene the destruction thereof. Sith we see thys, let vs consider that we haue no being heere bylowe without the hand of God: and that whereas we be lightened by the Sunne, whereas we drawe breath from the ayre, and whereas we be nourished and fedde with breade: it is not the Creatures themselves that doo giue or mainteyne our lyfe. And why? For God will turne all into death when he listeth: and the instrumentes of lvs goodnesse shall be turned into deadly swordes to destroy vs. So then let vs learne, that when God sendeth vs either hayle, or noysom rayne, or sore frostes: his shewing of himselfe terrible in those things, is too the ende that wee shoulde knowe our sinnes, and entering into our selues, beseech him of forgiuenesse for oure offences past, and learne to stande in awe of him hereafter, and to obey him better than we haue done heretofore. Moreover, whensoever wee haue felt one stripe of his hande, let it not sticke in our minde for one day onely, but let it serue vs too thinke vpponeuer after. Hath God sente vs any drought? Or hath hee sent vs any raine? VVe must beare it in remembraunce, and not looke to haue it beginne againe, but bethinke vs thus: Go too, during the time that I haue liued in the worlde, I haue seene sometymes that the rayne hath marred all the seede that was layd into the ground: in steade of Corne, men haue had Darnell, or nothing at all: and againe, God hath so parched the earth with heate, that all hath beene seared away: or else there hath beene some winde that hath shaken downe or blasted all that was for the sustenance of man and beast. I haue seene all this, and I haue seene also that by such meanes God hath sent famin. Nowe then, I must not tary till God strike againe, but it must be a learning too mee for all the tyme of my lyfe. Thus yee see in what wyse wee must put thys doctrine in vre.

Moreover, as oft as we heare it thunder, let vs vnderstande that it is a sounde whiche proceedeth from the mouth of God: For our wittes must not friske and wanze away in the ayre, as though the Thunder were ingendered there, wythout the commaundement of a superiour mayster. Then let vs come vntoo God, and assure our selues that the thunder must needes bee ingendered by the power of his mouth. And when the ayre is so troubled, and all on a rore: let vs vnderstande that the same is no dead thing, but the very order which God hath stablished, wherby hys power is manifested vnto vs.

Yee see then what we haue to remember. But if we can perceyue that God moueth mens heartes by lightning, raine, and tempests: let vs assure our selues that we bee doublefolde guiltie before him, when wee be familiarly taught, not by a confuzed noyse, but by his woorde, so as hee offereth vs a doctrine that is certayne, and wherein we may be edified. And doubtlesse we deserue too bee much more grieuouſly condemned, if we take not profite of the hearing of this voyce, whereby hee dooth not ſtrike vs in feare, but comfort vs. True it is that when ſouer Gods worde is preached, the ende whereto it tendeth is to make vs feele our wants. For it is not withoute cauſe that Gods woorde is tearmed a twoo edged Heb. 4. c. 12. ſworde, to examine men, and to ſearch all their thoughts and affections. And for the ſame cauſe it is ſayde alſo, Ro. 15. d. 16. that we muſt be ſacrificed vnto God by the meanes of the Goſpell. There muſt then be a kinde of dying in vs, or elſe Gods worde ſhall neuer preuaile in vs. VVe muſt renounce our ſelues, & whatſoever is of our own nature muſt be beaten down. Thus ye ſee how our Lord thundereth and lightneth by his worde. But on the other ſide, by the ſelfe ſame worde he alſo quickeneth vs, cōforteth vs, and (to be ſhort) giueth vs a ſullioy, in that hee calleth vs to himſelf, & offereth vs his ſonne to guide vs thither, telling vs that in him we be aſſured of our ſaluation. So then ſeeing that God ſpeaketh ſo familiarly vnto vs, if we hearken not vntoo him too glorifie him, lyeth there 20 not a more grieuous and horrible damnation vpon vs, than vpon ſuch as neuer had any teaching, more than theyr onely beholding of the order of nature, and their hearing of the Thunder, and yet were moued inwardely at it?

True it is that this perceyuerance ſhall be ynough to condemne vs (as I haue ſayde already,) and although men had neuer heard cyther lawe or ſcripture: yet notwithstanding, if they lyued in this worlde, they haue not any excuſe: for God is ſufficiently declared vntoo 30 them too reprove them of malice and wilfull ſtubborneſſe. And vndoubtedly wee ſee that God hath tormented and as it were racked the greateſt deſpyſers of his Maieſtie that euer were, by his thunder: Reade the Storyes of the Heathen men, and yee ſhall ſee that the greateſt ſcorners of God that euer were, haue bene ſo frayde and affrighted, that mauger their heartes, they haue ſhewed at the hearing of the thunder: yea and confeſſed that there was a God aboue the thunders and tempeſts, whome they were inforced to feare. God hath 40 diſtreſſed the in ſuch wiſe, that they were ſet (as ye would ſay) vpon ſome man that had wrought high treaſon agaynſt his Prince. Euen the greateſt Princes of the worlde haue taken knowledge by thunders and tempeſts, that there was a God in heauen which gouerneth al. And that is a prooffe, that the thunder ought to be ynough to bowe the hardeſt heartes that can bee, ſeeing there is ſuch a marke of Gods Maieſtie in it. Then needeth there none other thing than the tempeſts and lightnings that are ſeene in the ayre, to condemne the dogges 50 and ſwine that make a mocke of all Religion. Although there were neither lawe nor doctrine in wryting: yet doth the onely thunder holde them conuicted, ſo that ſpite of their teeth they muſt bee faine to graunt that there is a God in Heauen.

So then this voyce whereof mention is made heere, will be ynough to condemne all the men in the worlde, although they had neuer heard nor read ſo much as one worde of doctrine. Howbeit we muſt alwayes come 60 to the compariſon that I haue touched: which is, that if Gods thundering in the ayre with a confuſed ſounde be a ſufficient ſpeaking to condemne the vnbeleuers, and his making of the lightnings too ſlaſh abroad, is a ſufficient light too condemne the blinde: what ſhall follow when hee ſpeaketh gently, and vſeth ſo amiable a manner of teaching, yea and euen liſpeth with vs, too the intent we might vnderſtande him the better? VVhen he not onely affrighteth vs not, but alſo allureth vs with gentleneſſe and courteſie too come vnto him, if wee bee ſtubborne agaynſt him, what ſhall become of vs? VVhat excuſe will there be for vs? And heere ye ſee why (in the Psal. 29. b. 9 Pſalme that I haue alledged) it is ſayde, that in the Temple of God euerie man ſhall giue God glorie. For after that the Prophet had ſpoken of this mightie voyce of God which maketh the mountaynes too remoue, the 10 Rockeſtoe melt away, the Earth too quake, the trees too fall downe from mounte Libanus, and the wylde Goates too ſlinke their Kiddeſ in the Forreſtes, and which moueth and ſhaketh the whole worlde: afterward he addeth, that God ſhall bee glorified in his Temple. And howe then? VVhen the lightningſ ſlaſh through the wings of the Earth, that is to ſay, ouer all the borders of the Earth, and the Thunderclappes are hearde from the one ſide of the worlde, to the other: ought not God to be knowne in all things, and ought not both greate and ſmal to do him homage? Yes verely. And wherefore then doth the Prophete ſpeake ſpecially of the Temple of God? It is according to the compariſon that I haue touched: which is, That God affrighteth and wakeneth the Heathen men when he thundereth: howbeit, that is not to bring them to ſaluation, but onely too conuince them vtterly, to the ende they ſhoulde not pretende any tryſing excuſe that they knewe not God nor his Maieſtie. They knewe him ſufficiently to their viter condemning, but as for vs, Gods intent is to drawe vs too ſaluation when hee ſpeaketh vntoo vs. For there hee 20 thundereth not too make the ayre rore, neyther maketh he a confuſed noyſe, as I haue ſayde: but hee ſpeaketh gently and familiarly, he vttereth his heart vnto vs, hee ſheweth vs which is the way of life, and he inlightneth vs with the brightneſſe of his worde which ſhineth vpon vs. Thus ye ſee why God deſerueth too bee glorified in hys Temple. For although hee bee manifeſted to the whole worlde, and all creatures are inuited too prayſe him, yea and that they be conſtreyned and inforced therevntoo: yet is there a farre other more mightie and royall power 30 in the worde that is preached vnto vs. For there God ſheweth and vttereth himſelfe in ſuch ſort, as wee muſt needes be worſe than brutiſh and blockiſh, if we thinke not vpon him too ſubmit our ſelues too all that is ſpoken to vs in his name and authoritie. Thus ye ſee what we haue to beare in minde.

And by the way let vs conſider howe malicious the worlde is, ſeeing that the woorde of God (for all that it is ſo well preached and knowne,) is notwithstanding ſo ill receyued of moſt men, and ſo little reuerenced, inſomuche that it ſhoulde ſeeme that men are purpoſed too ſpight God in reiecting all doctrine, notwithstanding that they knowe and are fullye aſſured that it is of him.

See ye not how rebellious the Papiftes are at this day? But let vs not go ſo farre, let vs come home among our ſelues. Men profeſſe themſelues to be minded to holde of the Goſpell, and yet notwithstanding, let them be ſpoken to in the name of God, let things be laid open before the, let matters be made ſo plain vnto them, that euen the verieſt diuels of them be cōuicted, that the things which are preached are taken out of the holy ſcripture: and yet they continue ſtill in their ſtubborneſſe, without making any cōſcience to ſtrive agaynſt God. Their maliciousneſſe is matched with ſhameleneſſe, inſomuch that me are come to ſuch point, as we neede not to go out of Geneua to ſee moſt manifeſt rebellion in ſetting light by God, or to ſee ſuch diueliſh pride as to ſay, Tuſhe God ſhall not raigne ouer vs, let them prattle and talke what they liſt, and yet

yet will we not yeelde a whitte for them. Verily there is such rebelliousnesse to be seene that men make as much account of the things that are spoken in Sermons, as of Fables. This thing is too notorious, the examples thereof are too open, and woulde God they were not such to our great confusion. But yet in the ende, they that haue dallyed so with so great a mayster, must bee faine too knowe him whome they haue wounded and pricked as the Prophete Zacharie sayeth. So then, it behoueth vs to marke well this sentence, and so to marke it, as we may bee more apt and willing to bee taught at Gods hand, than these wilde beastes are, which sharpen themselues agaynst him, too reiect all that concerneth his doctrine and pure woorde. For there is yet some shamefastnesse in the Papistes. VVhen they fight agaynst the holy Scripture, for the maintenance of their Idolatryes and abominations, they seeke false glozes and shiftes, and to bee short, although their couering of themselues be but with a wette sacke, yet notwithstanding they confesse that their intent is not too resist God. But when men steppe foorth with such vngodlinesse, as they cannot finde in theyr heartes to receyue one worde of that which is knowne too bee Gods truth, but frotte and chafe agaynst it, so as there is not so much honestie in them as to admitte the thing which they knowe to be good, but doo the cleane contrarie: is it not manifest therein, that we bee much worse than the wretched Papistes? VVherefore (as I sayde) at leastwise let thys serue vs for a warning, that we bee not doublefolde condemned. And specially aboue all things, sith hee cometh vnto vs, and speaketh too vs, and gathereth vs together in his name, to the ende to be heard, and to sitte in such wise among vs, as all of vs both great and small may referre our selues to him: let vs bethinke vs to glorifie him: not only with our mouth, by confessing slightly that we be his: but also [with our deedes] by giuing proof in effect that we be desirous to be his heritage. And sith he vouchsafeth this incomprehensible benefit, grace, and honour vpon vs, to giue himselfe to vs, and to be our life: let there also bee an interchaungeable gift on our side. let vs put our selues wholly into his hande, let him possesse vs, and let him inioy vs. Furthermore, whereas it is sayde, that God dooth great and mightie things in thundering, and in sending forth lightnings and tempests, and that we comprehend it not: let vs be sure that in speaking both by his lawe, and by his Gospell, hee intendeth to lift vs vp aboue all our vnderstanding, as in verie deede we shall neuer profite in the doctrine of God, nor in his word that is set forth vnto vs, if we haue not this principle, that is to wit, that God exerciseth vs in secrets that surmount all our capacite: according as it is sayde, that God hath prepared suche things for those that loue him, as neuer eye of man sawe, nor eare of man hearde, nor neuer entered into the heart of anie creature. Then if wee haue not that grounde, wee shall neuer taste the things that are preached to vs euerie day. Nowe to the intent wee may taste them well, what is to be done? Let vs consider that our Lorde calleth vs to his heavenly kingdome, and is minded to draw vs out of this worlde. Intend we then to be good schoollers, and to profite in the doctrine of our Lorde Iesus Christ? Sith we see that we be plunged [ouer heade and eares] in this worlde, and in these corruptible things: let vs labour too wade out, and let vs from day to day fight against our owne affections, that we may draw neere vnto God, and be made alone with our Lord Iesus Christ, according as Saint Paule sheweth vs in the thirde to the Collosians, that if wee minde to haue part in heauen, and to cleaue vnto Iesus Christ, who is gone vp aloft, and to bee made one with him: it behoueth vs to mortifie whatsoeuer is of the earth. Furthermore, let vs consider that oure wittes are too rude and feeble too conceyue what God is in full perfection, inso much that we shall neuer haue any small taste of him, except hee guide vs by his holy Spirit, according also as Saint Paule maketh the same conclusion in the foresayde text which I touched, where he cyteth the saying of the Prophete Eiaj. Therefore after hee hath sayde that the sensuall man comprehendeth not the secretes of God: he sayeth we bee renewed by the holy Ghost, too the ende we may haue knowledge of them. True it is that we haue not bene of counsell with God, according as hee declareth there againe afterwarde. But yet dooth hee admit vs counsell so farre foorth as is expedient for vs. Therefore when as wee knowe our owne inirmitie, let vs pray him to inlighten vs by his holy spirit, that wee may know the things which otherwise would be to high and profounde for vs.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may bee touched with them, to condemne our selues for them, and to mislike of our selues: and that in the meane while he will so worke by his holy spirit, as we may be renewed to obey him, and to walke in his feare: and that we may profit therein more and more, vntill such time as being quite rid of all fleshly corruptions, we be clothed againe with his righteousnesse and heavenly glorie. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heavenly father &c.

7. He sealeth the handes of all men, to the ende to knowe the men of his vvorke.
8. The beastes shrinke into their dennes, and keepe themselues vwithin their lodgings.
9. He maketh the vwhirlewinde to come out of a heape, and the colde commeth from the scattering vvinde.
10. At the breath of God the frost is giuen, and againe aboundant vvaters oute of a narrowve place.
11. Hee maketh the Cloudes to labour to moysten, and sendeth rayne, and maketh the Cloude to shedde out through his light.
12. Hee maketh the circles to turne about by his gouernance, to the ende to doo vvhat he commaundeth ouer the vvhole vvorld.
13. VVhither it be for a scourge, or for his Earth, or of mercie that he taketh it avway.

We saw yesterday, that the astonishment which men conceyue of the thunder, is as a prooffe of Gods maiestie and power. According therunto it is sayde heere, that God in thundering, doth as it were set a seale vpon mens handes, to keepe them close, namely, to the ende to knowe the men of his making. And the beastes also are faine to shrinke intoo their dennes. As if it were sayde, that God draweth men a part, as if some bodie should gather all his folke together, a householder his household meynie, a prince his subiects, or a Capitaine his souldiours, too the intent to muster them. Thus yee see the cheefe intent of this streyne. And the same extendeth euen too the wilde Beastes, too shewe that euen they also are in the hande of God. And hee proueth that they are at his commaundement when it pleaseth him, if by nothing else, yet euen by the thunder, in that the same compelleth them too bee as it were shet vp in prison. In verie deede this verse is commonly translated, That God setteth as it were a Seale vpon mennes handes, to the intent they shoulde knowe their owne woorkmanship: as who shoulde say, that all the frowardnesse which men haue too applie themselves to one thing or other, is by reason that God hath printed a marke vpon them, and that they haue it not otherwise than by instruction giuen them from heauen. But the text will not suffer it too bee vnderstoode so. VVorde for worde it is, to the ende to knowe the men of his making. It followeth therefore that God doth then knowe men, when he holdeth them after that maner as it were locked and shet vp within their houses. To the ende that this may be vnderstoode the better: when men haue libertie to go and run, it seemeth that they be as it were exempted from subiection. If it be fayre weather, one goes into the feeldes, another in the streetes, and so men leeme not too bee hilde any more vnder subiection. But if it bee fowle weather, so as it thunder, or that there is any blustering winde abroad: then men are faine too keepe within doores. Therefore it is like as if a man should assemble his housholde and say to them, I will know how they behaue themselves, and what euerie man doth, and euerie man shall make me his account. Lo howe God appoynteth men a time to be gathered together, to the ende too make his musters, and to shewe that all are in subiection vnto him. And this (as I sayde) extendeth euen too the wilde beastes. For when the Leastes wander abroad, they seeme not to be in subiection to God. But when he maketh some tempestes, so as they bee driuen home to their dennes: then must men needes perceyue, that God hath a secreete bridle to holde them with, when he listeth. We see then, that the thing that was treated of yesterday is declared heere yet more expressly: that is to witte, that the thunder is the messenger of Gods Maiestie, not onely in that it astonisheth men: but also in that it compelleth them to hide themselves in their houses: which is all one as if God shewed that hee holdeth men in his hande, and that mennes going and comming abroad, is because hee giueth them leaue, howebeit that he could holde them shette vp at his pleasure. Sith wee see this, let vs learne too yeelde obedience vnto God at all times. For if wee acknowledge not the subiection that wee owe vnto God. But when it thundereth: we shall haue profited but slenderly in his doctrine. Neuerthelessse the same is a putting of vs in remembrance, to consider that he ruleth all our steppes, and that wee cannot stirre one finger withoute his guiding. Therefore let vs acknowledge it, and learne too bee subiect too him at all tymes, and to suffer ourselves too bee governed by him. Lo what wee leaue to beare away in this streyne. And if we haue not this aduisednesse and discretion with vs, behold the verie beastes are able too teach vs. For wherefore do the Lions, Beares, VVoolues, and all other wilde beastes, keepe themselves in their Caues and Dennes: but because God sheweth himselfe too bee superiour ouer them. Therefore if wee will needes runne astray, and not suffer God to holde vs as it were shet vp vnder his hand, but will shake off the signet or Seale that is spoken off heere: the Beastes shall condemne vs by their example. Beholde yet further what wee haue too beare in mynde, that wee may the better profite our selues by the whole sentence. The Hebrewewoorde that Eliu vseth heere, signifyeth properly too Seale, as when men seale a Letter, to the ende it shoulde not bee looked intoo. Also a man maye seale a Cofer, or a Cuptoorde, by setting a Seale vpon it, when he will not haue anie bodie too looke intoo it. God then vseth a dreadfull kinde of sealing, when hee sendeth thunder and tempestes. Heere is no printing of waxe with a ring or other material Seale: but he compelleth men too keepe themselves as it were shet vp, so as they be after a sort close prisoners in their owne house. It is not with their owne good wittes: and therefore let them consider that there is a mayster aboue them, and that no part of their whole life is in their own hande. Thus yee see howe this similitude is set downe heere, to the ende we should compare the incomprehensible maiestie of God, with all the things that we can see among the worldly creatures. And it is sayde immediately, that God maketh the tempest to come out of the beape of Clowdes, and againe, that it is the scattering winde, or the Northwinde that causeth the colde to come. These chaunges heere do set forth Gods mightie power the better, to the ende hee shoulde bee glorified thereby. Truly if God kept alwayes one ordinarie rate, so as there were neuer greate heate, nor great colde, nor anye winde or raine, but that the ayre were alwayes temperate, and suche a measure were kept, as men might continually feele themselves disposed after one manner: it were a thing more to our liking. If wee were delt with after oure owne desyre, wee coulde finde in oure heartes too haue a continuall springtyme, so it might bee too oure profite. Then like as the heate combereth vs, so also the colde greueth vs, and wee would faine bee exempted from them both, and haue the ayre so temperate, as nothing might bee misliked, nor nothing go agaynste our myndes. But in the meane while, Gods glorie is better perceyued in the chaunges that are made: as when hee causeth raine too fall vpon the grounde, and anon after scattereth the Clowdes, and remoueth them, rayseth vp whirlwindes, and causeth colde to succede heate: the same doth better set out his Maiestie and also waketh vs, to the ende we shoulde thinke thereon. For we see how dull mens wittes are, and therefore it is requisite that we shoulde be touched more to the quicke. True it is that if we had the witte too looke vpon God with a cleare and pure eyesight: his giuing of vs life and sustenance in this worlde woulde bee ynough for vs.

But for so much as we be so grosse, and therewithall also so malicious, that wee neuer come vnto him except hee diuine vs perforce: it is for our behoofe to be touched by the chaunges that are made. For when wee see the weather fayre, and then sodainly the ayre is troubled: when the Clowdes thicken after a heate: when a raine commeth and cleareth the ayre, and by and by followeth a frost: when there is suche as drought a it maye seeme that the Earth shall bee brunt vpe, and anon anon God sendeth the cloudes and maketh them labour to releue vs if he intend too giue vs seasonable weather: I say when we see such alteracions: then must wee needs be woofe than blockish if we thinke not vpon God. And vndoubtedly (as I sayd afore) he bringeth himself to our remembrance, and sheweth himself after a more manifest and visible maner, than if things should alwayes kepe on in their owne course. This is the cause why Eliu standeth so much vpon this text, to lay fourth and expresse the alterations that are made in the aire by fayre wether and fowle, by heate and cold, by cloudes & cleere wether, by whirlwinds and frosts, and by diuers other things. And for the same cause also it is sayd, that God by his gouernment maketh the Circles to turne about: for I expound this as though it were sayd, that the world is renewed when such alteracions happen. If there were but one season all the yeare long: things would looke alwayes after one sort. But when as the Sunne shyneth one day, and anon after is suddenly hidden and couered: behold, there are as it were two diuerse worlds, and such varietie pro-20 keth vs to consider the better, that there is a God which gouerneth all things. For howe is it possible that things should alter in such wise, and that there should bee such a turning about: but that God woorketh it about? VVe see one while that the earth is shet vp with cold, and that the ayre also is possessed with it: and contrary wise we see that all is set at libertie again by fayre and pleasant wether: Lo heere new worlds. And so it is not without cause that Eliu addeth for a conclusion, that God maketh the Circles (that is to say the world) to turne about, making them too 30 change now after one fashyon, and now after another. And why? To the intent that if wee bee not sufficiently taught by one meane, wee should lift vp our countenance to heauen, and looke round about vs, that at leastwise by beholding the sodein alteracions that are made, wee myght be prouoked the more to knowe God, that hee myght be glorified, according also as we haue more occasion so to do. This is it that we haue to remember in this streyne. And now wee see that the moe meanes that God giueth vs to come to him, that we myght bee taught too 40 feare and honour him: so much the lesse can wee excuse our vnthankfulnessse, and so much the more shall we bee to blame if wee cannot profit ourselues by them. Therefore there is nother fayre weather nor fowle, heate nor cold, hayle nor tempest, which shal not set it self against vs at the iudgement of God. They shall beare witnessse agaynst vs, to discouer and shewe the lewdnesse that is in vs, by cause we haue not honored him that hath shewed himself so many wayes, and on all sides allured vs to behold his maiestie. And therefore as oft as the weather 50 chaungeth, although the alteracions be troublesome too vs at the first sight: yet let vs vnderstand that they bee for our welfare, for by that meanes God wakeneth vs, as I sayd afore. The hauing of fayr weather were ynough too befotte vs, if there should be no change. But if rayne come, then wee thinke with ourselues, verie well, God can make a new world in the turning of a hand, yea euen without perishing of the substance of it at all: Howbeit the fashyon of it shall be so defaced, as it shall seeme to be new turkined. Now then, when wee consider this: wee 60 knowe that Gods vsing of such alteration as we see, is for our welfare and saluation. Furthermore let vs marke well the fashyons of speeche that are set downe heere. For if there be a greate drought, the skye seemeth to be of yron or brasse, and after the same maner also doeth the Holye Leuit. 26. c. scripture speake of it. VWhen God threatneth to punish 19 & Deut. men by taking away the Rayne, he sayeth, I will giue you 23. an earth of yron, and a heauen of brasse: the earth shall be shet vp so as shee shall not open hir breasts to giue you sucke, and the heauen also shal bee so hard, as it shal giue you no rayne. Now if Rayne come after a great drought: the same is the more woonderfull: for men would not haue looked for such a change, if they had not seene it come to passe. Therefore they maruell at it. But the woondrednesse dimmeth our eyesight, and maketh vs not too esteeme Gods miracles as we ought to do. Neuerthelesse, when the wether is so soone chaunged and altered, and so suddenly darkened: the thing in it self sheweth a singular woorking of God. Also it is sayd, that God maketh the cloudes to labour to moisten the earth: namely as though they cliued asunder and emptied themselues, that the earth might receiue nurrishment. Marke this labour wher-vnto God imployeth the cloudes for our seruice, in that he dreepech downe the Rayne from them, and afterward when they haue sucked vp the moysture from beneath, they yeeld ouer their nurrishment backe again, and in the end wanze away and consume to nothing. Therefore whē wee heare that God guideth his creatures after that maner, to imploy them too our vse, as if he should send vs menseruants and maydeseruants for wages: let vs therein acknowledge his infinite goodnesse. And this is not sayd of the cloudes only: but also of the Sunne and the Moone, which are right noble creatures, & yet neuerthelesse God Deut. 4. c. 19. voutsafereth to imploy them to our vse.

Seing then that so much is sayde of the Sunne and Moone whom God imployeth to our seruice: therein we see the loue that he beareth vs, and how hyghly we are in his fauour, and how precieuse our life is vnto him. Truely this commeth not of our owne woorthinesse, for who are we? And yet notwithstanding, behold howe God submitteth the heauens to our vse. So much the more then haue men playd the beastes in woorsipping the Sunne and the Moone: and for the same cause God telleth them in way of vpbrayding, that he had appoynted them to do them seruice. Therefore seing that God maketh the clouds and the earth also to labour and trauell after that sort: let vs remember that bothe aboue and beneath, he sheweth vs more than a fatherly loue, making vs to feele his goodnesse, to the intent we should consider how dere and welbeloued we be of him, notwithstanding the wretchednesse that is in vs. For we be not woorthie to be reckened among the residue of his creatures. If men bee compared with the earth, with the aire, or with the verye brute beasts: it is certain that they are vnwoorthie to be nurrished heere. And why? By cause we be corrupted and marred: and therefore we haue so much the more cause to magnifie Gods goodnesse towards vs. Furthermore, wheras it is sayd, that he chaungeth away the cloudes with his 50 bryghtnesse: it is yet one change more, which is woonderfull and ought to make vs too perceyue the hand of God. For behold, when the wether is close, it seemeth to vs that wee haue quite and cleane lost the sight of the Sunne. And if wee were not acquainted with such alteracions, wee would thinke that the water threated too burye vs out of hand. And in good sooth what are the cloudes when they haue so ouercast the whole ayre, and that the earth is so wet as men see? Are they not as it were a graue? Now then, God maketh the clouds to vanishe away in a minute of an hour: and to whom may that be imputed? Truely wee will say, to the order of nature: we will say, to custome. But howsoeuer it be, yet must we needes perceyue the hand of God if wee be not too blockish. Therefore let vs beare in mynd, that it is no superfluous take whē Eliu seth this diuersitie of matters, to shewe the maiestie that God setteth forth in the world by the sayd varietie of tymes, to the intent too drawe vs vnto 22. v. too

too him. And he sayeth expressly that he sendeth both clewdes and whirlywyndes: and all to do the things that he hath or-deyned through the whole world. As if he should say, that it behoueth vs alwayes to consider Gods mightie power and dominion ouer all things which wee see, that we may learne to perceyue our owne sinnes when he punisheth vs, (as he will ad again anon) and also to the end we may foraste of his goodnesse, as we may be thoroughly filled with it when it pleaseth him to handle vs gently. To the end then that wee may knowe these things: let vs con-<sup>10</sup> sider that the creatures gouerne not themselues, but that God dispozeth of the as he thinketh good: and that is, too do whatsoeuer he commaundeth vpon the earth.
Heerof wee haue a good lesson too gather. For what is the cause that wee bee so afrayd of thunder and of other things, but for that wee feare not God? And it is a iust punishment of our vnbeleef. Men will not feare God: and whither sendeth he them? Euen too the sen-slesse creatures: and that is to put them to the greater shame. Looke vpon a despyzer of God, which tram-<sup>20</sup> pleth all religion vnder foote: he is caryed away with a diuelish rage: he shaketh off all difference of good and euill: and yet notwithstanding he is inforced too bee afrayd of the thunder, insomuch that hee is as it were out of his wittes and in a traunce. Marke the payment which all they deserue that are loth too yeeld obedience vntoo God: they stand in awe of a senslesse creature.

So then let vs learne to graunt our God the mightie power which belongeth vntoo him, to the end wee may<sup>30</sup> bee exempted from this fearfulness which the ignorant and vnbeleeuers haue, and all the cankerharted sort, and the despyzers of all religion. For if wee knowe that God guideth and gouerneth the tempestes: then shall wee perceyue that being in his hand wee shall bee free from all daunger when it pleaseth him. The thunder can doo nothing. And although wee see it flye abroad, and shoote from heauen to the earth in a moment: Yet is it still in the hand of God. And therefore like as a sword cannot wound men when it is eyther flat vpon<sup>40</sup> the earth, or when it is in the scabberd: euen so is it with the thunder and lightening: they can do nothing simply of themselues, but God darteth them where hee listeth. If wee once knowe this, wee shall not bee afrayd of the thunder. True it is that it will abashe vs, but therwithall it will serue vs for a spurre too pricke vs fore-ward, that wee may bee confirmed in the feare of God, and profit more and more therein. Neuertheless whatsoeuer come of it, wee cannot bee dismayed at the thunder, bycause wee are sure that God dispozeth of it, and<sup>50</sup> that we ourselues also are in his cuttodie, so as the thunder cannot doo any thing against vs more than pleaseth him, likewise wee must not bee afrayd of the hayle, but of him that sendeth it. VVee must not bee ouerfearfull of a tempest so as wee should bee dismayed at it: but wee must tremble before the maiestie of our God: and when wee haue trembled, wee must mortifie all our fleshly affections, and take the comfort which hee giueth vs on the contrarie part in shewing himself a father towards vs.

Behold (I say) how wee ought to put this sentence in vre. But these creatures also must serue vs for example.
For sith wee see that the rayne, the wyndes, the stormes and all things do execute whatsoever God commaundeth them, what ought wee to doo? Hath the rayne eares too heare what God appoynteth? nother Sunne, nor earth, nor clouds, nor ayre, haue any reason or vnderstand-ing: and yet wee see that all these creatures serue and obey God. There falleth not one drop of rayne too the ground, without his will. The Sunne doeth nother ryze nor set, otherwise than God hath limited his pace and assigned his course, in somuch that hee misseth not one twinceling of an eye of it. As much is too bee sayde of all other creatures. As for vs then which haue speeche, which haue eares too heare, which haue vnderstanding and reason: haue wee not sufficient euidence too condemne vs, if wee apply not all those things to the obeying of our God, seing that the whole order of nature is nought else than a proof of the obedience which all creatures bothe at oue and beneath doo yeeld vntoo God?

VVee (as hath bene sayd alreadye) are men of his making: for (as it is also sayd in the Psalme) It is not man that made himself, but it is God that made him. Seing<sup>Psa. 100. 4. 3</sup> then that wee hold all things of him: ought the strength (which he hath giuen vs) to bee as a furie to rush against him and to resist him, and to stop his will from hauing free course? And yet notwithstanding, that is the marke that all our indeuers shoote at. For if wee consider wherin men are moste forward: we shall finde that they neuer leaue resisting of God and fighting against him, so as all their seeking is to abolishe his truth, wher-in wee see so much the greater spytfulness. Therefore let vs bee sure, that the rayne, wynde, stormes, tempests and such other like things, shall giue a glosse too this diuelish rebelliousnesse of ours, in that wee cease not too prouoke Gods wrath, and too plucke men from obeying of him, and from submitting themselves too his will, too bee quietly governed by him. Lo what wee haue to marke in the second place of this sentence, where it is sayd, that through the vniuersali world the creatures doo whatsoeuer God hath ordeyned. Nowe in effect wee see heere the prouidence of God in the order of nature.
Howbeit wee must come backe too that which was treated yesterday, as Eliu bringeth vs to it. Hee sayeth, whither it bee for his scourge, or for his earth or for his mercie. In saying so, he sheweth (as was touched yesterday) that it is not ynough too knowe that all things are vnder Gods hand, and that nothing is doone but by his will and disposing: but wee must also marke the end of his purpose, and the causes why he woorketh so. But as nowe our witts are feeble, insomuch that although God chawe our meate too vs, yet can wee not digest it in our minds.

The doctrine is set foorth vntoo vs by percellmeale, and God maketh it as familiar as can bee: and yet wee bee so dulheaded, that wee vnderstand it not as were requisite. How should wee doo then if wee had but only a generall knowledge of Gods gouerning of the world, and that wee had not a better and more particular instruction wherby to knowe his goodnesse, iustice, and wis-dome, too the end wee myght bee drawne to his feare, and settle ourselues vpon the trust of his mercie? That is the cause why it is sayd heere agayne, whither it bee for a scourge, or for his earth, or for his mercie. VVheras it is sayd whither it bee for a scourge: therby Eliu sheweth, that God chastizeth the world by rayne, heate, cold, tempests, and stormes. These then are euery one of them Gods scourges, wherewith he smiteth vs for our sinnes.
Yet notwithstanding it is not for vs only that he hath created the world: considering that he pitieth the earth saying that it is his. Also men are not woorthie that hee should vse mercie towards them: Howbeit he myndeth too maynteyne the earth as his owne woorkmanship, which afterward serueth for them. Then may he sometymes haue an eye to himself and to the thing that hee hath created, so as he restrayneth his rigour, and executeth

teth it not to the fall, but moderateth it, notwithstanding that wee haue prouoked him. Therefore it behoueth vs to consider his gracious goodnesse in that point about allover. For vnlesse he forgie vs our finnes, or at leastwise beare with them for a tyme: surely the earth should perish vnder vs, and all the world should be consumed, yea euen to our vtter destruction. So then, God giueth a ryght greate record of his mercie, in that it pleaseth him too spare vs after this maner. And this conclusion ought too serue vs to double purpose. The one is to confirme that which hath bene set forth already.

And the other (as was told you yesterday) is too make vs feare God, and to serue him, and too put our whole trust in him. I say that this discourse concerning Gods gouernement in respect of the world, is the better warranted when wee see the diuerse fashyons of it, with the varietie of changes. As for example: Peradventure God too chastize vs, sendeth some dearth. Now the dearth commeth of some one of the causes afore mentioned: namely eyther of frost, or of drought, or of noysome rayne, or of tempests, and so the aire punisheth vs. But the aire is a senselesse thing. Is it the rayne that be-thinketh it self to correct our faults? Men may alledge vs naturall reasons, and saye that the rayne, the wynds, and the stormes are ingendered by suche meanes and such.

The Philosophers can well bring reasons, too saye that it hath some beginning, and that it is disposed by some inferior causes. But in the meane season, doo not the chastizements that God sendeth vpon vs, come of him? Shall any man father them vpon inferior causes? Behold, there is a countrie that was misgouerned, and it was meete that Gods hand should passe vpon it, according wherevntoo there commeth a rough scourge vpon it: nowe shall wee saye that this was of natures working? Ought wee not too acknowledge, that it is the iudge of heauen which chastizeth countries, and sheweth vs that wee cannot scape his hand when wee haue doone amisse? So then let vs bee sure that God vttereth his fauour and goodnesse when hee sendeth vs reasonable and pleasant weather, and contrariwise, that he punisheth our finnes and transgressions, when hee sendeth vs foule and vnseasonable weather. Now if we knowe this, namely that the rayne is not rayzed of his owne naturall mouing, nor the stormes and tempests ingendered without Gods sending and appointing of them to whatfoeuer he thinketh good: this doctrine shall bee so much the better ratified. Lo howe this speciall conclusion leadeth vs so much the better vntoo God. But there is also a second poynt: which is, that seeing that the rayne, whirlwyndes and hayle are Gods scourges, wee must learne too humble ourselues when hee correcteth vs. Let him not stryke vpon vs in vayne, but let vs bee plyable vnder him, too the end too humble ourselues in such wyse, as he may reygne quietly ouer vs. Truly it is a fowle shame for vs that wee must bee driuen too his seruice by force and by mayne stroks of the cudgell, seeing that he allureth vs so gently: Is it the nature of a child too looke too bee so enforced, and too bee loth too come too his father but by compulsion? Yet notwithstanding God is fayne too worke after that fashyon with vs, and considering our stubbornnesse and vntowardnesse to bee handled, he is conitreynd to vse roughnesse. At leastwise yet let vs then bow vnder him, when wee feele his rough strokes, in stryking vs with hayle, rayne, thunder, wynd, frost, tempests, and drought. Therefore when as wee feele so smart blowes, and the hand of God maketh vs to quake, and that the same feare serueth not to dismay vs, but to bring vs vnder his lure that wee myght craue forgiveness of our finnes: let vs learne that wee bee woorthie too bee so beaten, and let vs further vnderstand: that wee shall not ceasse to prouoke his vengeance more and more, except he graue vs harts by his holie spirit. So then ye see how Gods scourges ought to stirre vs vp to come vnto him, to the intent too feare and honour him. Heerewithall let vs marke, that whereas it is sayde for Iob earth: God hath a respect to himself when he destroyeth vs not vtterly. Do wee then see that God suffereth vs too liue? Although it be with manye aduersities: yet doo we see a fauour and forbearing in him. For needes should we be vtterly wyped away at the first brunt, if he should deale with vs after our deseruing.

And therefore let vs marke how it is sayd, that God doth it for his earthes sake. Yea. for we be not woorthie to haue it doone for our saks: and therefore he shetteth his eyes and voutsafeth not to thinke vpon so shamefull creatures as we bee. Yee see heere a disdeyne set forth vntoo vs: that is to wit, that if God had none other consideration than of vs, he myght rend vp bothe heauen and earth to destroy vs. And this serueth to bereeue vs of all our pride, and to make vs so much the more ashamed, too the end we might leaue our flattering of our selues: for wee see that men would fayne hyde their owne filthinesse. In what plight so euer they be, they cease not to like well of themselves, and to conceyue I wote not what a vaine imagination that they be of greate valewe. But it is sayd heere, that God esteemeth and valeweth the earth at more than we deserue to be esteemed at. Neuertheless, too the intent we should not be dismayed, he addeth purposely, that therethrough, God setteth forth his mercie. Hath he then abasshed vs by saying that hee disdeyneth to haue respect to vs? He turneth again and sayeth, yet will I vse pitie, and make you feele my mercie. I will spare you. Yea: Howbeit, not bycause we be woorthie of it, (for we must alwayes conclude, that whatfoeuer God doo for vs, he hath not respect vntoo any thing that is in vs) but when we bee once come too humilitie, and acknowledge that wee haue deserued too be destroyed at Gods hand then doeth he shewe vs that hee by his goodnesse surmounteth our naughtinesse. This is the cause why hee addeth in the end, That God doeth it euen of his mere goodnesse and mercie. Now herof we haue to gather, that if raine come in due season, and faire weather also when wee would wishe it: wee haue not deserued that God should deale so gently with vs, nother must our myndes come vpon any wages that he yeeldeth vs, as though he were bound to vs, and that wee on our side were such as he of duetie ought to vse so tenderly as his childrē. VVhat then? It is his mere mercie: for we deserued wel to starue for hunger.

Then is there no reason why he should send vs nourishment, but only bycause he is good and pitifull. VVee deserue to be rooted out of the world, and he reacheth out his hand too feede vs as a father doeth his children. Therin therefore we see his undeserued goodnesse. Lo how wee ought too magnifie God in all the benefites that he dealeth vntoo vs, not taking them as any wages or hyre (as I sayd) which he ought too paye vs, and which wee haue deserued at his hand: but as free giftes of his mere goodnesse and liberalitie towards vs. And herevpon we haue to conclude, that in as much as he beareth with vs, and that euen after we haue offended him and ought to be ouerwhelmed by his hand he ceaseth not to play the father stil, yea euen vpon our bodies which are but carions, smoke, & things of nought. inasmuch (say I) as our Lord woorketh so bountifully towards our bodyes: wee ought ought to bee confirmed in a ryght trust, that he will receyue vs to mercie, and be ready to forgiue vs our faults whensoever we aske forgiueneffe at his hand. So then we see how our Lord doeth dayly call vs to saluacion. For we cannot eate one bit of bread, nor vse any of the temporall benefites that he bestoweth vpon vs: but he openeth heauen vnto vs to say, come to mee, and I will bee your father and haue mercie vpon your sinnes. Yee shall alwayes find mee readie to receiue you, so ye desire to bee maynteyned by my mere mercie.

God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him so to touche vs to the quick, that we mistaking ourselues, may desire earnestly to be clenzed by his grace: and therewithall that inasmuch as in all the order of nature he giueth vs so faire lookingglasses of his glorie, goodnesse and iustice, wee in beholding them, may be rauished to walk in his feare, so as we may serue and honor him, and yeld our selues wholly too his obeyfance, too the end that hee may leade vs peasably whither it pleaseth him. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, &c.

The cxlvj. Sermon, which is the third vpon the. xxxvij. Chapter.

14. Heare these things o Job: stay thyself, and consider the vvonders of God.
15. Knowest thou how God hath set them a lawe, and how he maketh the lyght too shyne out of his clovvd?
16. Vnderstandest thou the scatterings of the clovuds, and the miracles of him that is perfect in knowvledge?
17. How thy clothes are * vvarme vwhen he maketh the Sovvthvwind to blowve?
18. VVart thou vvith him to stretch out the heauen, vvwhich is fast as a molten glasse?
19. Tell vs vvhat vvee shall say too him: for vvee cannot order our matters bycause of darknesse.
20. If thou speake, vvho vvill report it too him? and if any man tellit him, shal he not be svalloued vp?
21. VVhen the Sunne is hid men see not his lyght: and again the vvind blowveth and bringeth clernesse.
22. Fayre vvether commeth from the north: and therefore God ought too bee exalted vvith prayse.
23. He is myghtie in his goodnesse: he is strong in povver, in iudgement, and in iustice: and he afflicteth not.
24. Therefore doo men feare him, and hee vvill not regard any that are vvize in their ovyne conceyt.

If we knewe what is sayd heere of the woorkes of God, that is to witte that they be wonderfull: there is none of vs but he would take much more peyne to consider them, specially seeing our witts are so slender and frayle. But what we think ourselues to see fully, that euen with one little cast of our eye wee haue learned all that is too bee knowne, and in the meane whyle we esteeme not Gods woorkes according to their woorthinesse: they are but as common things to vs, bycause we be accustomed to them, and so wee ouerpasse them lightly. Therefore it behoueth vs to marke wel what is conteyned in this verse, where on the one side Eliu protesteth: that all Gods woorkes are miracles: and on the other side it sayth it behoueth vs to stay vpon the, namely bycause our wit is so feeble to haue any true knowledge of them out of hand. Therefore we had neede to bestowe all our studie therupon. Furthermore we be commaunded expressly too hearken: for except God speake vnto vs, as for vs, we may well apply all our witts to the considering of his woorkes: but we shall neuer come to the cheef point. Ye see then how we haue three poynts to beare in mynd. The one concerneth the excellencie and maiestie that is to be seene in all Gods woorkes, so as they be not to bee despized. The second is, that forasmuch as men are rude and grossewitted, their looking vp on the things that God setteth afore them, must not bee with casting their eye aside at them with a glance and awaye: but they must stay vpon them, and sette their minds throughly to them, and be diligent in them to the vttermost. The third is, that they must not trust in their owne reason, nor thinke themselues to haue skill ynough to iudge of them: but consider how it belongeth to God to shewe vs by his woord what wee haue to conceyue, and that that is the point wherat wee must begin, and that till wee haue bene at Gods schole, wee shall haue but a dim eyesight, so as his woorkes shall passe away before vs, and wee not perceiue them as were requisite for vs to do: and to be short, we shall haue no discretion at all vntill God haue made vs wize. Yet these things neede not so greatly to bee layd fourth at length, as to bee well eyed of euery of vs. And therefore as oft as wee come too the considering of Gods woorkes, let vs lift vp our witts aloft to reuerence them: that is to say, to honour Gods infinite wisdome, power, & rightuousnesse which appeare in them. Let that serue for one point. To bee short, whosoeuer thinketh vpon Gods woorkes, without reuerencing of them, that is to say, without yeelding him honour, and without acknowledging them to be full of wisdome, power, and goodnesse: he is vnkynd and trayterouse vnto God. And therefore as oft as any man speaks to vs of Gods woorkes, let vs yeeld this reuerence to them, to take them as miracles that surmount all our witts, and wherein God vttereth his maiestie after such a sorte, as wee haue good cause to honour him. Besides this, (as I haue touched already) we must on the other side consider what is in ourselues, to the end we take not our selues to be so sharpwitted, as too knowe al things in a moment. Then let vs be contented to breathe vpon the things that we conceiue not at the first sight, and let vs not bee weerie of that studie. If we haue liued a good whyle in the world, and bee still but as nouices; and haue haue not that perfect vnderstanding which were to be wished: yet let vs not be out of hart, but go forward still with our studie, for we shall haue profited much, if we can in our whole life haue learned to vnderstand the woonders that are conteyned in the woorks of God. Howbeit it is true that it behoueth vs to go on still forward: and whereas in this place heere is mention made of staying, it is not ment that wee should bee ydly occupied in gazing about: for our musing vpon God must not hinder our seruing of him nor our imploying of our selues about the things that he hath appointed. It is cleane contrariwyse: that is to wit, the more a man considereth Gods woorks, the more ought he to bee stirred vp to do his duetic, and the more ought he to bee prouoked and thrust forward therunto. Truly they that stay in thinking vpon Gods woorks, do but as it were go backe too leape the better. For the end of it is that wee should not be wanderers as we see men do, which runne trotting vp and downe from place to place, and could find in their harts to remoue the world with them when they be so letted in their enterprises. But what for that? They may well breake their armes and leggs, and yet be neuer the further forward, if they hold not the right way. VVhat is to be doone then? Let vs be guided by sober aduisednesse. And so let vs stay in such wise vpon Gods woorks, as we may bee restreyned from wãdering after that sort, and not become stragglers. Howbeit therewithall let vs also apply ourselues to that which God commaundeth, and let that be our marke too shoote at. Furthermore let vs assure ourselues that of our owne nature we haue nother wit nor reason to giue care vnto God: for it belongeth to him to shewe vs what wee ought to consider in his woorks, that we may fare the better by them. True it is that the heathen men haue disputed curiously of the secrets of nature, and in a maner nothing hath bene hidden from them. Yea: but all was but a musing vpon the world, and not a comming vntoo God. And what else is such wisdome than a confuzed dungeon? For what an vnthankfulnesse is it, that men should so curiously serche out all Gods woorks, and not thinke vpon the maker of them, nor any whit regard him? Therefore cursed be the wisdome, which buzieth it self about the curiouse serching out of the inferiour or lower causes, and in the meane while despizeth the maker. Yet notwithstanding it is certaine that God gaue vnderstanding to those that treated so curiously of the order of nature: howbeit forasmuch as they heard not God speake, ne had his woord to guide them aright: they missed their way. For the cheef point was that they should haue submitted themselues vnto God, and considered his glorie which appeareth to vs in all his woorks: but they did it not. So then let vs marke well, that whensoever we reade these greate philosophers, or heare them speake, & perceyue how they knewe the things that seeme incomprehensible to vs: they be as lookingglassees of the blindness that is in all men, vntill that God haue taught them in his schole. Are we sharperwitted than those men were? VVe come farre short of them: and yet wee see they had not any taste of God. And therefore if we be desirouse to comprehend Gods woorks: let vs not trust to our owne skilfulnesse, nother let vs presume vpon our owne natural power. But let vs herke to that which God speket to vs, & whẽ we be taught by his words, let vs go on after his guiding, & then shall we knowe his woorks in such sort, as wee shall apply them too our vse and instruction. Thus much concerning this first verse. Now Eliu goeth forward immediatly with his matter. He asketh whether Iob can tell what commaundment God hath giuen to all his creatures, what ordinaunce he hath set in the clowdes, how he she-deeth the lyght through thẽ, & whether he knowe the order and disposition of the clowds, and the woonders of him that is perfect in knowledge. VVhen he sayeth, knowest thou how God did set a lawe to his creatures? there are here two things to be noted: One is, that God not only hath created his woorks once for a do: but also that he gouerneth them still, and applyeth them to such vse as he thinketh good, according as I haue declared these former dayes. Howbeit, forasmuch as this saying is set downe heere newe againe: let vs wey it throughly, for it importeth a good lesson. For what a thing were it, if a man thuld tell vs that God did but only create the world, & that as now things fall out as they may? It were a verie slender and cold tale. And yet so did the heathen men almost euery one of thẽ. I meene those that had some good spark of religion in them. For I let passe those braynsicke beasts which are of opinion that the world was without beginning, as the wisest of them that euer was (I meene Aristotie) supposed: He neuer had his match, and yet notwithstanding he resteth vpon that point, and the diuell did so carie him away, as he knewe not the maker of the world. And although he knewe that there was a God, yet knew he not the creation of the world which is as yee would say the face of God, which he will haue men to looke vpon. But as for all those which had any seede of religion in them, although they knewe that God created the world: yet vnderstoode they not his prouidence wherein all things are conteyned, insomuch as the things that were created by his power, continue still through his goodnesse, wisdome, and iustice. This thing was vnknowne too the heathen men. Therefore let vs remember well the doctrine that is conteyned heere, which is conformable to the saying of our Lord Iesus Christ, that the father woorketh yet still, and he with him, who is the same wisdome wherof Salomon speaketh in the eyghth of the prouerbes. So then, will we knowe surely that God is the maker of heauen and earth, as we confesse him to be? Let vs therewith call to remembrance, that he guideth all things, and that he hath not forgotten his creatures, but ordereth them after his owne pleasure. And therby we may conclude, that the clowds gather not together in the aire at aduerture, nother are ingendered at the pleasure of the earth: but it is God that guideth all things, and setteth an order bothe for fayre weather and for fowle, so that bothe of them come of his souerain dominion, insomuch as there neuer falleth any one drop of rayne, nother is there euer any fayre weather, nother is there euer any little puffe of wynd, but our Lord hath commaunded it, and the creatures (though they be senselesse) haue a secret mouing, from him that gouerneth all and is aboue all. Thus much concerning the first point. And in the second place it is shewed vs, that we vnderstand not this, nor are sharperwitted ynough to know it, and therefore we must stoupe vnder the woord of God, and sayth must be all our vnderstanding. Ye see then that on the one side Gods prouidence is warranted vnto vs, to the intẽt we shold not doubt but that all things are gouerned by his will. And therewithall it behoueth vs too take knowledge of the rudenesse that is in vs, to the end that although we cannot iudge of all things, but manie things passe our reach: yet we shuld not therefore think that they be nothing: but run back to that which is sayd here concerning herkening. Then if our witts be to small and feeble, let vs resort to our God, who will shewe vs the things that are hidden and vnknowne, and wee must not iudge of them after our owne fancie, for there is not a more horrible confuzion than mannes rason when it cannot submit itself to God and his woord. Now if wee cannot iudge of the visible things and of the things that concerne this world, furtherfoorth than God inlyghteneth vs by his holie spirit, and guideth vs by his woord: what can we do concerning Gods euerlasting kingdome, which is farre hygher without comparifon, than all the things that are spoken of heere: VVe be not able to iudge of worldly, visible, corruptible, and flyghtfull things: and how then shall our iudgement reache to the spirituall kingdome of God? Must we not needs come short there? Therefore let vs learne to humble our selues and to be modest by all meanes. And whē we come to the knowing of the things that belong to our saluation, if wee mynde to profit well therein, let vs first acknowledge that we bee not able too knowe aught otherwise than God teacheth vs, therefore let vs referre ourselues vnto him, and be contented to bee guided by his woord. And when wee see not the thing that we couet to knowe, let vs assure our selues that our Lord intendeth to humble vs: and let vs not in that cace play the braynlesse sort, to iudge after our owne imagination, but be contented to remember the lesson that is shewed vs in Gods woord. Thus yee see howe wee ought to put this sentence in vre. Now by the way Eliu speaketh here of the things that are to be seene: and yet the reason of them is incomprehensible. True it is that men may say somewhat of thē: but in the end they must needs cōclude, That Gods wonderfull woorks are to hygh for vs. Therefore he sayth, come on, canst thou discusse mee why thy clothes are warme when God giueth rest too the earth by the southwynd? That is to say, in sommer whē the weather is whot, and the Sunne beareth power, if the wind drawe not northward, but that the southwynd reigne: yet notwithstanding the wind is none such as a man may perceyue it. Like as in Sommer time when the wether is calme, true it is that the coole gales come peradventure frō the south: but yet it is no such wind as may bee perceyued, for the weather shall be so still as a man shall not perceyue that there is any wynd stirring. And then do men sweate with heate, bycause the weather is then whotest. And that is the cause why it is said, that God maketh the earth to be quiet by the Southwynd. Canst thou at such tymes so much as iudge why the sweate issueth out of thy body? Thou seest thy clothes wet with it. And besides that, thy clothes shall burne thee if the Sunne haue shone so long vpon them as to heat thē through, so as they shal not be able to fence of the heat from thee. Canst thou tel the reason herof? Again, what thou with God (sayeth he) when he did spread out the heauen? VVe see this woork as a mirrour of molten glasse. Lo what a maruelous molten worke this spreading out of the heauen is. Art thou able to comprehend the inestimable power of God which sheweth it selfe in all these things? Now we haue in effect to gather vpon these sayings, that although there be some naturall causes of heate and cold: yet doeth it not followe that wee vnderstand what is in them. Specially wheras the southwind beareth sway in Sommertyme, and men burne for heate without feeling any greate blast or gale of wynd: wee may well perceiue some inferiour reason therof: neuerthelesse whē we haue knowne what we cā, yet must we come to the power that is hidden in God, yea and so hidden, as all our wittes are forced to fayle of it, & to be dazeled at it. Hereby then we see how proude men are in flinging out at rouers to dispute against God, and to set him to schoole, and to reply vpon him, and too murmur at his doings, and to shewe some token or other of misliking. That is a diuelish pride. And why so? For we be not able to perceyue so much as the cause of our sweating, and of the heate of the sunne. VVe will perchance say that the sunne is whot. Yea: but howe is the sweat ingendered? It is bycause the bodie is then loozened, and the same loozening doeth so open the bodie, that the moysture cannot tarie within. Again when it is cold weather the poares are shet vp, and the moysture shrinketh inward too nurrish a mannes lyfe, wheras the contrarie is doone by heate. Again, the heate ingendereth feeblenesse, and that feeblenesse maketh the humors to melt: and so yee see the causes of sweating. Men may well dispute after that sorte. But when all is doone, must it not needs bee acknowledged that there are maruelouse secretes in the bodie of man, and that God hath planted such a woorkmanship there, as wee bee at our wits ende when we haue well considered it. If we thinke not so, it is to much shame for vs, & our vnthankfulnesse is to beastly. Again we will perchance discourse how the heauen was made in such roundnesse, and how much bigger it is than the earth, and moreover of what matter or substance it is made, that is to wit, of a fire matter, and how it is maynteyned in such perfect state and order as it is, and finally after what maner it wheeleth about. But whē all is sayd, we must needs acknowledge that God woorketh with greate reason in that behalf. And with howe greate? Euen with infinite, wherat all mennes wit must needs stoupe, and say: Surely there is a wonderfull workmayster, there is a God that woorketh in such sorte as we must needs honour his secretes, and woorschip him in al his works, and acknowledge that it is not in our power to atteine to such hyghnesse. Thus ye see wherunto the holie Ghost intendeth to bring vs in this text. And therefore as oft as wee see any reason in the things that are doone by nature, so as we perceiue by what meanes God woorketh, and therewithall, vnderstand his iustice, power, and wisdom: let vs alwayes learne to conclude, that yet notwithstanding we cannot cōprehend all, no nor the hundredth part: It is verie much that we haue some little taste of thē, so as we get a licke at them as it were with the tip of our tung, and yet can we not haue that taste nother, except it be giuen vs from aboue. Howbeit let vs by the way marke well, that all the knowledge which we can haue, serueth but to make vs feele the rawnesse of our owne vnderstanding, that wee might humble our selues before God, and vpon the knowing of our vnabilitie seeke to be taught & too profit more and more. Furthermore let vs neuer bee werie of setting our mynds too the considering of Gods woorks, seing wee may get an inestimable treasure by learning neuer so small a portiō, yea though it be but the entering into some taste of them, as I sayd afore. For when we shal haue spent our whole life in thē, we shal haue done if wee haue come halfe way, until such tyme as our Lord do gather vs wholly and fully to himself. Thus ye see that as touching the beate that is spoken of heere, and as touching the workmanship that we see in the skies: they be as it were a molten looking glasse, and yet notwithstanding the scope of them is infinite: and therefore needs must the woorkmaister of them be wonderfull. Lo how we ought to put this lesson in vre. Now it is sayd immediatly, Tel vs what we shall say to him: for wee cannot order our matters by cause of darknesse. Heere Eliu mocketh Job: but in the meane whyle the doctrine toucheth vs all, which is, that he which wil presume to take hold to talke with god, & to reply against him must tel vs how we should speake vnto God, & what we may alledge to him, to the end we may shew him that there is some fault to be found in him, and in his works. It is all one then as if the holy Ghost should say, o to, ther is none of you al but he is so selfwise as he wil take vpon him to picke some quarell to Gods works. And soothly if we consider the overboldnesse that is in all men, wee shall see that God cannot content vs, and that if it were in our power, every of vs would put too his peece, and haue a snatch at him, [saying]: Why is not such such a thing doone? And this or this were good. To be short, there would be a terrible hotchpotch, if God should berken to our wiffhes and followe the. And wherof cometh that? Of diuelish pride, for that wee will needs be wife in finding fault with Gods doings. But behold heere howe the holie Ghoste skorneth such presumptuousnesse, and sayeth: Seing that euery of you taketh vpo him to be fogreate craftes maisters: tell vs how we shal speak vnto God. If yee come to him and say, go too, I will haue such a thing done: ye must shewe him some reason why. And what reason can ye bring vnto God? This is told vs of set purpose, by cause men intangle themselves in their owne fantastick imaginacions, when they be discōtented with God and his woorks. And I beseech you, who giueth vs such leaue to missebehaue our selues against God, & to reply this and that, but only for that we regard not his maiestie: for had we any regard of that: it is certaine that we would quake for feare. So then it is not for nought that the holie Ghost bringeth vs to speaking with God, as if he should say, Go to, tell vs what we shall say to him: for you fall to muttering as it were behind his backe, as some cowardly wretch would do when he seeth a mā of corage and authoritie, whose doings he misliketh. Such a one will find fault: but yet he dares not open his lippes at him to his face, but goes away moyling to himself to work spyte and to forge slaunders behind his backe: and when he is amōg his mates, then speweth he out al that he had conceiued afore, saying: Behold I pray you, such a mā thinks himself verie wyse and of greate skill: but I like not of him, and I maruell how men can suffer him to talk after that fashion. After the same maner deale we with God. For we be not so hardie as to speake openly against him, (and in verie deede nature teacheth vs that it ought too make vs shudder, when we do so lift vp ourselues against him that hath made and fashyoned vs) but in the meane whyle wee cease not to be so spitefull and wicked as too grudge and repine against him in huckermucker, and too picke quarrels to this and that. VVherfore as oft as we be tempted to finde fault with Gods woorks: let vs learne to come before him, and to bethinke vs of that which is conteyned heere: namely how we shall speake vnto him, and at what point we may begin. And then shal we haue cause to repress our selues, and the foie that was in vs before, must needs be subdued and fall vicerly to the ground. Thus ye see how we must take this sentence, where it is said Tel vs what we may say vnto God. And wheras it is said, We cannot order oure matters by cause of darknesse: therein the ignorantuesse of men is the better expressed vnto vs. For heere we be as it were wrapped in darknesse, so as we see not a whit. And how then can we order our matters? Behold, God dwelleth in lyght, so as he seeth, not only when the Sunne thyneth, as a mortall man doeth. For if a man walke at hygh nonedayes, he seeth his way: and when he giues himself to the doing of anie thing, [the light of the Sunne] is his guide and direction: and again if he intend to view his grounds and possessions, he looketh round about him. God therefore not only hath that: but also dwelleth in so great & infinite light, that nothing is hiddē from him. althings are open vnto him: there is no time past nor time to come with him: he reacheth euē into the depes & dungeōs as we haue seene hertofore. How thē cā we teach him his lesson, seing that he dwelleth in darknesse? It is as if a mā were shet vp and sawe no whit of light, & yet shuld say to another mā, thou wost not what thou doest. Shal a blind wretch tell a well sighted man that he knowes not his way, or that he seeth not what he doeth? Now if wee cōpare ourselues with God: it is certaine that we be worse than blind? As for him, he seeth not after the maner of mē, but hath a farre other maner of sight. Therefore, must we not needs be worse than mad, if we presume to gainsay him, or to finde occasion to reason against him: That is the cause why darknesse is spoken of heere. Then let vs consider our owne state, and also the state of God, and we shal shet our mouthes, & not presume any more to pleade against him with such libertie as we do, but there shall be a lowlinesse in vs too allow whatsoeuer God doeth, and confesse that there is nothing but rightfulnessse, wisdom, goodnesse, equitie and iustice in him, so as there remaineth not any thing for vs but to glorifie him in al respects. If we knew no more but some one litle peece of his doings: yet should wee needes condemne our owne infirmitie, in that we cannot glorifie God as wee ought to do, by reason of our ignorance. And here by the way, let vs marke well, that men are rebuked for their rashnesse, in that they make haste too speake before they knowe any thing. VVe see howe tickle our tongues are, specially if it be to talke of God and of his wonders. VVe descant vpon them. And how? At all aduventure. And yet notwithstanding we be as it were in darknesse. Therefore let vs learne to rule our talk according to our owne smallnesse. Howbeit therewithail on the other side, let vs consider the infinite goodnesse of God in that he inlightneth vs in the middes of darknesse by his worde, and that although we vnderstande not perfectly in all poynts, howe he made the world, nor perceiue the meanes whereby he worketh still: yet he ceaseth not to make vs priue of his minde, so farre forth as is needfull for vs. And that is the cause why it is sayde, that Gods wisdom kept him companie, when hee made the worlde, rayzed vp the mountaynes, funke downe the valleyes, & stablished the order which we see. But it is sayd also that the same wisdom cryeth out in the streetes, saying, come and I will giue my selfe to you: I am redie to talke familiarly with men, yea and my delight is in them, and it is my whole pleasure to dwell with the inhabitors of the earth. Seeing then that Gods wisdom which of it selfe is incomprehensible too vs, protesteth that hir delight and pleasure is to dwell with vs, & to be familiar with vs: I pray you haue we not cause to be of good cheere, and to be watchfull to take profite of the things that God sheweth vs, howbeit with such sobernesse and modestie, as wee may not couet to knowe ought but that which he teacheth vs, and to glorifie him, by yeelding him his deserued prayse? Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this verse. Nowe it is consequently sayde, If I speake, who shall report it vnto him? shall not be swallowed vp that dareth utter one worde? Here Eliu expresseth yet better the thing that I haue touched afore: that is to witte, that all the vnaduised wordes which we shoote forth concerning God, and all the wandring imaginacions which we conceiue in our braynes, are as it were grudgings that are made in huckermucker.

Prou.8.c.23-24-25-26

Prou.8.4.1. Prou.8.d.31

And thervnto tendeth the similitude which I alledged of a coward that durst not stirre one finger, and yet notwithstanding falles to moyling against those to whom god hath giue more discretion, and seeketh to be wise by backbiting of othermen. Euen so deale we to Godward. For there is none of vs but he hath too much boldnesse & skill to reply against Gods doings: but yet for al that we do but brabble: and as for him he voutsafeth not too heare our words. So thē, Eliu sheweth here, that men shal gayne nothing by setting theselues after that maner against God. And why? Who is he that shall report it to him? This is as if some begger should speake of a greate king and say, O, it were meete that the king should be better aduized than to do this or that. For it might be answered, my freend, you muste then gette some messenger, to goe giue educer-

aduertizement of this which you speake, for seing that the king hath not aduice and wisdom enough except you be of his counsell: you were best to go to him to giue him your aduice, or else too find out some messanger too send him your counsell by. If a poore begger should speake so, euery man would mocke him. But there is more cause to mocke at our follie when we take vpon vs to speake so vnaduizedly of God and his woorkes. Therefore let vs marke well this maner of speaking which is set downe here, namely who shall report it to him? wee debat matters heere bylowe: and yet in the meane while wee bee but frogs. The frogs can make a greate croking well ynough in their marishes and puddles: and yet men passe by them and stay not for all their croking. Euen so is it with all the talk that men hold: for there is no reason in it. They do but babble, and yet they beare themselves in hand, that God will hold his peace, and doo all that they would haue him to do. But it is cleane contrarie. Therefore let vs learne that whensoever we list vp our nebs against God, we shall win nothing by it, but our woordes shall slip into the aire, and vanish away as smoke. Neuerthelesse let vs marke by the way, that our woordes shal not fail to the ground, but must be registred to our greate and horrible confuzion. Then if our pride be such as we dare murmur against God: such blasphemousenesse must needs come to a reckning, and not scape unpunished. Therefore let vs not imagin too gayne any thing against God: but whensoever we be tempted to stand in contention with him, let vs call this saying to remembrance, namely who shall report it to him? True it is that God hereth it, and nothing escapeth him: but yet for all that, he voutsafeth not to stoupe to our bibblebabble, as though wee were his matches. Tush wee be but frogs, as I sayd afore. To be short, this serueth to shewe vs, that wee shall neuer get the vpper hand in pleading against God: and moreover that there is no reason why he shuld abace himself so much as to answer vs. And why? For it toucheth him nor, we cannot come nere him with our babbling: although we fyle our tungs, so as they cut and slyce smoothly in the aire: yet shall God abyde still safe and sound, and he needeth not to streyne himself to reply against vs, or too finde any excuse, for that were needlesse. So then let vs learne to speake with such reuerence, that the words which we shall vter, may be made of prayings, so as God may accept them. And how may we do that? By his purging of our tungs, that is too saye, by vterring nothing but that which commeth of his woord, and which we haue lerned in his schole? And for a conclusion let vs marke what Eliu addeth, If any man speake (sayeth he) shal be not be swallowed vp? He sheweth vs heere, what confuzion is prepared for all such as dare so set themselves against God, and would faigne finde fault with his works. What shall they gayne then in the end. They shall all be swallowed vp. VVee see that all creatures must needs tremble at Gods maiestie. And what shal be done then when there is manifest rebellion? God can with one frowne make the mountaynes & rocks to melt, emptie the sea, & destroy the whole world,

if he list. And surely there is no rebellion nother in the earth nor in the water, nor in any of all the rest of such creatures. But behold, man who is but a handful of dult, will needes wage battel against his maker: and I pray you, can he stand out? All the world should perish as soon as it came vnder Gods hand: and behold a worme, a wretched carion wil put God to silence. And not only so, but he wil also rob God of his honour, and not haue him too be counted wyse and ryghtuouse as he is woorthie. Alas, must we not needs be woorse than blynd when we come rushing with such boldnesse against him? Therefore let vs marke well (according to that which I haue touched) that when we set vp our bristles after that sort against God: wee seeke but our owne destruction, and too bee quyte swallowed vp. VVill wee then bee mainteyned vnder the hand and keeping of our God? Let vs learne to humble ourselves to him, and to pray him to shewe himself too vs, and according as it shall haue pleased him too shewe himselfe, so also to graunt vs the grace too walke in continuall modestie, and to haue our eye alwayes vppon this marke, namely that he deserueth to be honored at our hand, and that wee acknowledging ourselves to owe him such reuerence, may learne too submit vs wholly vnto him. Thus see see how we may approche vnto our God without feare of the fire of his terrible wrath. Nay rather let vs be sure that he will be as a refreshing vnto vs, so as we shall bee maynteyned by his grace, condicionally that wee come too him with all humilitie, without preacing ouer farre too inqyre of him and his secretes. Therefore wee must content ourselves with that which he sheweth vs by his woord, assuring ourselves that it is for him to reache vs his hand, and for vs to go as he guideth vs.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them continually more and more: And that forasmuch as it pleaseth him to graunt vs so greate abundance of worldly benefits, as too haue applyed and ordeyned all his creatures to our vse: wee by receyuing such bountifulnesse at his hand, may learne too knowe him for our father, assuring ourselves that seing he hath a care of our bodies in this world, he wil not fayle vs in the things that concerne the spirituall lve of our soules: and that although in this world wee bee tangled in manye affections which comber our wits, so as they bee not at libertie to consider Gods woorkes accordingly: yet wee may not therefore cease too take corage to muze vpon them: and that in the meane season he guide vs in such wise by his holie spirit, as wee may learne too like well of all his dooings, and too glorifie him in his iustice, truthe, and goodnesse, and in all his other vertues which he sheweth vs dayly in his woorkes. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and nacion: of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darknesse, too the ryght waye of saluation, for the dooing whereof &c.

The cxlvij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xxxviij. Chapter.

THE Lorde answering Iob out of a vwhirlvvinde, sayde:

2. VVho is he that darkeneth the Secretes in vvordes vwithout knowvledge?
3. Girde vp thy loynes like a valiant man: and tell me the thing that I shall demaunde thee.
4. VVhere vuart thou vwhen I layde the foundation of the earth? tell it, if thou haste vnderstanding.

Iob. 33. 4. 6.

I have seene heretofore, that Eliu intending to rebuke Iob, protested that he himself was a mortall man as Iob was, to the end he should not co-playne that he was handled with too mygh a power. And so he shewed that Gods will was to win him by reason and gentlenesse, according also as he dealeth towards vs.
 For he beareth with vs, making his word to be preached too vs by men like our selues, so as wee may come the more familiarly to heare things that he telleth vs, and the doctrine is chewed and put into our mouthes. VVe see then that God pitieth vs, when he appoynteth men to be the ministers of his woord, and to teache vs in his name and authoritie. For he knoweth our abilitie, and that forasmuch as we be feeble, wee should out of hand bee swallowed vp of his maiestie, and ouerwhelmed with his glorie. And that is the cause why he stoupeth downe to our lowenesse, in instructing vs by the meanes of men.
 Yet for all that it is requisite also that wee should bee touched, to yeeld him the reuerence that he deserueth.
 For without that, wee would abuse his goodnesse, and wheras he commeth vnto vs, wee in the end would play haysefellowe well met with him. And that is it that is re-herced to vs heere presently. For God perceyuing that Iob was not sufficiently subdewed with the matters and reasons that Eliu had alledged: maketh him to feele his greatnesse by a whirlwynd, to the end that being therewith put in feare, he should yeeld himself to the acknowledging of his fault, and wholly obey whatsoever should be sayd to him. And so we see that God applieth himself to vs after al fashyons, to the intent to win vs. For one while he stoupeth downe [vnto vs] And why? Bycause he perceyueth vs to bee too grosse and rude to mount vp vntoo him. Neuerthelessse forasmuch as there is ouergreate pride in our nature: it beloueth vs to feele him as he is, to the end we may learne to feare him, and too heare his word with al humilitie and diligence. And that is a point which we ought to marke well. For therein wee see the loue that he beareth vs, and the care that he hath of our welfare. For needs must he bee carefull of vs, when he doeth (as yee would say) so transfigure himself, as he not only voutsafeth to talke familiarly with vs, but also too stammer and lisp with vs when he seeth it meete and conuenient for vs. And againe, forasmuch as he seeth that this goodnesse of his myght turne to contempt: he doeth also adnaunce and magnifie himself as is meete for him too do, to the intent wee should knowe our owne state too submit our selues wholly vntoo him. And so much the more ought we to desire to bee taught by his woord, sith it is agreeable to our capacitie, and that therein God hath not overslipt any thing that is requisite and profitable for our saluation. Seing then that our good God hath vout-safed to stoupe downe in that wyze vnto vs, and yet therwithall aduanceth himself to frame vs to his obedience: let vs bee the willingest too heare him when he speaketh.
 And let vs no more make this fond excuse, that Gods word is to hygh and dark for vs, or that it is too terrible, or that it is too simple. For when wee shall haue well cast vp our account: we shall finde for a certaintie that our Lord setteth vs forth such a maiestie in his word, as is able too make all creatures to quake: and yet is there also a simplicitie, to the end to make it to bee receyued of the most ignorat and vnskillfull: [moreouer] there is so great light in it, as wee may vnderstand it without going to schoole, at leastwise if wee bee teachable: for it is not without cause that he calleth him self purposely the scholemayster of the lowely and little ones.

Psa. 19. c. 8.
 & Mat. 11.
 d. 25.

Thus ye see that the thing which we haue to marke in the first streyne, is that Gods speaking too vs by the mouth of men, is to the intent we should come the more freely too him, receyue the things with better leysure which he on his behalf telleth vs, and not bee astonished out of meature. Howbeit forasmuch as we be dull vpon the spurre, and yeeld him not the honour which he desserueth: he maketh vs to feele him as he is, and exalteth him self in his maiestie, to the intent that the same should bring vs to do him honour. And it is purposely sayd, that the Lord spake vntoo Iob out of a whirlwynd. It was not ynough for him to haue giuen some token of his presence, but he did also rayse as it were a vehement tempeit. VVe shal finde in the scripture that sometimes God rayfed thunder after the same sort, when he listeth to speake too his faythfull ones. But we haue specially to marke heere, the circumstance of the place, that forso much as Iob was not sufficiently tamed: God was fayne to shewe a terrible force to him. The cause then why he thundred and rayzed this whirlwynd, was that Iob should knowe with what a Lord he had to deale. In generall, it is commonly sayd, that God dwelleth as it were in a dark cloud, or rather that he is compassed about with light: and therefore that we cannot come at him, insomuch that if we would looke vpon God, our senses dazle by reason of the thicke darknesse betweene him and vs. This then is verie well spoken in generall of the glorie of God, to the end wee should not presume to bee ouerinquiritiue of his incomprehensible determinatiōs, but taste so farre of them as it pleaseth him to discover them vnto vs, and therewithall consider that all our senses sayle vs if he voutsafe not too come to vs, or else to lift vs vp to him, and yet neuerthelesse, that for another respect, (that is to wit, bycause of our sturdinesse) God must be fayne to shewe himself terrible to vs. True it is that he would fayne drawe vs to him by gentlenesse, and we see that when men be well disposed to submit themselues vnto him, he vseth the sayd louing maner of inuiting them vnto him as gently as may be. But whē he perceyueth any sturdinesse, he must needs first of all make vs too stoupe, for otherwise what should he win by speaking to vs? And that is the cause why in publishing his lawe, he rayzed thunders, blew trumpets in the ayre, and made al to shake, insomuch that the people were so afrayd, as they sayd, let not the Lord speake vnto vs, for then are we but dead, we bee vterly vndone.
 Why did God shake the earth after that maner? and why did his voyce rore with such terribenesse? Ment hee to driue away his people that they should not heare him?
 Truly it is cleane contrarywise sayd, That he gaue not his lawe in vayne, but that he ment to giue the people a certaine rule, to the end they myght knowe the waye of lyfe. So then his rayfing of whirlwynds and tempestes in the ayre, is not too feare vs: that (say I) is no part of his meening: but it serueth for a preparatiue to subdue the lostinesse of those folk, which would neuer haue obeyed God and his word, nor neuer haue acknowledged the au-thoritie of him that spake, without these tokens which were added. And therefore let vs mark wel, that gods speaking to Iob after that fashyon out of a whirlwynd, was no more than needed. Now if such a holie man who had applied his whole indeuer to the honoring of God, needed to be subdewed after that maner: what had wee neede to be? Let vs compare our selues with Iob. He was a minour of Angellyke holinesse: we haue the protestations that he made heere before: and although he were extremely afflicted, and by reason ther. of did murmure and let slip many wyld words: yet did he alwayes hold himself to the ground of wooshipping God, and of humbling himself vnder his hand: he hold still that generall point, though he swarued aside in some particulars. But we be as fleshly as may be, and our vanities do so carie vs away, as we be in maner stark drunken. Hardely can wee discern that there is a God in heaven: and if a man set his woord afore vs, we make slowe haste to it, yea and wee be duller than Asses in it. Had not our Lord neede then to make vs feele his maiestie, and too touche vs with it in good earnest? Now truly God needeth to rayze vp stormes & whirlwynds to make vs know that it is he which speaketh: but he must dispose vs after another maner too come vnto him, according also as he doeth. Then if one man haue hartbytings and troubles in his consciēce, and another bee afflicted with diseases, and the third be touched with aduersitie: let vs vnderstand that it is God which calleth vs to him, bycause wee come not to him, of our owne accord, nor doo drawe nere him too heare his woord: he subdeweth such harthardtēdnesse as neede is it should bee, to the end that our minds shuld bee humbled in true obedience. Doeth God then see such rebelliousnesse in vs? He must needes vse the maners and meanes aforesayd to drawe and win vs to himself: and to the end we may heare him, he must be sayne to speake to vs as it were out of a whirlwynd, not that this prayeth in al men. For we see some that kicke against the prick, and play the restie iads: & although God quicken thē vp, yet winneth he nothing at their hand. How many of these wretches are to be scene whō God chastizeth so many wayes, stryking so hard blowes vpon their heads with a beetle, that if they were neuer so hard they mult neede be softened: & yet notwith stāding they neuer leave gnashing their teethe at him: VVe see they cannot be trayned, neither can they by any meanes be moued: so full of pryde and stubbornnesse do they shewe thēselues against God, euen spiring much to the vttermoste of their power. So then, it were him to the behoof of al those whom God chastizeth, that they were disposed to come vnto him, & that is his intēt. Therefore let vs beware that we disappoint not our God: but as oft as he sendeth vs anie aduersitie, let vs learne too resort to him, as well as though he spake with thunder, or thundered vpon vs to make vs heare him. Let vs consider this, and let vs so consider it, as our minds may be truly subdewed vnto him, & our whole seeking may be to be wholly humbled vnder his obedience. Lo what we haue to marke in this streyne. And let vs marke further, that although God doo not in these dayes thunder frō heauen: yet notwithstanding, all the signes that haue bene giuen in old time for the warranting of his woord, ought to serue vs also at this daye. VVhen Gods lawe is preached vnto vs, we must immediatly match therewithall the thing that is spoken in the nynetenth of Exodus: which is, that the lawe hath bene duely warranted, and that our Lord gaue full authoritie thereto, when he sent thunder and lightnings from heauen, and made the aire to ring with the noyse of his trumpets: and that all this was doone, to the intent that the lawe should be receiued with all reuerence euen too the worlds end. As much is imported in this verse. For wheras it is sayd that god appeared in a whirlwynd: it becometh vs to vnderstand that his intent was to warrant the thing that is conteyned in this booke: and not only that: but we must also extend this authoritie vnto his whole word. There is yet this one thing more to be considered, that if God begin to cal vs to him after a louing maner, & shewe himselfe rough & sharp in the end, we must not think it strange, but rather examin wel our life, to know whether we haue obeyed him or no: and in so dooing let vs on the one side acknowledge his apparant goodnesse,

& on the other side consider that he must needes vse the second meanes to win vs, when he seeth that he gayneth nothing by his fauorable dealing which he had shewed vs. As for exāple, God doth somtymes cocker vs when he intendeth to take vs for his owne and to haue vs of his focke: and he setteth foorth his woord vnto vs without sending vs any affliction. Very well, wee see it is his wil so to do, and wee like well of it. But yet in the meane whyle we profit not ourselues by it, to be confirmed in his goodnesse as we ought to be, to renounce our owne wicked lusts, to forget the world, and to giue our selues wholly vnto him. He beareth with vs for a tyme: but in the end when he seeth vs so rechelesse, he beginneth too smyte. Heerin we ought too perceyue, that his speaking to vs as it were out of a whirlwynde, is not without cause, for so much as we had no will to hear him whē he spake graciously vnto vs and after a kindeharted and fatherly maner. Therefore it is requisite that God should speake to vs with such vehemence, sith he perceyue that wee will neuer come to him, til he haue prepared vs after that fashyon. True it is that he winneth some by his bare woord: howbeit when he seeth other some stubbornne, he sendeth them some treuble and aduersitie. And doubtlesse there are a number that had neuer come to the Gospell, nor neuer bin touched rightly, at the hart to obey God, if he had not sent them some token that he was minded to chastize them. Herevpon when they felt once by afflictions, that there is nothing but wretchednesse in this world: they were enforced to mislike of thēselues, and to cut off their pleasures wherin they had bin plunged hertofore. Ye see then how God draweth men to him after diuerse sorts. But let vs profit ourselues by the meanes that he vseth towards vs, and again, when he speaketh not to vs in a whirlwynd, let vs on our side bee familiar with him, & suffer our selues to be ruled by him as sheep & lambs. For if he spie any hardhartednesse in vs he must needes subdue vs whither we wil or no. And although he suffer vs to play the looce colts for a time: yet at length we shal feele his terrible maiestie to make vs a frayd, at leastwise if it please him to shewe vs fauour: for God doeth vs a singular goodturne when he wakeneth vs after that maner, & thūdereth so with his voice, as it entereth into our harts and woudeth vs. I say it is a priuiledge which he graunteth not to all men. Again, his thundering vpon the vnbeleuers, is to late: for there is no more hope of their returning vnto him, but he summoneth them to heare their condēnation. So much the more thē ought we to receiue quietly this help which God giueth vs, when for the subduing of all the stubbornnesse of our fleshe, he raizeth some whirlwind, that is to say, maketh vs too feele his maiestie. Ye see in effect what we haue to marke vpon this sentence. Now let vs come to that which is sayd in these wordes: Who is he that darkeneth the secrets in wordes without knowledge? Gird vp thy loynes like a valiant man, & answer me to al my demandes. In the first place here God mocketh at Iob, bycause he had strived with him, & born himself in hād that he could mend his case by his disputing. And that is the cause why it is said, Who art thou? Now whē the scripture sheweth vs who or what we be: it is to make vs utterly nothing.

True it is that men wil make greate account of thēselues, and beare thēselues in hand that there is some greate worthinesse in them. And wel may they esteeme hyghly of thēselues, but God in the meane whyle knoweth that there is nothing in them but al filth and stinche, and therefore he shaketh them off, yea euē with a lothing of them. And so although we be so foolish and ouerweening, as too glorie of the wisdome and vertue that is in vs:

Ro. 9. d. 20. vs: yet notwithstanding God to deface vs and put vs to shame, vseth but only this word, what art thou? Thou art but a man. The pronouncing of this is as it were an utter bereaving of vs of all occasion of boasting. For we know there is not so much as one drop of goodnesse in vs: and then haue we no more cause to vaunt our selues in any manner wyse. That is the cause also why God addeth, Gird vp thy loynes like a valiant man: that is to say, Set as much store by thyself as thou livest, beare thyself in hand that thou art as a Gyant, be thou furnished throughly, and be thou armed from top too toe, and what shalt thou gayne by it in the end? Thinkest thou to stand, if I set myself against thee thou wretched creature? What haste thou? Heere we see what Gods meening is. For (as I sayd afore) this foolishnesse of self estimation, and of self-weening that we bee of some valew, is so rooted in vs: that it is verie hard to bring vs to a ryght vnderstanding of our owne wants, so as wee myght bee cleere from all pryde and presumption. So much the more then behoueth it vs too marke the text of the scripture, where it is shewed vs that there is not any thing of estimation in vs. And let vs way it well: for it is not spoken of some one part of the world only, but of all mankynd in generall.

1. Co. 1. c. 19. Therefore let bothe greate and small learne to bee ashamed of themselves, seeing that God byndeth them vp all in one bundle together, when he sayeth, that the wisdom of men is but foolishnesse and vanitie, their strength but weaknesse, and their ryghtuousenesse but vncleanesse and dung. For when God speaketh in such termes: it is not to two or three men, but to all men vniuersally. Therefore let all of vs from the greatest to the least, learne to stoupe, acknowledging all our glorie to bee but confuzion and shame before God. And for that cause let vs thinke vpon this saying: who is this? Let vs not take it to bee ment only of the persone of Iob, but of all mortal creatures, as if our Lord should say, How now? Is there such malapartnesse in man that is but as a pot of brittle earth, in man that is but a vessell full of all filth and naughtinesse, and in man that is lesse than nothing? Is there such malapartnesse in him as to dispute against me, and to bee so inquisitiue afore hand? whicher were that to go: VWho art thou o man? According also es we see that Sainct Paule setteth the same woord as a stoppe in our way, saying: VWho art thou o man which reasonest with God, and pleadest against him? And this he setteth downe after he hath alledged the obiections wherein men thinke themselves to haue a fayre collour to dispute against God, and too demaund why he should destroy those whom he hath created, and why he should put a difference betweene one and another without knowing any cause, so as the one should be called to saluation, and the other be rejected. After that Sainct Paule hath set downe those things: although men take pleasure in such obiections: yet he sayeth, O man, who art thou that settest thyself after that fashyon against God? And this is it which we haue to marke vpon this saying, who is this? Therefore whensoever any man is tempted to pryde, let him thinke with himself, Alas, who art thou? Heere is no entering into battell against such as ourselues are, and against our matches: but if wee will needs bee so bold as to be inquisitiue of Gods secretes, and to let our fancies and tounge looce to imagin vnprofitable things, or to talk against God and his honour: we must be fayne to thinke, Alas, who am I? when euery of vs shal haue entered into himself, and considered his owne feeblenesse, and perceyued that in effect we be nothing: wee shal bee cooled wel ynough, al this prittleprattle and al our former conceyts will be layd a water: yea and al our imaginacions will bee bridled and imprizoned, as shal bee declared yet more fully hereafter.

Now it is sayd expressly, Gird vp thy loynes like a valiant man: to do vs to wit, that when the whole world hath layd their force together, and vitered the same, al is nothing. Yee see heer how God spyterh or desyeth Iob in bidding him to furnishe himself, and to come armed and weaponed as a Gyant, or as the valiantest man that could bee found. Heerby he expresseth yet better the thing that I haue sayd alreadye: that is to witte, that the concerning of men in the scripture, is not ment simply of the common sort, and of such as are despyred and out of credit and estimation: but extendeth euen to the greatest, and to such as thinke they touche the clouds with their heads. So then although men imagin themselves too haue some apparauce of honour: let them assure themselves that the same is nothing before God. As for example, They that are excellent in comparison of their neyghbours, will surely conceyue some opinion and weltyking of themselves. If a man bee counted skillfull, of good wit, and of good behauiour, he will set much by himself in respect of those that haue not the same qualities, finally if a man bee indued with greate and commendable vertues afore men, the hauing of such speciall induements will perchaunce make our hearts hoppe in our belly (as they say) and to set much store by our selues: but when we come vnto God, then must all of it quire quayle. There is not then so lusty and stout a fellowe, that hath [in that case] one whit of strength at all: all holinesse, all wisdom, and al that ever eade is, sayeth vterly in that behalf. Therefore at a word, let all the world knowe, that their furniture shal not boote them before God, but wee must bee vterly defaced and emptied by God, to as he leaue not one drop of power or strength in vs, other than we shal take of him as by way of borrowing, acknowledging that al proceedeth of his mere goodnesse. Now then we see what this word valiant man importeth, It doeth vs to witte, that what special power or vertues so euer wee haue, the same must not puffe vs vp with pride against God. Furthermore it is sayd also, that Iob wrappeth (or dar keneth) secrets in wordes without knowledge. Heereby God sheweth that when we haue to deale with his secretes, wee must bethinke our selues wel, that we may proceede soberly and with all reuerence. For vnder this woord secrets God intended too signifie the hygh things wherof Iob had spoken. VVe may well dispute of manie perie tryfles, yea and discourse of them at randon: and in so doing our talk shal be but vaine and for d but yet shal there not be any blasphemie therein, either shal Gods name bee vnhalloved. But when we enter into the doctrine of saluation, and into Gods works, and fall to disputing of his providence and will then must we not go to it so vnadvisedly, for we do but wrap vpon intangle secrets in vnskillful words VVe see then what in God rebuketh Iob: namely for speaking to hastily of things that outreached his capacite for although he had excellent gifts of grace: yet ought he alwayes to haue humbled himself with acknowledgement of his infirmities, and also to haue bridled himself, sith he was wel nere out of his wittes, and wist not what to thinke of Gods iudgements. And forasmuch es he felt himself at such an afterdeale, he should haue had an eye to the feblenesse of his own vnderstanding, & acknowledging himself to be a mortal mā, he shuld haue said, Alas there is nothing but ignorace & foolishnesse in mee. Herewithal he shuld also haue looked vp to the inestimable maiestie & incōprehensible purpose of God: & that should haue meekened him. Howbeit he did nother the one nor the other. So then, although he were not quite strayed from the right way, but went forward still too the true marke: yet do we see heere, that he is rebuked by Gods owne mouth. And this text putteth vs in mynd of the reuerence which God will haue vs to beare too his hygh mysteries, and to the things that concerne his heauenly kingdome. If we reason but about our owne matters, we neede not to goe too it with so precise carefulnesse: for they be but earthly things, which passe away. But whensoever we fall to talking of God, or of his woorkes, or of his trathe, or of the things that are conteyned in his word: we must come to it with reuerence and feare, and not open our lippes to flushe out whatsoeuer commeth to our tunges end: nor haue our witts to busie to inquire of the things that belong not to vs nor are lawfull for vs: but we must restreine our desires and brydle our tungs. And why? For they be the secretes of God: that is too say, they be too darke and hygh things for vs to meddle with.

Therefore we must not think to attein to the, further-foorth than God listeth to instruct vs of his owne mere goodnesse. And would God that this thing were well put in vre: for then should we not haue the bickerings that are nowadayes through the whole world. But what? It is to be seene that verie fewe are touched with the maiestic of God. VVhen wee treat of his woord, and of the doctrine of our saluation, and of the holie scripture, euerie one falls to it at aduerture, and euerie man shoos forth his verdict, as though they reasoned but of moone shyne in the water. They be such things as passe al vnder-standing of man, and yet notwithstanding it is manifest that we be bolde too treat of Gods so hygh mysteries, which ought to rauish our witts to wonder at them, and which we ought to honour with a lawfulnessse, I say wee be bolde to babble of them, than if a man spake but of a matter of five shillings valew, or of some trifle I wote not what. And what is the cause hereof, but that men haue not considered howe God hydeth and overcasteth his owne secret determinations, and hath in his holie scripture vttered vnto vs his wil wherunto it behoueth vs to be subiect. VVe see on the one side how the Papiſts blaspheme God, wresting, falsifying, marring, and corrupting the whole holie scripture, so as they sticke not to skorne God and all his word. And why? For they neuer talked what this woord Secrete meeneth. Also there are drunkards among vs which could finde in their harts to subdue God to their fantasie all mynd. Though they were the wisest men in the world, and the best seene in the holie scripture: yet should they bee fayne to come to this point. That Gods secret determination is about vs.
But they be vtterly dull and brutish, there is nother skill nor reason in them, the wyne overmaystreth them like swyne: and yet they will needs playe the diuines, and controll things in such wise, that if a man should now-adayes beleue them, he should be driuen to frame and forge a new gospe l. And therefore let vs remember how it is shewed vs heere, that when wee talke of God, wee must not take libertie to pleade and babble as wee ourselues thinke good: but consider that he hath reueled his secrets vnto vs in the holie scripture, and that bothe greate and small must submit themselues therevntoo too honour them. And that is the cause why heere is mention made of woordes without knowledge. Now then God sheweth vs heere, that whensoever wee speake of him, and of his woorkes, it is a matter of secrecie, a hygh matter. On the other side, what is it that we can bring forth? what is that little which wee can conceyue in our vnder-standing? It is but woordes without knowledge. Let men put themselues into the balance, and they shal bee found lyghter than vanitie itself, as it is sayd in the Psalme. So much the more then behoueth it vs too marke this doctrine, that there is nother skill nor aptnesse in vs to treat of Gods woorkes, except he teache vs. The way for vs to become wyse, is too bee gouerned by the spirit and woord of God.

And therefore when we finde not the thing in Gods word, which we desire to knowe: let vs vnderstand that it behoueth vs to abyde ignorant of it, and therevpon to keepe our mouthes shet. For whensoever we go about to speake, there shal bee no knowledge nor any thing but vntrute in vs. This then is the accusation that God setteth downe heere against Iob. And therupon he sayeth, Answer mee too all my demaundes. At leastwise, if thou haue vnderstanding, make mee also too vnderstand that which I would knowe of thee. Heere God proceedeth in mocking the foolish the ouerweening of men, in that they weene themselues to be so fine witted, that they are able to dispute and pleade against him. Therefore he sayeth, Verie well, no doubt but you be verie able men (to your owne seeming.) when you speake and I let you raunge [at your will.] But I a so must haue my turne to speake too you: and reply you vpon mee, and then shall you well see your default. VVhat is the cause then that men are so rash to aduauce themselues so foolishly against God?
It is for that they take libertie to speake and occupie the place, bearing themselues in hand that God hath nothing to reply against them.

But behold the remedie that God giueth vs to abate this our foolish rashnesse, is to bethinke vs what he may demand. If God begin to question with vs, what shall we answer. Surely if we bare this thing well in mynd, wee should bee vtterly restreyned: and although our mynds be verie eygre, and that to our owne seeming we be able to remoue the whole world: yet should wee bee as it were brought home to our owne state, to followe the things simply which our Lord sheweth vs, condicionally (I say) that wee can thinke with our selues, Alas, if wee come before God, is not his mouth open as well as ours? or hath not he authoritie and maysterſhip too question with vs? And what shall wee answer vntoo him? Yee see then wherunto it behoueth vs too come: and that is the thing which we haue to consider in this text to be rightly instructed by it. Forasmuch then as we be hasty to speak, that is to say, forasmuch as we haue naturally this vice of thrusting our selues further forward than becōmeth vs, let vs learne to restrayne our tungs. For what is the cause that they runne by and by at libertie too flushe out things that wee can no skill of? It is for that we consider not that it is our dutie rather to answer God, than too put forth our selues to speake. For is it not a peruerting of the order of nature, that a mortall man which is not ing, should incroche vpon his maker, and cause audience to be giuen to himself, and God in the meane while should hold his peace? VVhat a dealing is that? And yet notwithstanding wee doo it as oft as wee murmure against God, or teare his woord in peeces, or cast forth woords at ran-don to say: Thus and thus doeth it seeme to me. VVhat is the cause hereof, but that wee would put God too silence, and haue our selues heard about him? Is not this a starke madnesse? Therefore too correct this statelineſſe that is in vs, let vs learne, not too presume too answer our God, knowing that when wee come before him, he hath authoritie too examine vs, yea euen according too his owne will, and not after our lyking and appoyntment, and that it shal be too much to our shame when he shal haue stopped our mouth & begōne to speak himself.

And

And why? VVherof will God examin vs? Of things that are more than hidden from vs, and wherein all our witts fayle vs. Lo whervnto God bringeth vs, to shewe vs our beastlinesse and frenlike presumption. Seing that God hath such questions to put to vs, and is able too alledge things wherat we shall bee more than confounded: let vs learne so to humble our selues, as it may be too learne at his hand, and when we haue learned, he may make vs to see his light in the midds of the darknesse of this world. And in the meane season let vs learne also too serue and honour him in all respects and all points. For then shal we haue profited well in Godschole, when wee shall haue learned to magnifie him, and to yeeld him such glorie, as to haue good opinion of all that proceedeth from him. And moreouer let vs also mislike of ourselues, to the end we may resort vnto him, to find the goodnes there which wanteth in ourselues, that therevpon it may please him so to gouerne vs by his holie spirit, that being replenished with his glorie, we may haue wherof to glorie, not in our selues, but only in him.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may returne too him with true repentance, and he therevpon voutsafe so to reforme our whole life, as our whole seeking may bee too submit ourselues to his holie commaundements. And so let vs al say, Almighty God heauenly father, we acknowledge and confesse as trithe is, that we be not woorthie to lift vp our eyes too heauen too shewe ourselues in thy sight, &c.

The cxlvij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxxviiij. Chapter.

4. VVhere vvasst thou vwhen I layd the foundations of the earth? shevve mee, if thou haste vnderstanding.
5. VWho hath layd the measures therof? canst thou tell? or vvho hath set the compasse vpon it?
6. VVhervpon are the foundations thereof stayed? or vvho is he that hath layd the cornerstone therof.
7. VVhen the Starres of the morning reioyced together, and all the children of God soong in triumph?
8. VVho hath shet vp the sea vvithin doores, vvwhich in emptying itself commeth fourth as out of a vvomb.
9. VVhen I made the clovdes as the garment thereof, and the darknesse as the svvadding bands therof.
10. I haue stablished myne ordinaunce vpon it, I haue shet it vp vvithin barres and doores.
11. And I sayd, hither shalt thou come and not passe any further, and here shalt thou stay the lifting vp of thy vvaues.

Grant well ynough all that is reherfed here concerning Gods works as we see them bothe in heauen and earth. But if wee mynded them earnestly, we could hardly be made too speake one woord. Neuertheless if we witt how too profit our selues by the things that are conteyned in this doctrine: it would be ynough to teache vs lowelinesse, so as wee should no more open our mouthes to grudge against God or too complayne of him when hee doeth not things to our liking. All this geere would be layd awater. For the incomparable greatnesse and hyghnesse of our God, his wonderfull power and might, and his infinite goodnesse and wisdom which shewe themselues in his woorks, would suffice to humble vs, and make vs astonished, and wee would do nothing but honour him, and do him homage with all feare and reuerence. VVe haue then two things to consider heere. The one is, that when God speaketh of his power, and therewithall sheweth it vs to our face euen in the things which we may see: the same is not more than needeth: for we consider things verie il though they be neuer so manifest to vs. And secondly it behoueth vs to come to the end and intent that God purpofeth, for it is not ynough for vs too confesse that God made the earth, and setted it in the midds of the sea. True it is, that Gods shetting vp of the sea after that sort, as though it were inclosed with great wadies, is a wonderfull thing, and of good ryght ought we to confesse, that the workmaister is excellent. Howbeit it behoueth vs to passe yet further, and to apply our whole iudicium too glorifie God in such wise, as we confesse all his doings to bee iust, iust of equitye, and right, and by that meanes be bridled when we bee tempted to grudge and repine at him, or to finde fault with his woorks. Then let the things that are conteyned heere, serue to subdue vs and to hold vs in such humblenesse and modestie, as we may do nothing else but honour him. And if the reason of his woorks be vnkowne to vs: let vs not therfore cease to take them all for good and rightfull, and to rest therevpon without any gainysaying. But now let vs come to the words that are conteyned heere. The first questio that God demaundeth, is where Job was when he layd the foundation of the earth: as if he should say, wretched creature against whom settest thou thyself? It would behoue thee first to bee my march: it would behoue thee to come neere myne vnderstanding. And how faire art thou off from it? Again he sayeth, come on, let mee see if thou haste vnderstanding? who hath layd the measures of the earth? Tel mee if thou knowest him. Or who hath set the compasse vpon the same, to make it to be so well proportioned: who hath setted the earth vpon hir corners and vber vpon is it stayed? Job, tel mee all these things, sayeth God. Truly when we behold the greatnesse and weyghinesse of the earth, wee be abashed at it: the how genesse of it dazleth our witts: and we be not able to comprehend it. VVe see well ynough and we bee constreyned too confesse, that it is made with as greate reason as can bee, but yet we come short of it, when God sheweth vs our own fraitie and feclenesse. Now seing it is so, that euen in the things that are seene before our eyes, wee want sufficient iudgement to comprehend them: I pray you what shall wee doo in Gods narrowe and hidden secrets, whereby he ordeyneth and appointeth what he listeth in heauen? And if we clype not the reason thereon, what shall we say? Is it meete for vs to bee so selfwyse as to iudge of them after our owne fancie, seing that they surmount our vnderstanding? Shall we comprehend that which the verie Angels cannot comprehend? Is it not an ouergreate folie, or rather madnesse for men to preace so farre? Then let vs be well aduised to what purpose this is sayd. And for the better vnderstanding therof, let vs make this comparison. Take mee all the masons and carpenters of the world, yea and all the cunningest builders that can be chozen, and yet is nother mason nor carpenter so excellent in his art, but he had neede of lyne, compasses, rules, plommets, and such other like things too build withall, or else his building wil be crooked, and he shall not rayse it twoo poles hygh without some fault in it. Now if those woorkmaysters (how cunning and excellent so euer they be in their art,) are sayne to help themselves with lynes, compasses, and measures, and yet the greatest palaces or castles that shall be so builded, are not a hundred pole hygh: what is it in cōparison of the building of the earth and the Sea? A man shall be curstly combered if he intend to make but a castle of hewen stone. For first of all, if there be not a good foundacion and sure groundwoorke, all the building is in vayne that is layd vpon it.

Again if the reering of it bee not in good proportion and order, the woorking of it wil not be wel borne. And I pray you if all palaces and castles were put together, what are they in comparison of the sea and the land? VVhat proportion is there betweene the one and the other? Seing then that men, (be they neuer so cunning,) haue neede of helpes, and seeke heere and there for ayde and succour, yea euē in the things that are nothing in cōparison of the most excellent and houg woorkmanship which appeareth in the earth alone in that God hath so settled it vpon the waters as we see, & made it in so goodly order: must we not needs be worse thā witleffe, if we take vpon vs to controll God in those his doings, which are farre beyond al cōparison more hidden from vs, than the things that are to be seene in the order of nature? Therefore whensoever these things come to our remembrance, let them serue to rauish vs into wonderment, and to glorifie him that hath made such a building by his only will, and not by long continuance of time. VVee see that men cannot at the first day build and make perfect the thing that they go in hand with, and that they are faine to bestowe much labour & time about it. But it is not so with God. for we see that he did quickly finish all this goodly woorkmanship that is seene in heauen and earth. To bee short, we see heere that God mocketh mens pride, in that they presume to controll his works. If I spake but of some meane work to such as are cunning in masonrie and in carpenters craft, and should say to them, it were better for you to do thus or thus, so as I would play the maystermason and yet haue no skill in the matter: should not the maistermasons and carpenters haue iust cause to lawgh mee to skorne and to say, how now? This fellowe can not skill to make a windowe of half a foote ouer, and yet he falles to controlling of vs. VVill not thē the skilful in any art, take skorne that any man should come so foolishly to controll their woorkmanship? will they not send an ouerweener backe again to his apce? Yes surely will they. Now if we stand in such awe of maystermasons and carpenters, as we dare not speake of their woorke but with modestie, and with protestatiō that we be vnable to iudge of them, what shall we do when we come vnto God? Behoueth it not vs to be much more humble and modest? VVee know after what maner men will speake of a handicrafts woorkmanship, when they be no craftsmen themselves.

True it is (will they say) that I am not seene in this occupacion, it is not my trade, neuerthelesse ye shall here mine aduice: howbeeit I referre it stil wholly to such as haue skill of it. Then if wee vse such modestie when it standeth but vpon the iudging of a building or some other meane work of a handicrafts mannes making: I pray you what honour ought we to yeeld vnto God, when the case concerneth his works? In what estimation ought wee to haue them?

Now then we see what God intended in this text, in speaking of the lyne & the compasse. As if he should say, how now? If I were a mortall and corruptible creature, yet would men in beholding my works do me the honour to say, Behold, heere is a verie excellent, and skilful workmā, he is verie cunning, his work speak for him. Yea if some handicrafts man (as I sayd afore) had done some meane peece of work, men would not be so bold as to finde fault with it: or at leastwize they would not do it which had no vnderstanding in such workmanship. But as for mee that haue made so excellent a work, which haue created bothe heauen, earth, and sea, and all of nothing, and which haue finished them in so goodly order and aray as men see: men vpon them neuerthelesse to controll mee. And what a dealing is that? VVhat are all the works of men if they be layd to my woorkmanship? Shall they come neere myne? I haue wrought with incomprehensible power and wisdom, and yet shall I not bee free from mennes iudgements? Shall any man dare say, why doest thou this, or why doest thou that, it were better for thee to doo so or so? VVhat a pride is that? Shall men preferre mortall creatures before mee that am the liuing God? before mee that am almightie and alwise? Is not that an intolerable vnthankfulnesse? If a mortall man make a peece of work, men will do him the honour not to iudge of it without greate modestie: and haue not I deserued to be honored a hundred tymes more, which haue builded the world?

Then let vs learne to looke better vpon Gods works than we haue doone: so as if we cast our eye vpon the earth, wee may bethinke vs of the terrible howgenesse therof. It is not as some greate castle well wrought, wherunto none other commeth neere: but we see what a weyght it hath, insomuch as it may well seeme impossible for any foundacion to bee found able to beare it vp. And wher vpon is it grounded? Euen vpon the water. The earth must needs hang in the ayre (as it doeth in deed) and it hath the water round about it. Truly euen the Philosophers which considered not God the maker therof, did well perceyue by reason how the waters do compass the earth, and how the whole masse together hangeth in the ayre. They haue disputed verie curiously therof, and alledged some reason for it. But yet for all that, they were constreyned spite of their teethe, to graunt that it was a thing about nature, to say that the waters should so shrinke aside, to the intent that men myght haue roome too dwell on. This could not come of itself, needs must it be the woorking of some diuine prouidence.

After that maner spake they. And although they were blinded through their owne vnthankfulnesse: yet neuerthelesse they could not denye but it was so. Howbeeit (as I haue sayde) it is not ynough too acknowledge that God created the earth: but wee must also behold his wonderfull wisdom therein, and acknowledge it to be such a miracle, as our wits come short of. VVheras it is sayd that God created all of nothing, & again, that he hath settled the earth vpon the waters: is it not a thing to rauish vs into wonderment? If we looke round about about vs, we shal see that the waters do inuiron the whole earth about: and yet notwithstanding wee see that the earth abydeth stable, and what a miracle is that? True it is that sometimes men shal see an earthquake, and it will seeme that all should go to wrecke: and so also might it come to passe, if God prouided not for it. But howsoeuer the world go: wee see that the bodie of the whole earth standeth stedfast still. And is not that a wonder to vs: what excuce can we pretend, if we can find no leysure to think vpon such a woork of God: doeth he not vtter his power and mightinesse therein so many ways, as we must needs be sufficiently conuicted thereby? But we see and will not see one whit to magnifie god in his works. And his leaude-nesse is vnexcusable. For when men fall asleepe heere, and take not payne to think vpon Gods works: are they not woorse than vnthankfull and churlish? So then, how ignorant so euer we be, there is none excuce for vs, but we be alwayes blame woortlie, if we glorifie not God in his works which are so open and manifest. Ye see then what we haue to beare in mynd in this streyne. Now by the way, wheras mention is made of Compasses, and of measuring of the earth: we see wel that there needed a wonderfull power and incomprehensible wisdom for the setting of all these things in order. For the earth would neuer haue settled and stood stil as it doeth if it were not in the middle of the aire, in such iust measure and proportion, and in such conueniencie and temperature, as nothing were amisse. Furthermore when wee behold the great and farre distance not only betweene the earth and the clouds, but also betweene that and the skye where the Starres and Planets are: should we not be more abashed? And now when we consider the hyghnesse which we see in the skye about the earth: what is the Earth? As greete a masse as it is, and as weyghtie and howge as men see it to be: if we compare it to the greatnesse of the heauen, must we not needs confesse with the Philosophers that it is but a little Ball? VVhat proportionablenesse is there betweene the one and the other? And yet neuertheless if wee looke but vpon the mountaynes that are on the earth, wee shall finde euen there wherat too maruell, and wherefore too glorifie the woorkmayster that made all.

Again, when on the other side we behold the steddinesse of the earth, ought it not to rauishe vs into wonderment? Although wee see greete varietie in it: yet doeth it alwayes abyde in his place without fleeing. Ye see then, that the hygh mountaynes which doo as it were imboffe the earth, and the vnclueinesse of the places, seeme able to shake it, yea and to ouerturne it quite and cleane. But God hath peysed the earth in such proportion and measure: as it keepeth alwayes his owne place still, and although it seeme that the mountaynes should ouerthrow it, yet notwithstanding one of them is so answerable to another, as the counterpeyse abydeth alwayes stedfast.

Too be short, whatsoeuer betydeth, the earth shall stand stedfast and bee perserued still too the end, by the proportionable and euenleueled counterpeyse of it self, and it shal not be any whit remoued whatsoeuer happen to it. Neuertheless, when wee see how it is inuironed with the water, and that the howge mountaynes auance themselves as it were to tumble it into the sea, & yet notwithstanding it continueth steddie still: must it not needs be sayd that God hath wrought after a passing woonderfull fashyon in that behalf? Yes certainly. VVhat is to be done then, but only to worship our God, confesing ourselues to come farre short of so houge greatnesse, and so incomprehensible wisdom? For of a truthe it is good reason that we should walk in all hymblenesse and feare, when we come to the considering of Gods woonderfull woorks, which shewe themselves euery where in the order of nature. And so we see verie cleerly what is conteyned heere. Yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs too come backe too this point, namely why God senteth the earth before vs as a looking glasse. It is to the end we might behold his infinite glorie, wildome, power, and myght, to guide vs and leade vs, as it were by the hand, to the considering of his woorks which are exceeding greete and excellent, therby to be rauished into woonderment, of purpose to humble ourselues vnder his incomprehensible greatnesse, and to honour him. VVe see that God adorneth himself so excellently, as there is no more replying against him, nor no more entering into such boldnesse, as to desire to controll him as though he had doone amisse. VVho is he that shall comprehend his infinite hyghnesse? Let vs but open our eyes, and we shall be confounded. For on the other side, if we looke to the earth, it is as our fostermother that feedeth and cherisheth vs, and yet notwithstanding we wote not how. VVe see wel ynough how it is tilled, and we can tell well ynough how to talk of it: but yet must we needs be astonished euen in that behalf. And that is the conclusion of the text. Seing then that we haue a mirroure of Gods incomprehensible power and wisdom, euen in the verie earth that wee treade vpon: what shall we haue if wee looke vp too heauen which is farre aboue, and wherunto we be not able to attayne? Is it meete for vs to reply against God, and to aske why he doeth so or so, or why he suffereth this thing or that? Alas, who are we? So then let vs marke well, that when wee haue looked wel vpon the earth, it ought to serue to hold our affections in awe, to the end wee attempt not to aduance ourselues aboue the skyes, but rather yeeld the glorie to our God in all things that it pleaseth him to do, knowing that he is the soueraine God, and that he hath a perfect and substantiall glorie, and that his woonderfull power and might are matched with infinite ryghtfulnesse and wisdom, so as there is no fault to bee found in him. If we conceyue this well, wee shall haue profited greatly for one day.

Now let vs come to that it is sayd, That the starres sung prayfes, and the children of God reioyced in triumph, at the creating of the world. By these words God betokeneth, that as soone as the starres were made, it was a sette song or melodie to glorifie him. Not that the starres sung, nor that they be sensible creatures: but for somuch as god did therein set out his owne greatnesse, goodnesse, power, and wisdom: it is al one as if he had spoken lowd and shrill. Do we then lift vp our eyes to heauen? VVe must needs heare the melodie of the starres, according as they began to sing at the creation of the world. And surely such melodie ought of ryght to waken vs, and to stirre vs vp to sing the Lords prayfes and to glorifie him: Yea though wee were starke deaf, yet ought we to giue eare to so melodious songs and to receyue them: for behold, euen the Angels of heauen are prouoked so to do. But wee bee to blockishe in that behalf, insomuch that when we lift vp our eyes to heauenward to behold the starres, wee consider not too what purpose they should serue vs. Yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs to apply this text to our instruction, to the end we may fare the better by it.

Now then it is sayd in the first part, that the starres began too sing from their first creation. After what maner? As I haue told you already, not with tung, for they bee senselesse and dumb creatures: but the goodnesse, power, and wisdom of God which shyne foorth in the starres, ought to serue vs for as many songs. If the aire rung with shrill and cleere voyces, we ought not to bee more stirred to glorifie our God, than when wee see the woonderfull order which he hath set before our eyes. Howbee it too moue vs yet better to glorifie him, it is sayd that the Angelles reioyced at that sight, and at the hearing of such melodie of the speechlesse creatures, inso much as it made them for to triumph. Heerby we ought to bee moued too glorifie our God, and such a ioy shalbee a ryght and true ioy, and a farre other one than the ioy of these made worldlings and vnthrifits, which cannot bee merrie but in displeasing God.

VVee see heere a farre other gladnesse set afore vs, which is, that the Angells of heauen did as it were leape for ioy, when they sawe the excellent course and woonderfull order of the heaue by Gods appointment. They were then moued to such a reioycing as is mencioned heere. Seing that the Angells do guide vs to the glorifying of God, & to the singing of prayes vnto him: ought not we to be glad when we behold the goodly order which is in the skye? Is not that the point wherunto wee ought too come as oft as we lift vp our eyes aloft? But what? we be farre off from putting the thing in vre which we bee exhorted to heere: for truly when we heare any text of that doctrine, it slippeth away. Although we be warned neuer so much that wee ought to glorifie God in looking vp to heauen and in reioycing at the light of the Sunne: and although we be sufficiently put in mind to do it: yet doeth it slip from vs. But seing that the cheef service which God requireth of men, is to be prayfed at their hands, and wee make none account of it, but (which woorse is) doo rob him of his honour, and diffeate him of that which is his, in that we glorifie him not as he deserueth: surely wee shall pay deerly for it when it commeth to the reckening. True it is that our Lord knoweth well ynough that he cannot drawe any thing from out of vs wherby to be magnified as he is worthie: but yet he is contented that men should exalt him and glorifie him in his works, and that we shuld be moued to prayse him, by the beholding of them. Now if wee do not so, are wee not woorse than traytours? Yes doubtlesse are wee. So then let vs learne to profit in the doctrine that is conceyned heere. By the way let vs mark, that the Angells are termed Gods children, to the end we should be the more perswaded to runne too the triumph that is spoken of heere, and ioyne with them in triumphing out Gods prayes, and in glorifying him with one common accord, when we heare the sayd melodie bothe aboue and beneath, inas much as God hath spread out his glorie euery where. Truly this title of being termed the children of God is graunted to the Angells by a speciall priuiledge, bycause they approche neere vnto him, and haue such a noblenesse in them, that they be aboue all other creatures. They are not only Gods messengers: but also are called principalities and powers, bycause that by them, as by his hands he executeth whatsoeuer hee thinketh good.

Col. 1. c. 16.

Behold how the Angelles are surely the children of God: but yet are wee called so as well as they. VVhy so? Bycause God created vs after his owne image and likenesse. And although this were defaced by the sin of Adam: yet was it repayed again in the chozen by the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ, who is the lyuely image of God, and we were so exalted by his spirit, as wee bee now set in our former state again, and Iesus Christ hath doone vs the honour to come of the line of Abraham, that is to say, to clothe himself with our nature, too the end to recorde vs to God his father. Then seing its so, let vs marke that God sheweth vs in this text, after what fort we may be sure to bee children, and consequently to possesse the heauenly heritage, which is ordeyned for vs, as well for vs as for the Angells of Paradise. For although wee creepe heere vpon earth, and bee creatures so wretched and fraught with infirmitie, as we may bee ashamed of our want and wretchednesse: Yet will God find the meanes to coupple vs with the Angells of heauen. Herewithall let vs vnderstand, that the Angells tremble when they behold heauen and earth, and although they be excellent creatures, yet are they driuen to bee abashed at the beholding of such a sight as is in heauen and earth. Now seing that the Angells, which are so excellent aboue men, bee neuerthelesse abashed at the greatnesse of God: ought not wee to bee more than rauished into woonderment, when wee open our eyes and behold Gods woonderfull woorks, and when wee heare the goodly melodie that is in all his woorks? Alas, should we be so vnthankfull as to shet our eyes that wee might see nothing? Should wee play the deaf men that wee myght heare nothing? So then let vs followe the Angells, who are set foorth to vs here as guides, to the intent that God myght be glorified at our hands. And if wee glorifie him in all his woorks, he will take and auow vs for his children, and shewe himself alwayes a father towards vs. Thus ye see what we haue to consider vpon this sentence where it is sayd, that all Gods children reioyced in tryumph, when they sawe the starres of the morning reioycing toogether. And it is puposely sayd All, too the end wee myght knowe, that such as giue not their mynd earnestly to the magnifying of God in his power which he vttereth in his woorks, shall be cut off from his house, and are vnworthie to be reckened in the number of his children. Now let vs passe further. Our Lord commeth to the Sea. VVho hath set barres (sayeth he) to the sea? who hath shet it vp within barres and doores? Thou shalt not passe any further, thus farre shalt thou come and no more. VVhen the sea swelleth, it seemeth that it shuld drowne and swallowe vp all: yet notwithstanding we see it is all the while as is were in prison, yea and God holdeth it as a nurce should hold a litle babe. He hath set the clouds and mistes about the sea, as litle swadlingbands, and as a garment to couer it. The sea then seemeth to be as a litle babe whom God weeldeth as he listeth. And heerein also he continueth the magnifying of his woorks, to shewe vs that such an excellencie ought to suffyze to make vs walk in humblenesse, and not to be any more so bold as too set vp our bristles against him, according also as he speaketh by his Prophet Ieremye: Feare ye not mee (sayeth he) me which haue set the bounds of the sea? He sayeth this, bycause the sea is aboue vs. True it is that the simple and ignorant perceyue not that the sea overpeereth vs, and that it is hygher than the earth: but they suppoze that the water is vnder the earth and farre beneath it. But it is cleane contrarie. And when wee bee neere the sea, wee see and perceyue euen by eyesight, that it is hygher than the earth. Now seing that the sea is so aboue vs: wherof is it long that wee bee not swallowed vp euery minute of an houre, seing that the water mounteth farre about our heads? And specially when mention is made of the flud that did once drowne the whole earth, it is sayd that God opened the springs and all the windowes of heauen, and also that he opened the deepes, so as the waters were not restreyned, but let looce. By that dreadful iudgement of the flud, God shewed vs as in a mirror, the thing that should be continually vpon the earth, if he withhild not the waters by miracle. VVee see then that the sea should ouerwhelme all. And what letteth it? See yee not an open miracle? Are wee not conuicted to be

to be worse than churles, if this cause vs not to worship God, and to feare him according to his power, so as hee may haue al foueraintie ouer vs, and we be vtterly beaten downe? And if men presume to set vp their bristles so against God: let them but pick their quarel to the sea, and see if they shall be heard aboute it or no. And what else is the Sea with his great surges and hideous waues, than a signe of the power of him that made it? Now if the waues of the Sea astonish vs: Alas howe much more terrible must the maiestre of our God be to vs? VVhen the Sea 10 casteth vp his boylings with such hideousnesse as we see: wee tremble at it: and shall we not feare the maker of it, but rather bleare out our tongues at him? VVhat a dealing is that? Must it not needes bee sayde that men are starke madde? And that is the cause why God vpbraideth men by his Prophete Ieremie (according as I haue alledged the texte before,) saying: Feare ye not me? me which haue bounded the Sea with sandes for an euerlasting ordinance? But nowe let vs come againe too the wordes that are placed heere. God sayth, that be bath bound- 20 ded the Sea And what are those bounds? Like as erewhile he made mention of the compassing of the earth: so now he speaketh of the bounding of the sea. Yea and what manner of boundes are they? For the better expresing of that which he had sayde: he addeth, That the Sea is in his hande as a little babe is in the wombe of his mother, so that the child lieth not more still in his mothers womb, than doth the Sea within his boundes. True it is that it maketh a great noyse: and specially if it bee tossed with windes and tempestes, and that it swell: then it seemeth 30 that all the worlde shall be ouerwhelmed. But yet can it not passe beyonde his boundes. And what restreyneth it? Like as we see a myracle in that a childe is kept close in his mothers wombe, as in a graue, and howe soeuer hee fare, yet he getteth not out till the day of his birthlyme be fully expyred, according to the common order of nature: Euen so is it with the Sea. Besides this, God addeth yet another similitude: which is, that the Mystes serue to restreyne the Sea, that it shoulde not passe out of his boundes and borders, like as Swadling bandes are to keepe 40 in a yong babe. The childe woulde faine pull oute his armes and legges to make sport: but he is so hild in with his swadlingclothes, as hee is faine to tarie there like a prisoner: Euen so is it with the sea. It riseth in suche wise, as it would (by all likelyhoode) not onely leape out of one place into another, but rather (as I haue sayde already) swallow vp all and put the whole worlde to confusion. VVe see then that the sea fareth so: and is there any cheyne to restreyne the headinesse that we see in it? Although they had neede too bee verie great lettes that shoulde restreyne so furious a creature: yet dooth not God vse any violent meanes to stay it, but onely hath appoynted the Mystes to holde it backe: and thereby we see that he handieth it as a little babe, according to his owne saying. And for prooffe thereof, we see that the mistes are nothing but vapours ingendered in the ayre, and it is a wonder that the same should get the vpper hand of the Sea, so that as soone as a mist ryseth, by and by the sea becommeth calme. VVhereof cometh that? of nothing? VVhat shall a man say then, but that the Sea is 50 as a little babe that is tyed vp in Swadlingclothes? Now although these similitudes seeme verie straunge at the first blush: yet notwithstanding it is imposible too finde fitter kindes of speache to make vs perceyue the incomprehensible maiestie of our God. VVe neede not too mount vp to his maiestie to know it as it is: his wonderfull workes which he setteth dayly before our eyes, do proue his greatnesse and highnesse so sufficiently, as wee cannot denie it. And it is a fowle shame for vs if we acknowledge not his incomprehensible power, in that it is sayde here, that the Sea is restreyned by the Mystes, as a little babe is hilde in by his Swadlingclothes. For what though the Sea be as hideous as men see it? Yet is it hilde within his bounds: it may well leape and mount aloft, but it cannot passe any further. And therefore let vs learne to glorifie our God in his wonderous workes better than wee do: and let vs be ashamed of our carlish vnthankfulnesse towards him, in not acknowledging his goodnesse power and wisdom, that we might yeelde him the prayse that belongeth to him. Therupon let vs returne to Gods principall intent: which is, that we must not stay vpon the sea, to consider the thing simple in it selfe. True it is, that men might take some good instruction, by beholding howe God restreyneth the sea from swallowing vs vp. VVhen we know this, is not euery of vs more than conuicted that the life which God giueth vs, is giuen by myracle? But that were not yet ynough if wee went not further? Beholde, God sheweth vs his woonders, and maketh vs to perceyue them: in these visible things, which notwithstanding are so high, that we be dazeled at them. Now if we be constrained to honour him in acknowledging our wittes to weake to comprehend his highnesse in the very things that are seene with our eyes: what shal we do to his incomprehensible secretes, and to his priuie and hidden determinations, when both generally and particularly hee worketh after such a fashion, as seemeth 60 straunge too vs, and farre outreachteth all our capacite? Becommeth it vs to presume in that case too iudge at all aduerture, and to giue our verdit vpon it as though wee were able to comprehend the things that he doth so beyonde our wit and capacite? He sendeth many aduersities and miseries: One man loseth his goodes, another is smitten with sicknesse, another fallies into reproch and slander, and another is wronged and beaten. It might be thought that God is farre ouerseene in handling men so roughly. No, not so. In all these things it behoueth vs to learne to confesse, that God is alwayes righteous, and that he knoweth cause why to handle vs so, and that the same cause is good and rightfull though it be vnknowne to vs. And if we acknowledge not this, yet forasmuch as we be still in his hande, we shall gaine nothing by all our grudgings. Do wee see the wicked and vngodly haue their full scope in this worlde? Do wee see the dispisers of God liue at their ease? Do wee see them in credit and authoritie, and too bee as the maisters and Lords of the worlde? Do wee see that they spite God dayly, and yet notwithstanding are not punished at the first brant? Do we see on the contrarie part, that wee are faine to indure one while shame, another while trouble, and another while to be intrapped by treafon, and that god succoureth vs not so soone as we would haue him? Let vs wayt patiently till God deliuer vs, as who knoweth what is expedient for vs. And therewithall let vs vnderstande, that if we wonder at the things which he doth here bilow euen in our owne persons, and in the things that we may behold as it were before our feete: much more reason is it that we should wonder at, yea and honour the secrecie that surmounteth euen the capacite of the Angelles. And therefore let these lower things teach vs to settle our selues to the magnifying and glorifying of our God: and so long as we shal be in this world, let vs suffer our selues to be guided and governed by his holy spirite, to the end he may order vs after his good pleasure.

Now let vs fal downe before the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him too make vs feele them. Better than wee haue done, and

specially

pecially to know what we bee, how there is such frailtie in vs, as we fail in all pointes and our wits are so rude and grosse, as we cannot attaine to his glorie, that thereby we may learne, to be vtterly cast downe in our felucs, and yet not ceasse to seeke to be lifted vp by fayth in our good God, namely so it bee alwayes with sobernesse and modestie: and that we knowing how much wee bee beholding and bounde vnto him for the number of benefites which he bestoweth vpon vs dayly, may be stirred vp, yea and wholly inflamed to yeeld him thanks, that by our example the poore ignorant and misbeleuing soules may be drawne to one selfsame fayth & knowledge of the truth, so as all men may with one common accord, prayse, magnifie, and exalt him as hee deserueth: And that for the bringing hereof to passe, it may please him too rayse vp true and faithfull ministers of his worde, &c.

The.cxl.ix.Sermon, which is the third vpon the.xxxviij.Chapter.

This sermon is yet still vpon the.8.9.10.and.11.verses, and then vpon the Text that is added.

12. Hast thou since thy dayes commaunded the breake of the day? or hast thou appoynted the light his place?
13. That it might take holde of the Corners of the earth, and that the vicked might be shaken out by it?
14. It is transformed as clay vwhereon a marke is set, and they holde themselves as a garment.
15. And the light shall be hidden from the vicked, and the arme that is lifted vp shall be broken.
16. Hast thou entered into the deepe vvaters of the Sea? or hast thou searched the bottome of the deptes?
17. Are the gates of death knowne vnto thee? or hast thou sene the gates of the shadowy of death?

He thing that causeth men iudge foolishly of Gods works, is that they make too much haste, and tarie not for the ende, that they might know howe God hath prouided for all things. And so all of vs do put this prouerbe in vre, That haste maketh waite. Therefore we haue need to refraine our selues, that we be not to hastie in casting forth our iudgement afore hand: and therof the things ought well to warne vs which are spoken here concerning the sea For if we looke vpon the mouing vp of the waues, it seemeth that they should ouerwhelme all, and that the worlde should be swallowed vp: and we perchance will say, that God ought to haue remedied it. But when the waues retire againe, & breake in themselves, and cannot passe their bounds: then do we by and by perceyue Gods wonderfull wisdom & power the better, forasmuch as we see that although the sea rush forth with such headnesse, yet notwithstanding he holdeth it back as a man should weeld a litle babe, as was declared yesterday. Then if we be once able to comprehend Gods workes in their perfection: we shal haue wherfore to glorifie him in all respects. But if we fall too shooting fourth of our iudgement in post haste, as we be wont to do: our rashnesse will shew it selfe, and confuzion shall befall vs for our ouerboldnesse. Therefore let vs beare well in minde how it is sayde here, that God hath giuen the sea a law, to say to it, thou shalt go but thus farre and no further. If the sea were euer calme, and that there were neuer any storme or tempest: men should not so well perceyue gods prouidence, and his fatherly care which he hath of men to maintaine them where he hath planted them. But whē as the sea hath leaue to lift vp it selfe so high & mightily, & yet it cannot passe his bounds, but is restrained by this ordinance of God: therby we may perceyue that god hath disposed all things in good measure and reason. Now this may be extended further. For whē we see warres moued, it seemeth that all things both high and low shoulde be mingled together, and by and by we woulde condemne God, if it lay in our power, or else wee fall to iangling against him, for suffering all things too go after that maner. But if we tary the end of them patiently, we shal perceyue that on the one side God chastizeth men iustly by styring vp warres among them: and on the other side, that thereby he intendeth to shewe his power. For when the fire is so kindled: it shall anon after be quenched in a minute of an houre. And then doth God execute his office, wherof it is sayd in the.xlvj.Psalm, that it belongeth too him to breake the speares, to knap asunder the swordes, to ouerthrow the Chariots, and too appease the things againe that were so troubled afore. VVe must then haue Gods ordinance alwayes before our eyes & in our mind, where by he so guideth and gouerneth the troubles that seeme to tend to an euill end, as he turneth them altogither vnto good. For God thinketh it not ynough to cure the mischeef, but he also vseth it to a good end, inso much that we be diuē to confesse, that it is much better for vs that these troubles should happen, than if we shoulde alwayes liue in peace and rest. And therefore if we consider well the causes which moue God to sende such troubles into the worlde: we will no more murmure against him. And although we conceiue thē not: yet let vs not therefore cease to honor reuerētly the secret determination which God kepeth to himself, but let vs tary his leysure patiently, acknowledging our owne small capacitie & rudenesse: and then shal we follow the rule that is giuen vs here, according as it is further saide, Hast thou in all thy dayes commaunded the morning light? lest thou made it too knowe his place whence it ought to come forth? Here our Lord proceedeth to mocke at mens pride when they take vpon thē to iudge of him, saying: how long is it since you were borne? Was there no light nor day before you were? Seing ye be so wise as to finde fault with mee, it is as much to say as there was no order in the world before you were borne: the morning light wist not whence to come, nor whither to go: without you there had bin no orderliness: nothing had bin made, if you had not bin. Sith ye thinke your selues so wise, and will needes control me: I do but only ask you whether you haue at any time appoynted frō whence the light shall arise: and [although ye neuer did it, nor can do it] yet you are still finding of fault with my doings. As for me, I haue alwayes set the difference betwixt light and darknesse euer since the beginning of the worlde: I haue appoynted the night time for darknesse, and caused the breake breake of the day to come forth at my pleasure . I haue set an euerlasting order which ought too bee wonderfull. And if ye were not to churlish, ye could not but confesse that these things are as excellent as can be. Now all this was done before you were borne, or any of all your aunceters : yea euen before any man was created. And what meane you then to fall to controlling of me? Why set you vp your bristles against me? Do but reckon the yeres a little, which the world hath continued. I haue gouerned hitherto, yea and that in such wise, as all creatures must needs confesse, that they be astonished at the sight of that which I shew them. And yet to your seeming, I haue don nothing at all before times. Do ye knowe howe the light should be disposed, and how to draw it out of darknesse, as wise as yee weene your selues to bee? Here then first of all, our Lorde bringeth vs backe to our birth, as if hee should say, reckon your yeres, how long is it ago since yee came into the worlde? Beholde, men are but as Snayles : as soone as they be borne, death threatneth the. Go too, if God graunt them to liue any time here, they do but make a walke of it, as it is sayde in the fourscore and tenth Psalme. They must backe againe by and by, & when they haue made two or three turnes, and leaped a while like frogs, God draweth them away to himself. And yet notwithstanding euē in such shortnesse of life, which passeth as a winde, and slippeth away incontinently, men which are but rottennesse will needes contend and go to law with their maker. And what a dealing is that? Let men consider a little his euerlastingnesse. Therefore when soeuer we be tempted to be so buzie aforehand with God and his works: let vs consider that the time is of no léngth since we were borne, and that during the time of our life, we haue scarcely lifted vp our eyes vnto heauen, to consider any whit at all the euerlastingnesse which is in god, and contrariwise the shortnesse of our owne life. Had we once bethought our selues throughly of that : we would soone stop our mouthes, and all our wits should be shet vp, so as we would not by any meanes go about to murmur against God. Now let vs compare our life with the long cōtinuance of the world: and yet must we passe further: that is to wit, that God continued by himself & with his maiesty before the world was made. Sith it is so: let vs learne to referre our selues wholly to him, knowing it too be an intollerable thing that we should so passe our bounds, & desire to raūge out in iudging of things that we know not. That is one point which we haue to marke vpon this saying, Hast thou in all thy dayes commaunded the breake of the day? For before we were created, God hath alredie set all things in order, yea and that so well, as it shall be to no purpose to carpe at them. Wherefore let vs humble our selues seeing that god had such a fatherly care of vs before he sent vs into the worlde, that he provided all things necessarie for vs aforehand. Further more, whereas here is métion made of the morning light: let vs therein acknowledge Gods infinit wisdome, and his power therewithall. If we were not inured to see the break of the day: should we not be sore afrayde, when hauing scene the darknesse which did daunt and dull vs afore, sodainly as it were in the turning of a hande, wee see the whole worlde so inlightened as it is? Would we not say it were impossible, if we were not acquainted with it? But we esteeme not Gods working when it is once knowne vnto vs: and the woontednesse of it which hee giueth vs, bringeth vs too that vnthankfulnesse: not of it selfe, but through our naughtinesse. Wherefore not without cause doth God say heere, that when a man looketh vpon the morning light, hee must needes bee abashed, if hee consider from whence it commeth. For although the East standeth alwayes in one certaine Coast : yet notwithstanding men see that the Sunne riseth sometymes higher, and sometymes lower, according too the seasons of the yeare. In Winter time, because the Sunne is somewhat further off from vs, hee riseth in a further Coast. And againe in Sommer time, as hee draweth neere too vs, so riseth hee higher and higher till he seeme too bee a most ouer our heades. To be short, like as the East, so also is the morning light. Nowe seeing there is such an order, set out as it were by a payre of compasse, so as the Sunne swarueeth not one hearebreadth from the circuit that God hath appointed him, but commeth alwayes iump to the point: is it not a thing that we may well wonder at? We see that the Sunne neuer goeth out of his way, insomuche that if a man marke all things well, hee shall finde that there is a diuersitie in euerie day of the yere, and yet notwithstanding, if he compare one thing with another, yea euen through the whole yeare, he shall perceyue that all goeth in one continuall race : so as though the Sunne rise at one point [of the skie] too day, and at another too morow, and likewise do set : yet when the yeare commes about, he returneth againe to follow the same trace which he hath continued euer since the making of the worlde, keeping his orderly course in such wise, as a man can nothing neare make a Clocke to keepe so iust compasse as the Sunne doth in his going about. And what a masse is it? It is a thing much greater than the whole earth. Againe, it were verie much if hee had no greater race too go throughout all the whole yeare, than he goeth in one day : and yet neuertheless seeing that he keepeth his order so iust, is it not a thing that ought to rauishe vs into wonderment, that wee might honour the incomprehensible maiesty of God? Yes, if wee were not worse than brute beastes. We haue eyes and see not. God maketh his dumbe creatures to sounde by imprinting his glorie in them : and wee heare nothing of that melodie. So then it is long of nothing but of our owne naughtie lewdnesse, that we take not holde of Gods glorie which is visible to vs, and sheweth it selfe too vs in all his creatures, and in the order whiche hee hath stablised in the worlde, and which hee mainteyneth as stedfastly as hee doth nothing more. It is sayde by and by that the breake of the day spreadeth abrode and lighteth vpon all the wings (that is to say, vpon all the vtermost partes) of the earth. For in the Hebrue tongue, the worde wing signifieth the borders or vtmost partes of anie thing. Yee see then, that the light casteth it selfe al roade, and spreadeth ouer all the worlde as soone as it is in it. When we beholde the darknesse of the night, wee woulde say that there must needes bee some great battell too chace the same away. How so? Who is he that could rid the earth of darknesse, so as men might be euerie where about them, whereas they were earlt as good as shet vp in a dungeon? Who would think that the light should so preuaile with out some great and terrible battell? And yet notwithstanding, the morning doth no sooner open his eyelids, but hee sheddeth forth his light ouer the vtermost partes of the earth : and anon after, the Sunne commeth too take possession of his dominion, according as God hath guen him soueraintie euer the day, to execute his office which he hath committed vnto him. We see he entereth possession so swiftly, as we can scarcely conceiue it in thought. As soone as we open our eyes, the Sunne stryketh in hys beames, and the darknesse is driuen quite away. Nowe, shall wee farther this vpon the Sunne whiche is a lifelesse creature? It is impossible. Then muste wee go too the Workeman, and acknowledge his Maiesty too bee so excellent, as all men ought too humble themselves themselves and to flake vnder it, and to giue their neckes to the yoke, in honouring the greatnesse and excellencie which appeare in all Gods workes, and not repine any more against him whatsoever he do. For if we must needs be confounded, and our wits faile vs in the things that are visible and open before vs: needs must we of good right sroupe and wayt for the full discouery of the last day, whē the case concerneth his incomprehensible secrets. So thē, let it now suffice vs to conceyue those things by fayth, which we cannot yet perceiue till we haue learned more: which shall be when our good God hath bereft vs of this mortal flesh, drawne vs home to himselfe, and fashioned vs like to himselfe in glorie. It is sayd immediately, that the wicked shall be shaken out of the earth. Some expounde this, that the Sunne ingendereth many diseases, & therefore that when the day breaketh, it is as ye would say, a cleansing of the worlde from wicked men, inasmuche as some disease dispatcheth them. But that agreeth not in any wise to the matter. For first and foremost the breake of the day doth rather releue men, forasmuch as at that time we haue our bodies most weeldie and best disposed. Yea and euen the poore soules that are sicke, and haue bene turmoyled all the night, are somewhat cheered when morning is come, inasmuch as yee shall see them well eased by it. And that is the cause why the Prophete Malachie speaking of our Lorde Iesus Christ, calleth him the sonne of Righteousnesse, where in he taketh his similitude of the day sunne, and of the things that we finde by experience, namely, that hee bringeth vs health in hys wings, that is too say, in his beames, and that the same cleazeth the earth, and cheereth our bodies that were dumpish with humors, according as wee knowe that the night bringeth such things. And truly if the breaking of the day ingendred diseases, good men should be subiect to them as well as ill men. And therefore the fittest exposition is, that the wicked shall be shaken out of the earth, that is to say, they shall be discerned or spyed out. For if there were darknesse continually: men coulde not discern blacke from white. But when God hath so spred out light ouer all the worlde, then it is seene how euerie man behaueth himselfe. True it is that the wicked ceasse not to misbehave themselves all the day long: for they haue no feare of God, and although they be ashamed of men, yet fall they to all licenciousnesse, inasmuch as they ceasse not to play their looce pranks euen at high noone day: but yet do we perceiue some footsteps of that which is spoken here. Things are out of order in the worlde, and yet notwithstanding, Gods order appeareth in them, and is seene through them: so that we may say, it is true that God giueth Satan head, & restrayneth not the wicked so much as he could do, but giueth them libertie to triumph in naughtines, & so are things in a broyle on the one side: and yet notwithstanding, for the preseruacion of mankind, Gods intent in sending the light, is to repress the wicked. For what a thing were it, if the wicked were not bridled by the secret prouidence of God? Surely we should perish at euery turne. Yea, and into what rage would Satan the driuer of them thrust them headlong, if god wrought not in that behalf? We know that Satan is the deadly foe of all men, and desire nothing so much as to make cleane riddance of al creatures, and to wipe the remembrance of God out of the worlde: and therefore needs must the order come of God and the troubles and disorder come of men. So then although the wicked do still dwell vpon the earth in the brode daylight, and put their disorders in practise: yet doth God continually discover them, and by that means brydle them, so as the earth is after a sort cleazed by the rising of the Sunne, I meane not from va-

ours that had raigned in the night, nor from other corruptions that gathered together when the ayre was so thickned: but I meane that God purgeth or clengeth the earth from wicked folke, by abridging them of their libertie, by cause men can poynt oute the naughtipackes with their finger, and they are as then somewhat ashamed: I say that euen the shamelesse which haue (as ye would say) sealed vp their own eies, haue notwithstanding some inward remorse, so as they suffer not themselves to rush out into the extremitie of their lewdnesse. Thus ye see that the breake of the day purgeth the earth after a sort, howbeit not altogether, for God maketh dayly purgings. Now he addeth one other effect of the Sunlight: which is, that the earth taketh as it were a newe shape, and that the things whiche the earth conteyneth, serue it for a garment when the Sunne shyneth after that maner. For in the night season the earth is shapelesse, a man seeth nothing of it. It is then (as ye would say) a great Quamire, where nothing can be discerned. But when the Sunne beginneth to rise, it is as a man had taken pottes oute of a lump of earth, and made them and well trimmed them. Then is the earth fashioned, which before was without fashion. Therefore when God sendeth the light of the day, it is all one as if he fashioned the whole earth by giuing it beautie, to the ende wee shoulde beholde it with wondering: and so whereas it was naked, shet vp and barrein afore, (at leastwise as in respect of our eyes:) he clotheth it againe. For here the case concerneth mens sight. The earth in the night is as it were desert and waste, and there is nothing seene vpon it. But in the daytimes it is clothed againe, by cause that which way soeuer wee turne our eyes, we see the godly deckings that God hath put vpon it, according as he sayth, that he crowneth the yeare with his blissing: inasmuche that when hee replenisheth the earth with frutes, it is all one as if hee did put on goodly garments, Crownes, Garlandes, and suche other things vpon it. When wee see that God worketh after that maner, haue we not wherewith too bee astonished, yea and cause to confesse that the greatnesse of his woorkes surmounteth all our wits, and that we vterly fayle of them? For although we may in part tast of his goodnes, power, wisdom and iustice: yet notwithstanding we must bee faine at length in conclusion to crie out with Dauid, Lord how wonderful and deepe are thy workes? They be a bottomlesse pit, and who shall reherse them vnto thee? True it is, that Dauid streyneth himselfe too reckon vp Gods workes, & not to babble of them without knowing ought of them. God then had shewed him that which he sayth: and we also may partly well iudge of the things that God sheweth vs in the whole creation of the worlde, & in the order which he hath stablished there in. There wee shall see some footsteppes of his iustice, goodnesse, power and wisdom (as I touched before:) but as for the comprehending of all things that wee perceiue to the vttermost point, we shall come farre short of that. Then must we be faine to cry out with wonderment, Lord how maruelous are thy workes? Lo what we haue to marke in effect vpon this streyne where it is sayde, that the earth taketh a newe shape or fashion, and that the things which God hath set vpon it, are as garments wherewith it is decked. And whereas this is done day by day: yet if common custome inured vs not vnto it, surely wee would say they were wonderfull things. Wherefore let vs learne not too measure the worthinesse of Gods woorkes by our dayly inioying of them: but too bee so muche the more strayed vpon too say, that there is a worker whome wee must not touche too carpe at any of his dooings, but rather saluēt our felues too him with all humilitie. Nowe God addeth immediatly, that the wicked shall not inioy the light, and that the loftie arme shall be broken. This serueth to prevent a question that might bee objected. Howe nowe, [might some man say:] Seeing that God hath ordeined the Sunne to giue light to the worlde, and set things in so goodly order: why suffereth hee the wicked to inioy that benefite? For he ought too haue set it aside for his owne children which serue and honour him. It should seeme therefore that he doth amisse in this case, that the light of the Sunne is common both to good and bad. But truly, herein wee ought to consider Gods goodnesse the better, according also as our Lorde Iesus Christ telleth vs. Follow your heavenly father (sayth he) who maketh his Sun to shine euen vpon the vnworthie. therefore do good to your enemies, & to such as haue done you harme. Iesus Christ would not haue spoken so, if we had not iust cause to glorifie God for inlightning the whole world after that maner, notwithstanding that the most part bee nought worth and wicked. Howbeit in this streyne there is yet somewhat more shewed, that is to wit, that God calleth vs after a sort to his iudgement, as if he should say, True it is that the Sunne doth for a time shine vpon the wicked as well as vpon the good, and the one of them liueth as well as the other: But tarie a while, for the wicked are not heyres of the worlde: and although that as now they receiue that which belongeth not to them, and haue their eyes open to receiue the light of the Sunne: yet shall they be vterly bereft of it in the end. Therefore he sayth, their light shall be taken from them. VVhen he sayth their light, he sheweth that for the present time wee haue no more aduantage (to outwarde apparance) than the dispisers of God and the heathnish sort haue. For they draw the ayre as well as we, they haue the light as well as we, and they eate and drinke as well as we. Ye see then that it behoueth vs to beare patiently such mingling as now. Neuertheless it is not without cause that God dooth heere lende the light vnto the wicked. For it is too make them the more vnexcusable, yea and in verie deede it is but such a light as shal not continue with them for euer. But whereas we on our part do homage vnto God, as well for our life as for all the appurtenances thereof: it is for that we shall be heyres of the worlde as his children: and not without cause doth S. Paule in the fourth to the Romanes couey the same to Abraham, and to al the faithfull. Therefore let vs learne that whensoever the Sunne shineth, the same is a part of our inheritance: and so far as much as God hath adopted vs to be his children, the Sunne is a detter vnto vs, and we may reckon it as a part of our goodes. As much is to be thought of our eating and drinking, and of our inioying of all the things that the earth bringeth forth. It is not due to vs on Gods behalfe, but it proceedeth of his mere liberalitie. But for so much as he hath chosen vs to be his childre, & we do with a pure hart claime him to be our father: the earth oweth vs nourishment, and al creatures are in our hand, that is to say, we may vse them freely. And the same vse of them shal continue to vs for euer: not that wee shall haue any neede too eate or too drinke, when we be once gone out of this world: but my terming of the vse of them to be continuall or eueralting, is for that it is blessed and blissefull: and our present vsing of Gods creatures is a helpe to further our saluation: for by that meanes god maketh vs to feele his goodnes & loue. And when we be made partakers of the heavenly glorie, the worlde shall then be more ours than euer it was, notwithstanding that we shall not haue any neede of meate, or of drinke, or of rayment. For yet shall we haue a better and perfecter possession of it than wee haue at this day. So then, not without cause doth God adde heere, that the light which the wicked haue, and which they claim to them selues, shall be taken from them. And that may serue vs for a declaration of that which was touched afore, namely, that the wicked shall be shaken out by the breaking of the day, that is to say, that they will disguise themselves, but our Lorde doth then restreine them, and that although there be some disorder, yet men see some order intermedled with it, whereby the great troubles are asswaged, which without that, were ynough to destroy the whole worlde. Therefore if now adayes wee see that the wicked maye boast of their hauing of the light as well as wee, yea and (which worse is) that they haue their full scope, and that the poore children of God are troden vnder foote, troubled and put to open shame, and scarcely haue wherewith to feede themselves slenderly: it behoueth vs to beare it patiently. And why? For in the end the light shall be taken from the wicked. It is sayde also, that the loftie arme shall be broken. By the loftie arme, God betokeneth the power and credit which the wicked haue in the world, in asmuch as he giueth them their full scope for the exercising of his children: for it is for our behoof to be tamed. If we had the world at will, we should no more know what it is to beare Gods yoke. Therefore it behoueth vs too passe throug the troubles & misorders that are seene. Also it is to trie our faith: for had we a Paradise here in this worlde: where were our hope? VVe could not be moued to seeke the spirituall life. Yea and although we be as miserable as may be: yet can we not perceiue that there is a better state to be desired: and what would we then do if we had all things as we would wish? So then it is requisite that God should quicken vs vp to seeke his kingdom: & that is the cause why he giueth the wicked their full scope, and suffreth them to lift vp their arme. Truly it is a very fore and troublesome temptation, when we see the wicked to be after that sort as it were Lords and maisters of the world. And wherof commeth that, but bicause God hath reached them his hand, and is minded to magnifie them after that fashion? VVe see then that the sillie weakings shalbe troubled: but let vs content our selues with that which is said here, namely that the armes of the mightie shalbe crushed & broken in the end. So the, as oft as we see the wicked beare sway in pride and crueltie, and vaunt theselues of their credit: let vs resort to this doctrine for our cofort: that is to wit, that whereas they haue their armes vpō vs as now, & it seemeth that they should break our heads: God can welinough broose and breake them asunder. And therefore let vs tary patiently till God performe that which he hath spoken, & then shall we not be disappointed, so our mindes be quiet to giue place to his prouidēce. For he knoweth the convenient times of working, and it is not for vs to appoint him any thing. Furthermore, the wicked ought here too bethink themselves well. True it is that this doctrine ought to serue chiefly to the comfort of the faythfull, that they may bee vphilde in the mids of their aduersities and oppressions, when men trouble them and wrong them. Let them at such tymes call to remembrance, that the armes of the wicked must be aduanced for a time, vntill God breake them. Yet notwithstanding the holy ghost ment also too threaten the wicked, bicause they be so outrageous, & beare themselves in hande, that they be able to worke wonders, and remoue mountaynes. God sayth to vs in one worde, Tarie ye till the armes that are nowe lifted vp be broken: and that must needs come to passe. VVill wee not then haue God to be our enimie and aduersarie partie? Let vs not lift vp our armes: that is too say, let vs not stretch them out (as the Scripture sayeth) too committ outrages: Let vs not go aboute to hurt or harme our neighbours, bours, but let euery of vs modestly consider what is lawfull for him. Let vs so restreine our armes, as they may be ruled by Gods worde, and no man presume beyonde his owne calling. If we proceede after this maner, god will alwayes giue vs new strength. And although our armes be wearied, yet will he strengthen them again in the end, according also as hee sayeth, that the doctrine of the gospell most serueth to strengthen vs when we be weak. But who foerer listeth vpon his arme aloft, that is to say, whofoerer taketh more vpon him than he ought to doo, must in the ende haue his armes broken by God. For God is an enemie too all these great takers vpon them, whiche mounte vpon so high in pride, and haue no myldnesse in them. Thus much concerning that poynnt. Nowe it is sayde by and by after: Diddest thou euer attaine to the drops of the Sea? The Hebrue worde which God vseth here, betokeneth Tears, for it commeth of a worde that signifieth to weepe or shedde teares. And if a man translate it, vnto the great deepes of the Sea: the woorde will also verie well agree with it. But by the way, it behoueth vs too marke the similitude: which is, that God meaneth that the springs which are in the great deepes, are as Tears. VVhencometh the infinit abundance of water in the Sea, but of the droppes that are there, whereof flow the waters? Nowe the sayde abundance is as it were Tears. And surely the wellsprings are termed (as ye woulde say) the eyes of the earth. For looke as the eyes doo shedde forth teares in a man: so doo the fountaynes ooze oute moysture in the earth. God therefore in this streyne vseth that similitude and sayeth: Come on, diddest thou euer go downe into the bottome of the Sea, to search out the drops that it yeldeth forth? That is to say, didst thou euer enter into the deepes, to see the waters that sewe out there, and too knowe whence the abundance cometh which thou seest, and whereat thou art abashed? And for the better confirmation hereof, he addeth, Hast thou seene the gates of Death? or hast thou behelde the gates of the shadowe of Death? Heere and in the things that he will adde afterwarde concerning the great roomth or largenesse of the earth: hee intendeth too shewe in effect, that our wittes are too slender and feeble, too comprehend what is in the things that are most apparant and neare vnto vs: and that we must needs (spite of our teeth) confesse that God sheweth vs such woonders, as serue to rauish vs about all our vnderstanding. Then if we be enforced to confesse that there is such wisdom in God, yea euen in respect of his workes which are open too vs, and which he sheweth vs as it were with his finger: what shall we do in the things that are hidden, and which hee referueth to himselfe till the last day? As when he suffereth or aprounteth many things to be done in the world, which seeme straunge and secreete to vs, and wherein wee perceyue no reason, for they be [perchaunce] some of his spirituall Secretes. VVhat will we say to them? If wee cannot comprehend the things that are heere as it were before our feete, and wherevpon wee treade, I say if we cannot fasten vpon them: what shall wee say too the things that are about Heauen, and which surmounte all creatures, and outreache the common order of nature? Lo in effect what Gods meaning is. But nowe let vs learne when our wittes are too eger in iudging of things that are not lawfull for vs, let vs learne (I say) to thinke vpon the Sea, and vpon the deepe places of the waters, and saye, Go too wretched wyght, what intendest thou to doo?

It is sayde that Gods Secretes are so deepe a gulfe, as a man can neuer come to the bottome of them: and that those gulfes doo farre exceede the gulfes of the Sea.

Canst thou but draine a Riuer, to see from whence the waters spring? No, thou canst not so much as conceyue what the spring of a litle fountaine is, whereout of neuerthelesse there issueth a great Brooke. VVhen thou hast bethought thee throughly, thou canst not tell howe to drayne oute a Riuer or a Fountaine: and howe canst thou then enter into the gulfes of the Sea, too spie oute by inchmeale whence that abundaunce of water cometh, which is gathered together there? Nowe if thou comprehendest not a materiall thing: howe darest thou pleade agaynst God, and be so rash and full of presumption, as to replie agaynst thy Iudge, and to go about too subdue him vnto thee? Lo what we haue to marke vpon this streyne. True it is that this doctrine seemeth too be common among vs: and there is no man but he vnderstandeth it. But what for that? Doo we fare euer the better by it? [No, no:] we see that euerie man taketh leaue and libertie to iudge foolishly of Gods workes. And why? Bycause wee bee not acquainted with our owne smalnesse, nor haue at any time learned that God intendeth to holde vs in awe, to the ende we should not presume aught of our selues, when he giueth vs such instructions heere by lowe. VVe need not mount about the clowdes to know the incomprehensible maiestie of our God: let vs but cast down our eyes, and looke to our feet (as I haue sayd afore) and we shall be confounded out of hand. How then should it be possible for vs to enter into the secret purpose of our God, to know all things so as no thing might escape vs? Our nature were rather too go downward than to mount vponward. VVho is he then that hath giuen vs wings to stie so high? Nay we bee so lumpish, that we fall alwayes to the ground: and yet notwithstanding, if we looke but euen vpon the things heere beneath: beholde they be as bottomlesse pittes to swallow vs vp. And howe shall we then mounte vp to heauen, to searcho the things that God hath shette vp there? Must it not needes bee a marueylous overweening, and such a one as commeth of forgetfulnesse? For if we had but one droppe of settled witte, surely wee woulde rather learne too be modest.

Ye see then, that this doctrine is not superfluous, at leastwise if men woulde put it well in vre. But for a conclusion let vs learne, that God hath granted vs a singular benefite, for so much as in this our weaknes & rawnesse of vnderstanding, hee hath giuen vs a farre better thing than the sight of the bottomlesse deepes. VVhy so? For in the Lookingglasse of his Gospell he maketh vs to beholde the secretes of heauen, so farre forth as is expedient for vs. Yea, I say so farre as is necessarie for vs: for it is not for vs to followe our owne foolish and inordinate lustes: but we must content our selues with that which God openeth vnto vs, and not be curious in searching beyonde his worde. Let it content vs that he enlighteneth vs with his holy spirite, to the ende wee may iudge of his workes as becommeth vs. And if wee do so, then shall the thing be fulfilled which Moyse sayth: namely, Say not any more, who shall go downe into the deepes? VVho shall climbe vp about the clowdes? VVho shall go ouer the Sea? Beholde, the woorde of God is in thy mouth, and in thine heart: Content thy selfe. So then, seeing that God graunteth vs this prerogatiue of teaching vs all things in his schoole which he knoweth to be for our profite: it is as good as if he made vs to passe ouer the Sea, or too go downe into the deepes, or too climbe about the Clowdes, or (too be short) too come as it were into his busome. VVhat desire wee more? Then let vs bee contented with the knowledge which hee giueth vs as nowe by his worde, and by the learning learning of his Gospell, wayting till he discouer it more fully and largely vnto vs, which shal then come to passe, when he maketh vs too see the things face to face, which we see now but in part.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may thinke better vpon the wants and corruptions of our nature than wee haue done, to the end that we distrust our selues, and being vtterly at our witts end, may runne vnto him, and

not desyre any thing but that he will so gouerne vs, as we may be clenzed from all our vyces, and so reformed after his image, as al the sinfulness of our nature may be beaten down and killed, to the end that we feeling how his power hath wrought so in vs, may glorie in nothing but in his mere goodnesse. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe al poore ignorant foules from the miserable bondage of error and darknesse, too the ryght &c.

26. To make it rayne vpon the lande vvhether no person is, and vpon the vilderneffe vvhether is no man.
27. Too fill the vvhild and vvaft places, and to make the budde of herbes to come forth?
28. VVho is the father of the rayne? or vvhether hath begotten the droppes of the deaue?
29. Out of vvhether belly came the yce? and vvhether hath ingendered the frost of the heauen?
30. The vvatere are hidden as a stone, and the face of the deepe is frozen.
31. Canst thou restraine the pleasantnesse of the Pleyades? or vntie the bandes of Orion?
32. Canst thou make the Mazzaroth to come forth in their time? or canst thou guyde Arcturus vwith his Sorines?

Although the matters that are rehearsed here do seeme to be none other than such as are commonly knowne alreadye: yet if we looke well to all things, every man will deeme it needfull that our ouerweening should be repressed, not with a woord or twayne, but with long declaracions, such as God maketh here. For although wee haue graunted that our witts are to weake to comprehend Gods works: yet notwithstanding there needeth but the turning of a hand to leade vs into some foolish curiositie and presumption: and that foolehardinesse caryeth vs away headlong like a madnesse. And therefore let vs not thinke it straunge, that our Lord vseth here so long talk to make vs perceiue how it is not for vs to iudge of his works, but that it is ynough if we knowe them in part according to our rudenesse, and that he giue vs some taste of the. And that is the meane wherby we shall to our profit beare away the things that shall be spoken therof. Now let vs looke vpon that which is sayd heere. Mention is made of the earth, and God demaundeth whither a man be able to measure it or no. And there is a dubble measuring of the earth. The one is too knowe of what largenesse the world that is inhabited is of: and this may after a sort be comprehended by coniecture. Also there is the whole earth in itself in comprehending the same parte that is so couered with the sea as it is not scene: and it is impossible to iudge of the greatnesse of that. But put the case that men could determine of euery whit of it: yet notwithstanding when men had knowne such a miracle, they ought too be abashed at it and too glorifie the maker.

So then, it is not without cause that God demaundeth whither we be able to do it or no. Neuerthelesse it is impossible. For (as I sayd afore) scarcely haue men any substantiall proofs wherby to knowe the length and bredth of the world that is inhabited. And if a man speake of the whole masse and bodie of the earth: it is impossible too bring it too passe, that the largenesse therof should be knowne. There is not then any wit of man that atteyneth therunto. And what a thing is it then to go about to inclose the maiestie and secret purpose of God within our vnderstanding? It is sayd that God holdeth the earth as if I hild three or fowre graynes of dust in my hand. I neede not to open my hand for it: I keepe my hand shet, & yet hold the dust still within it. God vseth the same similitude by his prophet Esay, too shewe that when wee speake of him, or think of him, we must not measure him by the things that are scene. For the earth is infinite in respect of vs, and yet notwithstanding he can hold it cloce in his fist: that is to wit, there is no proportionable respect betwixt his incomprehensible being & ineffimable glorie, & the whole masse of the earth as greate as it is: the earth is nothing at all in comparison of those. Ye see then that the thing which we haue to marke in this sereyne, is that when we consider that the earth is of so greate largenesse as it outreacheth our vnderstanding: it behoueth vs to be wel assured that he which holdeth it or is able to hold it in his fist, hath another maner of greatnesse in himself, & ther-

therefore that there's no more for vs to do, but to confesse our owne feebleness, and that we bee to rude and grossewitted. Herevpon let vs honour him, and acknowledge that all his doings are of such perfection, as there is no fault to be found in them, and that it is not for vs to repleie against him, bycause we bee to ignorant. Thus ye see what we haue in effect to gather vpon that which is sayde here. By and by after there is speaki<sup>g</sup> of the way of light, and afterwarde of the thunder and lightning, according as mention was made of them afore. And not without cause is this matter repeated: For (as wee sawe yesterday) as soone as the breake of the day appeareth, the whole worlde is by and by lightned throughout, and the wings of the Earth, that is too say, the vtermoste partes of it are discovered, so as the earth taketh a newe shape, and all this is done in one instant of tyme. Seeing then that such a myracle appeareth before our eyes: is it not reason that God shoulde bee glorified thereby? And if wee will needes play the iolie fellows heere: do wee not deserue to bee punished for our ouerweening, and too be laughed to scorne at Gods hande for this foolish lust of ours, which haue to comprehend the things that are too high for vs? By what path shoulde the light go? Is it in vs to appoynt it? If wee woulde appoynt it his way howe farre and wyde it shoulde spreade, howe is it possible for vs too go beyonde the whole masse of the earth, and too attaine to the vtermost part of the world? VVhat a furious madnesse were it for vs too presume to iudge of Gods wonderfull workes? Sith wee cannot conceyue howe it commeth too passe that the light is so soone sprede abroade, when it hath once taken possession by the name of the Sunne, to reigne ouer the day? So then let vs learne to exalt God in such wise in all his creatures, for the greatnesse and highnesse of his workes: that wee on oure side acknowledging our owne slendernesse, may bee as it were bridled to humble our selues before him. For, the way for men to honour God accordingly, is by no meanes to glorie in themselves, nor to take anie thing vpon them aboue him. For if I magnifie God neuer so muche, and in the meane whyle, will needes bee as his companion: too what purpose is that? VVee cannot doo God greater wrong, than too compare oure selues with him, or to desyre to abace him vntoo vs, too say that hee shoulde bee our mate and fellowe. God then shall neuer bee duely honoured of vs, except wee bee first as it were brought too nothing, and that wee acknowledge that there is nothing in vs but wretchednesse.

Lo what we haue further too beare in minde, when mention is made heere of the way which is hidde by the light, eyther when it setteth, or when it ryseth too the worlde. It is sayde afterwarde, That no man knoweth the treasures of the Snow and the Hayle. It is not here onely that God vseth the same similitude of treasures. For when hee speaketh of any of the chastizements which hee sendeth vpon men, he sayth he hath terrible sortes layde vp in his treasures, which no man knoweth of. And this similitude importeth two things. The one is, a greate store (for a man will not saye that a dozen of Frenche-crownes are a treasure, but there must bee a greate masse or quantitie of them:) and the other is, that a treasure is hidden or layd vp. Therefore when God speaketh of the treasures of snowe and hayle, he meaneth that there is a store of them so farre passing the vnderstanding of man, as wee must needes bee astonished too thinke vpon it: and therewithall he betokeneth also that the cause thereof is hidden from vs.

VVe see the Snowe and the Hayle wellynough: but doo wee perceyue any thing of the making of the haile and snowe? Doo wee knowe howe it commeth too passe? True it is, that the Philosophers can well dispute of it, and men shall see some causes by them alledged: But yet is that a verie small insight of the wonderful order that God hath set in nature: hee hath a secrete priuie by himselfe which is further off from the reache of our capacite, so as wee come short of it. Nowe wee perceyue wherefore God speaketh after that manner of the Treasures of Hayle and Snowe. It remaineth that we put the same doctrine in practise. VVhich of vs is able too make one handfull of Snowe by arte or cunning? VVho can turne the water or vapours into haile or hoarefrost? Let men beate their braynes aboute it as much as they list, yet are they neuer able to compass it. VVe cannot make one heare of our head white or black. Nowe sith it is so, haue we not cause to magnifie the inestimable power of God when hee couereth the whole earth with snow? VVhence taketh hee so greate a quantitie of waters? Truly men will say it is ingendered in the middle roomth of the ayre which is colde, and that when a greate quantitie of vapours bee drawne vp thither, at length the same cometh together and freezeth, & therof ingendreth the snow: & if the same stuffe be more harder bound, the is haile ingendred, because the thing is become more fast and substanciall. Men may well say so, and it is true: but yet is it not a straunge thing that in so short a time, so greate store should vtter it self, which had beene hidden afore? Sometimes the weather shall be very faire in winter, and within a two or three dayes the snow shall fall a two or three foote deep vpon the ground? I pray you ought not such a change to make the heares stand vp stiffe vpon our heades (at leastwise if we were not too dull) to the ende to leade vs to some feare of God? Furthermore, if we be rightly minded, ought we not to be moued to beare such reuerence to our God, as to acknowledg his power to bee so high aboue vs, yea euen in the visible & earthly things, as it giueth vs cause to glorifie him by cofessing our own ignorance? Ye see then what we haue to gather vpon this worde Treasure, for the well applying thereof to our owne vse. Besides this, let vs call to minde how it is sayd in the song of Moyses, That God hath his chastizements layd vp in his treasures, which we comprehend not: to the ende we steppe not out of square as wee see men do, which oftentimes worke spite against God, hearing themselves in hand, that they be scaped Gods hand. For if he haue deliuered them from any inconuenience: it seemeth to them that the worlt is past, and so they doo but shake their eares, as the prouerbe sayth. Let vs call too minde this which God telleth vs: know ye (sayth he) the rodde that are layd vp in my treasures? As if he should say, whē I shall haue beaten you after one fashon, and afterwarde haue pittied you, thinke not your selues too be quit for all that: for I haue other meanes which you cannot conceiue. VVhen we haue beene chastized after one maner, there are a dozen scourges mo which you neuer thought of. Therefore stand ye in feare of me, and preuent mine anger, and tempt me not herealter, least I vtter my scourges more and more vpon you. And that is the cause why it is sayde here, that God keepeth the treasures to the time of aduersitie, and to the day of incounter and battell. As who would say, they be his artillerie, his speares & his swords wherewith to fight agaynst his enimies. No doubt but God in vsing this similitude of incounter and battell, ment too betoken that if wee haue any warre with him, he is fenced and furnished alreadie after suche a sort, as wee muste needes go by the worse: for wee haue no strength nor power too stande against his hande. VVe may may well put on armour, and assemble all the ayde of the world: but which of vs can scape his hand when he shall haue set al his creatures in battell after that maner against vs, and commaunded them too giue charge vpon vs? And therefore lette vs learne firste of all, that God needeth not too borowe helpe, when he would be auendged of his enemies: it is ynough for him to determine it in his owne purpose, or too speake the woorde, or to shewe but his will: and immediatly both heauen and earth will bring him armies out of number. For sith hee couereth the earth a foote or twayne thicke with snowe, is hee not able to ouerwhelme vs when he listeth? thinke wee that his power is abated that hee cannot sende snowe thirtie poles deepe above our heads? Againe, sometimes wee see the earth frozen, and the winde doth so binde it as it becommeth as harde as yron: and what letteth that God should not leaue it alwayes in the same plight? Lette vs marke then, that God needeth not to make any great preparation to incounter his enemies, and to put them to the foyle. Let him but onely say the woorde, and the whole world shal be on fire, and there is not that creature which shall not serue to destroy men. Sith we heare this, lette vs learne to stoupe vnder the mightie hand of our God, and not make warre with so mighty a Lord: for what shal we gayne by it? Then let vs learne to obey him: for eyther we must be vphild by his hand, or else we must haue it against vs, there is no meane betweene thē. True it is that God will beare with vs for a time, according as it is sayd that he wayteth for menne as it were in couert: but yet must we needes be vnder his protection, or else haue him our enemy, and so will it appeere in the end. Therefore lette vs yeelde our selues vnto him that he may preferue vs and wee continue vnder his gouernance: and if he be the keeper of our welfare, lette vs assure our selues that we be safe agaynst both hayle and all other stormes and tempestes. And why? For the hayle is not ingendered of it selfe, nother doth the snow fall without his commaundement: they are bothe of them his tresures. VVhen a man listeth, he will lay forth the things which he keepeth locked vp: and euen so is it with all creatures, for God sendeth them foorth at his pleasure. Therefore we neede not to feare the hayle nor the stormes, so long as we be in Gods keeping: but contrarywise we must needes be disquieted and vexed continually, if God be against vs. And herewithall let vs marke howe it is sayde, that he reseruetb them to the day of battell, and to the day of aduersitie. As if he should say, men neede not to vaunt themselues as they be wont to do, when God scourgeth them not: for prosperitie doth so rocke vs asleepe, as we bethinke vs not of our faults, nother enter into account with our selues, to know in what cace we be to Godward: but as long as wee haue any respite, wee be like euill paymaysters and vnthrifts that wast away all. For he passeth not for the owing of a hundred crownes so long as he is not called vpon nor his day of payment come: but he maketh good cheere so long as he hath one pennie in his purse. Euen so play wee with God. If he giue vs any respite, wee do nothing else but rustle it out, and we thinke nomore vpon him. Therefore according to that which is shewed vs here, if God sende nother hayle nor thunder, nor skare vs one way or other from heauen: wee muiste not therevpon runne astray, nor fall asleepe. And why? For he can spie fitte time too chastize vs. Then lette vs prevent him, and not tarie till the day of battell come. For when the trumpets sounde alarme and the battell is ioyned, it is to late then to say, let vs fall to composition, let vs deuize some meanes of agreement: yea, yea, for the tyme is past. VVherefore while God forbeareth vs, and giueth vs leyzure to bethinke our selues, so as wee haue as it were a tyme of truce to looke about vs, and to enter into iudgement of our selues. Let vs prevent his rigour, and become our owne iudges, to the end that we be not iudged of him, and let vs cōdemne our selues, to the intent wee may bee quit by his infinite grace and goodnesse. Thus ye see what we haue to marke vpō this streyne where mētion is made of Gods referuē [of things] to the day of battell: namely that it serueth to shew, that we haue warre with him before it come to the giuing of the onfette: like as when warre is proclaymed betweene two princes that are enemies, there will be many bickerings as they go abroad for booties and forage: but when it cometh once to a pitched field, then is it knowne who hath wōne or lost. Euen so is it with vs when we displease our God, & plucke our selues frō his hand, & become stubborne against him: for then is open warre proclaymed on our side. VVe defie not god with our mouth, nother do we send a herault to him to defie him: but yet forasmuch as our sinnes proceede of a furious rage, it is a proclayming of warre agaynst him. And seing he is our enemy, what tarie we for? neuerthelesse the battell is not giuen at the first day, bōt God letteth vs alone so as wee stand vp still for a time. But let vs looke to come to ioyning of hand strokes at length, howbeit in looking for it let vs not linger for it: that is to say, lette vs bethinke vs of it a long whyle aforehand, but let vs not weter in our sinnes and wicked deedes, least wee kindle the fire of his wrath by casting more wood into it to make it too consume vs. Vpon the knowledge hereof, let vs take the aduantage of the tyme, and craue pardon at his hand. Beholde then what wee haue too marke yet further. True it is that God doth oftentimes punish the rightuous as well as the vnrightuous both by hayle and tempests, (for afflictions are common to bothe parts, and contrarywise he maketh the Sunne to shyne both vpon good and bad:) but yet behoueth it vs too bee alwayes perswaded, (as the Scripture telleth vs) that they be Gods scourges, whereby he intendeth to correct our sinnes in sending vs hayle, tempestes, and such other like things. Yet notwithstanding the rightuous haue whereof to reioyce: For they know that Gods chastizing of them is through a fatherly good will, to the ende they should not perish, as S Paule sayeth: The temporall chastizements ought to put vs in minde of our sins, according as they be records of Gods displeasure. Neuerthelesse if we walke in his feare & put our trust in him: he will alwayes pitie vs, and handle vs with mercie & not with rigour: and although he correct vs, yet shall it be for our profit & welfare. God thē sheweth well by outward signes that he maketh warre agaynst those that serue him and walke in his feare. But yet what soeuer befall them, all redoūdeth to their welfare, because he abateth his rigour towards them, and maketh the temporall chastizements to serue thē for medicines & salues, notwithstanding that generally corrections do put vs in minde of our sinnes, and therewithall shew vs that we be at warre with God, and that we deserue to haue him fight agaynst vs, and arme all his creatures too our destruction.

Lo in effect how we ought to practize this text. Now consequently it is sayd, that God will rayne vpon the wilderness where no man dwelleth, and that the earth shall be so moysted as it shall yeeld fruite. VVherin this matter is still continued, namely that God worketh after such a sort euen in the common order of nature, as wee bee abashed and our wittes bee dazed at it. No doubt but wee shall see his doings, yea and conceyue some reason of them: but yet when wee haue cast our cardes throughly, wee shall alwayes bee driuen to conclude, that Gods wisdom

is hidden from vs, (I meene even in all these manifest things) and that there is a cause about vs wherevnto we be not able to reach. Therefore it behoueth vs alwayes to come backe too this poynt, to comprehend thoroughly what is conteyned here. VVee see the rayne fall, and wee know in effect that it is ingendered of vapours: but when wee see that the rayne causeth the earth to budde, yea & that the very wildernesses where dwell no inhabitants were greene also: wee see a thing to wonder iustly at. It will trouble a man cōtly to water a garden: and for all his traueil and labour he can bring nothing about, except God giue influence from heauen. All the waterings in the worlde will do no good, vnlesse some rayne or dewe fall from heauen. One of these hath more workfulness in it, than all the waters that can be brought by mannes deuoyce. Therefore when wee see the desertes growe greene: therein God intendeth to shewe by assured tokens, the effectualnesse of the rayne which he sendeth. For in little Gardines men are continually watering of them, and after ward commeth the rayne and the deawe, so as things growe there euen apparantly to sight. But looke vpon a waste ground which is burnt vp too day, and noman watereth it, and the soyle is drie of it selfe: and yet notwithstanding God maketh it to bring forth abundance of hearbes and grasse, by meanes of his rayne.

Sith we see such things: the more familiarly that God sheweth himselfe to vs, the iuster cause haue we to glorifie him: and if we do it not, wee cannot by any meanes excuse our selues of vnthankfulness. Is it not a great matter that wee see Gods miracles with our eyes, (yea he poynteth vs to them with his finger, and the thing is not seene onely once in a mans life, but it beginneth newe agayne day by day): and yet notwithstanding wee thinke not rightly vpon them? VVee tread vpon the grasse with our feete, and yet wee vouchsafe not to cast our eye thither to say, blisfed be God that maketh the earth beare frute after this sorte. Furthermore let vs therewithall bethinke vs of our owne rudenesse and dulnesse: I cannot tell how one braunche of on hearb springeth forth: I see it with mine eye, but the cause of it is so hidden from me as I am at my wittes end. I see that whe a grayne of corne rotteth [in the earth] it springeth againe, and bringeth forth a number of graynes for the nurrlment of men. I see all these things: and are they not all of them miracles of God? and yet for all that, I cōsider them not as I ought to do. Surely a man would thinke at the first blush, that this lesston were superfluous, and that it were a needelesse thing to treat of the growing of corne and grasse. For doth not euery man see it? And are we not well ynough acquainted with it? Yes truely: but yet for all that, who is he that yeeldeth God his due honour? Do we not deface his glory and maiestie asmuch as we can? Therefore this knowledge which wee weene to haue, shall make vs the more guiltie, because our vnthankfulness bewrayeth it self therein. But howsoeuer the world go, let vs alwayes beare in minde, that euen in the basest things, there is an incomprehensible wisdom of God. VVee will perchauce say, that this is knowne loth to great and small: but if we come once to the fouerayne cause, it will be found that euen the wizest of vs are to seeke in that behalf: and the more that they would shew the finenesse of their wit, the more will God be auenged of their pryde, according also as it is good reason, that he should make vs perceyue how wonderfull his woorkes are, and that when we haue any knowledg of them, the same is but in parte thereafter as it pleaseth him to deale it vnto vs, and that (as hath bene sayd) he alwayes referueth sul some part to himself, in somuch that hee keepeth the causes of things hidden and secrete in his owne minde, whereinto it is not for vs to presume to enter as now. And it is a goodly lesston to know how to put a difference after that maner, betweene the things that God reueleth vnto vs, and the things that he keepeth to himselfe, according also as Moyse speaketh thereof. Our God (sayeth he) keepeth his secrets to himselfe: and the things that are reueled belong to vs and to our children, according as is conteyned in the Law. True it is that there Moyse speaketh of the lawe that was published: as if he had sayd, let vs bethinke our selues, for God hath graunted vs a singular benefite in vouchsafing too shewe vs his will, and in giuing vs peculiar instruction howe to walke in his commaundements. Therefore let vs receyue this record, let vs suffer God to schole vs, and let vs be good scholars to him: and in the meane whyle let vs let him alone with his secretes, that is to say, lette vs holde vs contented with the doctrine that he hath set downe vnto vs, let that bee our meeteyard, and lette vs passe no further. VVhy so? For our Lordes secretes (sayeth he) belong to himselfe, and the things that he reueleth belong vnto vs, and no more. By the way wee may apply this text to that which is sette downe here. VVhy so? For we see what God sheweth vs in the order of nature. Howbeit but in small porcion: for he intendeth to holde vs alwayes shorte, and to shewe vs that wee bee too dull and simplewitted to mount so high as to know Gods secretes. So then let vs learne to take this instruction which God giueth vs, and to profit our selues by it, and let vs go no further. This is a very necessarie admonition, considering on the one side the rechelesnesse, and on the other side the fond presumptuousnesse that is in men. For if God hyde his secretes from vs, it should seeme that we would go about to know them whither he will or no. Is it not apparant howe desirous and eager menne are to knowe things that are not reueled vnto them? O (say they) I would fayne know this, and I would fayne knowe that: and therewithall they streyne themselves to enter into discourse. Of what things? Of the things that are concealed from them in the holy Scripture. Lo how menne haue alwayes ouerloured themselves, to knowe the things that God ment not to teache them, because he knoweth that it is not good for them. VVee see then the madde presumptuousnesse that is in men, to be desirous to cōceyue in their brayne the things that are not graunted to them, and to enter into Gods secretes whither he will or no. Againe, on the otherside they be as rechelesse to take holde of the things that God teacheth vs. God declareth vs his will, so farforth as is for our behoof, & he chaweth our meate to vs to the intēt we might swallow it downe the easlier, & because he knoweth vs to be but weaklings, he teacheth vs familiarly according to our owne nature. Verely the holy scripture is as playn a discoverie of things as can be: the good will of God appeereth there outright: and if wee applied our mindes therevnto, we should find all things there which are requisite for our welfare. For there God applyeth himselfe to our rudenesse, hee talketh familiarly with vs, yea and he lispeth (after a sorte) as a nurse would do with hir little babes. But yet are not wee carefull to profite our selues by folowing him. And therefore seing wee be so rechelesse and negligent to profite by the holy scripture: & yet in the meane while be so curious & inquisitiue, or rather so foolish & madbraynd, as to couet to know more thā is meete for vs: let vs beare in mind how Moyse telleth vs that our Lords secretes belong to himselfe, & therefore that we must not be inquisitiue of the things which God listeth not to disclose vnto vs, but be contented to be taught here by the meane that he hath ordeyned, and in the meane while let God alone with his secrets without assaying to reach aboute him, and glorifie him, knowing that we be not yet come to the perfection of beholding him face to face, but that it beho-ueth vs first to be transformed into his image, which thing 1. Cor. 13. 6. shall not be fully done, till he haue ridde vs cleane of all 10. d. 12. our fleshy imperfections. So then let vs remember in effect, that when we haue tasted of Gods wisdome, iustice, and goodnesse in all his creatures: wee muste conclude that we come not to the highest degree, but sayle thercof in the middes of our way: & thereby let vs take warning, to honour him and to submitt our selues wholly to him.

Now after that mention hath bene made of the earth, of the deepes, of the waters, of the snow, of the rayne which moyiteneth, and of such other things: by and by here is speaking of the skie and of the starres. Here our Lord setteth downe the thing we haue seene before: which is, that in the order of the skies a man shall perceyue many recordes of his goodnesse and loue towardes vs, and also many signes of his wrath when it pleaseth him to visite vs for our finnes, and to make vs feele that he is our iudge.
And for that cause it is sayd purposely, Come on, warrt thou borne when I created the Planets, and the other starres, and all the signes of beauen? warrt thou there? Or art thou able to bid them go that they may go, or canst thou restreine the plesantnesse of the Pleyades, or canst thou vntie (or vnknipte or loosen) the bandes of Orion? Here are certayne of the celestiall signes named, wherein the Hebrues themselues do not agree: but yet notwithstanding, a man may perceyue that the first woord which is set downe here, betokeneth certayne starres that appeere in the Springtime, and bring a sweete rayne to open the earth and to make it yelde frute. For that cause it is sayde, Canst thou bynde vp or re-streine the pleasantnesse of the Pleyades which cause the earth to become fresh and geene? Canst thou restreine God from sending men the pleasant Springtime to glad them with-all? Afterwarde hee speaketh of Orion, which is a cleane contrarie signe, and bringeth great blustering stormes and waterfluddes. Othersome translate it Arcturus, which is termed a keeper of the things that can be sliet vp or re-streyned, and of the vapours that are haled vp into the ayre. But it is not needefull too stande much vpon that poynt: it is ynough for vs to know that it is a signe which betokeneth great tempests and rage of waters. Therefore it is sayd, Art thou able to vntie his bands? as who would say, wee beare no sway in the skie, in somuch that wee cannot but be rauished out of our wittes to thinke vpon it.

* Pleyades.

Nowe first of all let vs marke in this text, that men are warned of the shortnesse of their life: and that serueth to repreffe them when they would ouershoote themselues to farre. For whom do we thinke our selues to be? much do haue we to be borne, and yet will wee needes blame Gods doings, Yea? and shall wee teach him his lesson, as though hee had no skill to gouerne the worlde? where were we at the time that all things were created? were we of counsell with God to help him, when things were put in so goodly and wonderfull order? There is nothing at all in vs, in somuch that wee could hardly get out of our mothers wombe: and yet notwithstanding wee will take vpon vs to be his iudges. It were a fayre sight that a yong babe which coule scarce speake, should take vpon him to gouerne the whole world, and chalenge all wisdome and discretion to bee in himselfe alone. And what are wee in comparison of God? Although we were come to fourescore or a hundred yeeres of age, what is it in respect of the euerlasting time and wisdome of God, who was before the worlde was created? And againe, what is it in respect of the gouernement that hath continued so longtime. Therefore whensoever wee thinke vpon the shortnesse of our lyfe: let vs be sure that by that meanes God rebateth our pryde, to the intent wee should not be so selfewyze, as to take vpon vs to dispute agaynst him.

And this is the firste and chiefe lesson that wee haue too learne in Gods schoole. Very well, no doubt but wee shall haue whercof to make our boast, when we shall haue profited in that poynt: and therefore so long as wee bee conuerfant in this worlde, lette vs be contented to heare God speake, and to beare in minde whatsoeuer he telleth vs, that wee may profite more and more by it. And moreouer lette vs not go about to aduance our selues a-gaynst him, for if there were no more but this onely saying, that our life is nothing, were it not ynough to holde vs in awe and meeldenesse? Lo what we haue to beare away on the one side. But herewithall we haue also a good comfort to gather: which is, that for somuch as wee see that God hath preferred the world so long a time in good state before wee were borne: wee neede not doubt but he will prouide for the time to come. Therefore when-soever we be vexed and troubled with any great thought of minde, and thereby prouoked to this or that: let vs put our selues into Gods hande, for he knoweth how to gouerne, he is no yong beginner. So then sith wee see that this order hath continued euer since the creation of the worlde, and that (for all the chaunges which haue happened in the meane while) men perceyue that all things haue bene so well dispozed, that the world hath still bene preferred in his right state: I say if wee bethinke vs well thereof, we haue cause to glorifie God, and seing that his iustice, goodnesse, wisdome, and power appeere therein, let vs bee contented therewith, and assure our selues that he will as well continue the same to the ende as he hath begonne it. Lo what we haue to marke. Againe, whereas mention is made of commaunding the celestiall signes: lette vs alwayes marke that it is impossible, that this or-derlineesse which we see, should come eyther of the starres themselues or of any other mouing, than of the hande of God which gouerneth from aboue. And so although the starres haue their seasons to mount aboue vs, & likewise to go downe againe out of our sight: yet notwithstanding lette vs assure our selues, that the same happeneth not at all auenture, but that it is God which commaundeth it, and although he haue giuen them their influences from heauen, yet hath he the guyding and ouerruling of them still. And for prooffe hereof, the Planets moue all yeeres a lyke: and yet it is apparant that there is great oddes in their mouing. What is the cause that the earth is fresh in the springtyme? It is bycause the Pleyades reygne then: howbeit, not that God reygne not ouer them.
For although he haue giuen the celestiall signes their influences: yet do they not any thing of their owne peculiar motion. For what a thing were that? VVe should see the Springtime continue in one euen and measurable rate: that is to say, that there should neuer be nother ouermuch heate nor ouermuch cold, that there should neuer fal one droppe of rayne more in one yeere than in another, nor that there should neuer bee any other alterations. But sith there is such diuersitie, that wee see the yeeres farre vnlike one another: thereby wee perceyue that nother rayne nor snowe ingender of their owne power: but that God, (although hee haue giuen some properties to the starres,) referueth still the ruling of them to himselfe, and declareth that it is he which hath the souerayne government, and disposeth all things as he knoweth to be expedient. So much the more then behoueth it vs too marke these texts, wherin god telleth vs, that although the starres haue their naturall courses and properties : yet notwithstanding they be not driven by their owne power, nother do they giue influence to the world, otherwise than God commaundeth them, so as they obey his soueraygne dominion which he hath ouer all creatures. Therefore let vs not learne too gaze at the starres as though they had power of themselues to do either good or harme : but let vs pray vnto our good God, that when it pleaseth him to make his creatures serue to our vse, he will also graunt vs the grace so to profite thereby, as he onely may be glorified. <sup>10</sup> Moreouer when wee see thunder, lightning, tempests, and stormes : let vs assure our selues that seeing they be at his commaundement and he maketh them to serue at his pleasure : we shall be safe if we be in his protection, which we shall then be, when we haue the [inward] witness that he hath receyued vs to mercie, and takeith vs for his children. Furthermore, whensoever wee thinke vpon Gods workes, let it be with such sobernesse & modestie, as we may learne, not to be inquisitiue of Gods maiestie, but to hold our selues contented to bee taught 20 according to our measure and capacitie. And therewithal when he openeth things to vs by the ordinarie meanes of his woord, let vs open our eyes to consider them as wee ought to do, and yeelde our eares to him to herken what he telleth vs, so as we may not be rechelesse in that behalf. But as for the things that are to highe and profound for vs : let vs let them alone, and wayt for the day of full discouerie, wherevnto our good God calleth vs, which shall be at such time as we be transformed into his glory.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them better than we haue done, and generally also to bewray our wants, to the intent to deface vs vterly & to make vs seeke our whole welfare in him : and therewithal to apply vs so to his seruice, that he may be exalted more and more among vs, so as wee on our side may acknowledge him to be our God, and he on his side acknowledge vs for his people. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauely father wee acknowledge and confesse according to the truth, &c.

And the first vpon the .xxxix. Chapter.

33. Knowest thou the vway of the heauen ? or canst thou set the rule therof vpon the earth ?
34. Canst thou crie out alovvde to the clovdes, that the abundance of vvater may couer thee ?
35. Canst thou send the lightnings ? canst thou make them to vvalke, or vvill they say vnto thee, Lo here vvee bee ?
36. VVho hath put vvifdome into the hart, and giuen it vnderstanding ?
37. VVho is he that by his vvifdome can appoynt the heauen vvhat it should do, or vvho can stay the barrelles of heauen, 38. VVhen the dust cloddeth and the earth hardeneth ?

1. Wilt thou hunt the pray for the Lyon, or giue the Lyons vvhelp vvherevvith to satisfie him,
2. VVhen they be in their dennes or vvhen they lie lurking in their couertes ?
3. VVho prepareth meate for the Rauens, vvhen the yong ones crie vnto God and vvander vvithout meate ?
4. Knowest thou the time vvhen the vvilde Goates do yeane, or knowest thou the caluing time of the Hyndes ?
5. Canst thou tell the time of their goyng vvith calf and vvhen they should calue ?
6. They bovv themselues, and make their yong ones parte from them, and cast out their ovvne forovves.
7. Their yong ones vvex fat and grovve vvith Corne : they go out & retorne not to the againe.

Here the same matter is pursued still, that hath bene treated of these former dayes : which is, that men comprehend not the wiole order of nature, but rather are conuicted of their own vnskilfulnesse, whereby they ought to take warning to humble themselues before God, and to admitte all his doings for good and well done. Therefore it is sayd, that men know not the way of heauen : that is to say, that they wore not what order should be kept there, and yet notwithstanding that for asmuch as they see what God hath done, they ought to be amazed at so great wifdome as is shewed there. If we were put to the building of a heauen, at which side woulde wee begin ? Nay, if it were but the making of the bodie of some one Starre or Planet, could wee bring it to passe ? Nowe, there is a great number of Starres, and therewithal great diuersitie in them, & more-ouer great distinctiō & distance betwixt them : yea & the Planets are placed in such order, as that the Moone is neereest vnto vs, the sunne far aboute that, and other planets yet far aboute the sunne, and againe the starres of the skie hold the highest roome of all. Considering then that there is such varietie in the heauē, which of vs were able to cōpasse it in his vnderstanding, so as he might by parcel-meale set forth all the courses and order of them, in such wise as we see them, and therefore not without cause doth the scripture say, that the starres are (as yee would say) the Esa. 34. 4. 4 hosts or armies of heauē. For God hath there a furniture which ought to astonish vs all. Sith it is so, let vs learne to honour god : & for asmuch as he sheweth so infinite wifdome in the things that we see in the skies : let vs acknowledge that he hath wrought aboute our capacitie, yea euen in such wise as it is great wifdome in vs to talk some parte of the things that are seene with our eyes, that is to say, to know the reason of the & to referre them to a right end.

Now

Now it followeth not by and by, that bicause we haue a thing in estimatiō, therefore we be able to do it our selues. If we looke vpon a singular peece of woorke, wee shall be constreyned to commend him that made it (I meane euē among mortall men:) but yet doth it not therefore follow, that wee can do it as well as he: but contrarywise the same welliking of ours is a record that we vnderstand nothing at all of it in comparifon. And now let vs come vnto God. Is it ynough for vs to cōmend him as a persone that hath made an excellent peece of woorke? No: but we ought to be rauished at his doings. Seing it is so, let vs come backe to this poynt: namely to submit our selues wholly vnto him, and not to at̄cept any thing aboute our abilitie, nor to be hastie in iudging as we haue bene wont to be. It is sayd immediatly, who is he that shall restrayne [or stay] the barrells of heauen? The clowdes are so termed, not only in this text, but also in the Psalme, to make vs vnderstand Gods wonderfull power in holding backe the waters as it were against their nature. For wee know that the water sheadeth and sinketh downeward bicause it is of a heauie nature. And yet for all that, the waters are hanging in the ayre, and stay there neuerthelesse. And whereof commeth that staying, but bicause God holdeth them fast shet vp, as it were in barrells, tonnes, or tubbes? For the Hebrue woord that is set downe in that place, betokeneth properly a Tubbe or a waterpottle. Yee see then that the clowdes are as it were Gods v̄telles, (howbeit not made of wood or of earth:) and without any thing to holde them in Gods onely commaunding of the waters to keepe themselues there, suffyzeth to make them stay there. And herewithall it is shewed vs also, that it stādeth vs greatly in hand that God should so shet vp the heauē, that it might not rayne continually. For what a thing were that: The earth should be alwayes in one Clodde, & men could not sowe. Likewyse on the contrary part, if there should come no Rayne at all, the Earth would be so harde, so as it could yeelde no frute, but would become like yron, so as men could get nothing out of it. Now then it is needefull that God should make it to rayne in conuenient seazon, and that hee should also reserue some time for fayre weather. VVe see it, and wee thinke it a thing woorthie of admiration: and must we not then be ouerfroward, if wee glorifie not God by confessing that it belongeth to him to order all things according to his will, and that it belongeth vnto vs to accept all his doings for good and rightfull, euen with acknowledging the weaknesse of our owne wittes? For whosoeuer presumeth to murmur agayn̄t God, maketh him self wyzer than he, euen in despite of him. If wee yeelde God his deserued prayse by acknowledging our owne ignorance, wee will take good heede that we iudge not of his workes. And so we see wherevnto all the woordes tende that are alledged here. Also it is sayde here expressly, that it is not in vs to sende forth the lightning, or the Planetes, or stormes to haue them in such wize at our commaundement, as they should say, lo, beere wee bee. VVe may well commaund the Sunne and the Moone: but can wee cause the. to make euer the more haste? Can wee eyther hinder or further their course a whit? No. Seing then that wee perceyue that by the one cōmaundement which God gauē at the creating of the world, whē he sayd, I will haue the Sunne to reygne ouer the day, and the Moone ouer the night, and that there shall bee a diuersitie of seazons, as Springtime, Sommer, VVinter, and so forth: I say, Sith we see that by this onely one cōmaundement the heauen maynteyneth his course, and keepeth as perfect order as can be: ought not wee to confesse that it belongeth to God to gouerne all things, and that if wee take not all his doings

in good woorth, there is a diuelish pryde in vs which shal not scape vnpunished? Therefore lette vs wey well this speech, where it is sayde, that wee cannot sende forth the Planets, Thunders, and Lightenings. True it is that Iosua did once stay the course of the Sunne by saying, Sunne, stande thou still in thy place, and go not forewarde. But did he that by his owne power? Nay rather, God shewed in the mouth of a mortall man, howe mightie and effectuall his woord is. Iosuaes woordes were but a sounde that vanished away in the ayre: but for asmuche as hee spake them by the authoritie of God, and attempted not any thing vpon his owne head, the Sunne could not but obey him. Then if the Sunne obeyed a mortall mannes voyce bicause it was the commaundement of God: is it not a much more mightie thing when God hath in his owne Maiestie, in his glory, and in his euerlasting Being, spoken & settled the course of the sunne and the moone and all the order of heauen? Therefore if we marke well these woordes to our owne profite, they wil make vs exalt our God as he is woorthie, and to submitte our selues wholly vnto him, & to holde al our cōceyts and thoughts captiue, to the ende wee take not vpon vs more than is lawfull for vs. And surely it is to no purpose for vs to start out of our boundes agayn̄t him: for it is sayd here, that the Planets and the lightnings will not say here, I am. Ought they to be at our commaundement? VVhen men will needes take more vpon them than is meete for them, when they will needes worke spite agayn̄t him, yea and when they leape so farre out of square as to blaspheme him, can they change any thing in the order of nature? Can they make the Sunne, or the ayre, or any part of the worlde to stande in awe of them? Is there any creature that will moue for them? God therefore doth mocke at our folie and pride in speaking after that maner. On the contrarie parte, wee see that the Sunne and the Moone and the Starres do say vnto him, lo here we be. For without speaking they do whatsoeuer God appoynteth them. They haue nother witte nor vnderstanding: and yet for all that, they be led by a secrete inclinatio to execute Gods will, and whatsoeuer he bade them at the creation of the world. Sith wee see this, ought we not to reuerence the Maiestie which euen the senselesse creatures obey? Ye see then what wee haue to gather vpon this saying. Nowe it foloweth consequently, that it is not in vs to hunt the pray for the Lyons, and to feede the Lyons whelpes their fill: nor to geue the Ravens whercon to feede and to nourish their yong ones when they cry vnto God. VVe know what maner of feeding the Lyons and other wilde beasts craue. It is not a two or three morselles that will satisfie them, but they require much sustenance bycause they bee beasts that deuour and swallowe vp much. Nowe who is hee that can finde them prouision? True it is that a Prince may well keepe some Lyons for his pleasure, or some other wilde beasts: but what Prince is able to finde foode and sustenance to all the Lyons in the world? nowe were there nothing else but this, that all the wilde beasts (as wee see) haue wherewith to susteyne them, and specially of Gods prouision: is it not a sufficient miracle to stirre vs vp to acknowledge the goodnesse of God? But wee shall see Gods meeting in this text yet better if wee haue an eye to our selues. VVhat letteth the Lyons & other wilde beasts to deuour all the men in the world? How happeneth it that yee be not a pray to them? If God should let looce the Lyons, Beares, Elephants, & al other wilde beasts which are many number and of diuers kindes: I pray you should we not be destroyed out of hād? what is the cause then that the Lyons are satisfied (notwithstāding that they haue neede of great nourishment.) and that therewithall the world is preserved and continued in his state, but for that God provideth a remedie for the matter: According also as it is sayd that the light of the Sunne driueth away the wilde beastes, and maketh them to get them to their dennes, that men may haue libertie to go about their businesse. For if God should not shet vp the wilde beastes after that maner, and giue men the earth to traffike and labour vpon, what a thing were it? Should wee haue any one corner to hide our heads in? Yee see then that the thing which is ment in this text, is that if God gaue not the Lions their foode, all men should be quyte and clea-10 ridde of from the earth, and all should go to hauocke and destruction, and that Gods working after that maner compelleth vs to commend his gracious goodnesse, in that he pitieth vs, and holdeth vs vnder his protection so as wee perish not, as we must needes haue done if he had not a fatherly care to preserue vs. True it is that sometimes Lyons may well deuour men, and that happeneth chiefly in the deserte Countries and in the whole landes where there is greater store of wilde beastes. And when it cometh so to passe, God warneth vs thereby, that the same mischief should be vniuersall, if he provided not otherwise for it. For when we see that wilde beastes deuour men after that sorte, therein wee haue fayre lookingglasses. VVhereof is it long that they followe not on forward, and that they raunge not out vnto mens houses, and consume not all? Muste not the setting of that stop in their way needes be of Gods hand? It is not mans pollicie that preuēteth it. So then, let vs magnifie our God for vouchsafing to feede the wilde beastes in such wize, as we liue in 20 the worlde and inioy the benefites that he hath bestowed vpon vs: and furthermore vpon the reading of this text, let vs remember also how it is sayd in the foure and thirtieth Psalme, that although the Lyons be so strong and seeke theyr pray with such violence, yet they suffer hunger: and although it passe mannes power to satisfie them and that they suffer hunger: yet will God alwayes nourish those that are his. And this comparison is well woorthie to be marked. For if God feede the Lyons which are wilde and terrible beastes, yea and irksome to our nature: how shall he not feede men which are created after his owne image, and whom he termeth his children? Specially, ought they to doubt that he will nourish them, whē they call vpon him as their father in true fayth, and when his holy spirite reigneth in their harts? Thinke wee then that God will forsake vs if wee flee vnto him for refuge, seing he feedeth the wilde beastes, and giueth foode to the Rauens, as shall be sayd anon?

So then we see that this serueth vs to double vse. The one is, that wee muste holde of Gods wonderfull goodnesse in that he provideth foode for the Lions and all other beastes, so as we be preserued in the middes of them: and the other is, that if God feede the Lions and wilde beastes: it is much more lykely that he will be carefull to feede vs, bicause we be his children: and that seing he commaundeth vs to come vnto him, and to seeke him, he will deale vs our ordinarie bread, & feede vs bicause we haue not any thing but that which he giueth vs. This in effect is the thing that wee haue to marke vpon this text. Now it is sayd immediatly after of the Rauens, That God feedeth them, both them and their yong ones, when they crie vnto him. True it is that the little birdes haue not vnderstanding to crie vnto God, nother haue they speache to speake with, and much lesse are they led in that cace by true faith: but yet notwithstanding for asmuch as they lacke foode, and haue no means to susteyne theselues in this world: therefore it is sayd that they crie vnto God, according as it is sayd in the Psalme, where the selfe same maner of speach is v-

fed. And this saying ought to bee weyed well, for it is a great confirmation of the things that haue bene sayd: that is to wit, that if God feede the wilde beastes which howle and crie and bray without knowing that there is a maker which should nourish them: what ought they to do which are sure that God who hath set them in the world, referueth to himselfe the office of maynteyning them, & of giuing them whatsoever they haue neede of? Thinke wee that he will fayle them? Againe, lette vs first of all marke what is ment by this woord Crie. The Rauens birdes do crie vnto God. VVhy so? Not for that they crie in fayth or vnderstanding, not for that they pray as men are taught to do: but for that they crie for want of means [to helpe theselues.] Behold then, the Rauens birds are a hungred, their dānestlie abroad to seeke their pray, and sometimes they finde none. In the meane whyle their yong ones are halfe starued, and no bodie provideth for them. Now is God fayne to put to his helping hand, whither it bee by giuing them wormes to iobbe at, or by some other secret meanes. Thus ye see how the yong Rauens do crie vnto God. The like may be sayd of all other beastes: namely that when they be helpless, they resorte vnto God: not that they do it of any vnderstanding, but the cace is such as they may well wander in the world & be still destitute of al succour, so as there is no shift but that God much reach out his hande, and of his goodnesse giue them the thing they haue neede of. But now let vs returne to the foresayd cōparison betweene our selues and the brute beastes. For seing it is sayd that God sheweth himselfe [bountifull] when the beastes are destitute of naturall meanes to helpe 30 themselves, and that it is all one as if they repayed vnto him: what ought we to do? for although we haue abundance euen till we be readie to perbrake our goods vp againe: yet muste we alwayes vnderstand that the things which wee haue are giuen vs of Gods owne hand: and if we happen to suffer penurie and want, we be so much the more prouoked to repaire vnto him. Therefore men must not shrinke backe, nor chafe vpon the bridle when they find themselves destitute of help. VVhat must they do then? Let them thinke thus with themselves: behold God calleth vs to him. And in good soth he declareth and protesteth that his mind is (after a sort) to prouoke the beastes to repayre vnto him, and therein also to shew himselfe to be the [souerayne] gouerner: for otherwise he should leaue nothing in the world, but all should lie wast: howe much more then ought I to repayre vnto him? Now then let vs marke well, that whensoever we want provision, so as we wote not where to become or which way to turne vs: it is asmuch as if God tolde vs that it is his charge to giue vs 40 whatsoever is meete for vs, & that by the same means he will haue our whole trust settled in him. And when wee haue such beleef and inward feeling: prayer & supplication must be matched with it out of hād. For whosoever braggeth that he wayteth for his sustenance and foode at Gods hand, and yet in the meane while vouchsafeth not to call vpon him for it, doth he not shew that there is nothing els but hypocrisie & leasing in him. Therefore faith must stirre vs vp & driue vs to call vpon God, to the end we may confesse him to be our fosterfather, and receyue our 50 foode as it were at his hand, and vpon the receyte thereof acknowledge our selues to be nourished by his mere goodnesse. Thus yee see after what maner we ought to put this text in vre. Furthermore it behoueth vs to come yet to a hygher comparison: which is, that sith we vnderstand that God feedeth our bodies after that sorte, it is much more reason that wee should also seeke the nourishment of our soules at his hande. Although wee had meate and drinke in this worlde, and wee needed no more but too

bow down our heads to be filled with it: yet is the foode of our soules to precious a thing to bee found here by-lowe. Neuerthelesse, euen the corruptible foode is giuen vs by Gods hand, and he sheweth expressly that it is hee onely to whom it belongeth to feede our bodies in this present transitorie life. So then it behoueth men to repayre vnto him, chiefly when they will be fed spiritually. And if we haue not this consideration & skill with vs: the yong Rauens, the fowles of the ayre, and all the beasts of the world must be witnesses and iudges to condemne vs: for God sheweth vs as it were to eyesight, that he calleth the to him when they be succorlesse. And if he call the brute beasts to him, so as hee do his office in their behalfe: ought not wee to haue a right minde and true beleefe towards him, so as wee may be thoroughly perswaded that wee shall not bee disappoynted in demanding of him whatsoeuer wee haue neede of? This is in effect all that we haue to remember in this text. Now it is sayd afterwarde, knowest thou the time when the wyld Goates or the females of them doo kiddle? knowest thou the tyme of the Hyndes, or how they bowe themselves at their Caluingtyme? Truly the example of all mankinde which wee haue in our selues, ought to be ynough to reprove mennes follie in being so selfwize as to take vpon them to reason with God. For if a man shoulde aske them, howe wart thou created or begotten? How wart thou caried and nurrished by the space of nine monethes after thou wart begotten and haddest taken shap: in thy mothers womb? How camest thou out agayne in the ende? Couldst thou answer directly to all these things? They would stande abashed.

So then, man (without stepping a whit from himselfe) shall finde it more than sufficiently proued, that God worketh wonderously in his begetting. VVhat a thing is it, that a little creature should bee ingendred, yea euen of corruption and filthe, and yet notwithstanding receyue such shape as wee see fashioned in our bodies? Agayne, what a thing is it that the childe should bee nurrished in vncleanness and infection in his mothers wombe euen among all the excrements: and yet notwithstanding receyue sustenance and growe so big as to finde meanes to come into the world? what maner of things are all these? Are they not such excellent miracles of God as we ought to bee rauished at them? And therefore (as I haue sayde already) we needed not to be sent to the wilde beastes, nor to the Hyndes, nor to the Sheegoates, it had bene ynough if euery of vs had considered after what maner he was borne and nurrished in his mothers wombe, and how he came out from his mother into the worlde. Neuerthelesse it is not without cause that God sendeth vs too the wilde beasts. And why? For women haue yet some helpe when they come to their deliuerance: they haue other women to do them seruice, and one of them can succour another. Agayne they be taught by custome and experience, and they keepe themselves from daungers: they consider what is expedient for them, and prepare & furnish themselves aforehand. Ye see then that the same ought to be esteemed a greter miracle in the brute beasts than in women. For when the poore beasts are great with yong, they know not what they beare, onely they feele a cumber some burthen, they may be greued, they may rush their bellies agaynst something to make their yong ones slinke, and the struggling of their yong ones within them may after a maner cast them in despayre. Howbeit God preferueth them in such wize as they keepe their frute: and although the same be heauie and troublesome to the,

their owne fatnesse: in somuch that if they growe too fatte, they fall to fasting, and it is a proper tie of theirs that they cannot beare with any thing that hindereth them: and yet notwithstanding they carie their yong Calues still, yea euen with great payne: and specially it is reported of them, that they haue exceeding great payne and greefe in caluing: according also as mention is made thereof in this text, where it is sayd that they bowe themselves as though they shoulde clieue astunder, and strayne themselves exceeding sore. True it is that women also are fayne to streyne themselves: but the streyning of the Hyndes is greater: in somuch that they which haue had skill of the secretes of nature, say they are fayne to vse a medicine, which is the taking of a certayne hearb to help themselves withall, and that otherwise they should stand at a stay, if they tooke not somewhat to haste their deliuerie. VVee see then here how it is not for nought, that God sendeth menne to the Hyndes and Sheegoates (for the kinde is not altogether certayne, but that is no matter of importance.) And why? For it is a straunge case that the beasts which know not what they beare, should notwithstanding haue the wit to beare out the burthen and to fence themselves against it, as though God had taught them, or that it were sayd vnto them, it behoueth you to preferue your owne kinde and offspring. Seing then that the beasts haue such an inclination, is it not God that worketh it from aboue? For what would become of them if he gouerned them not? Againe, when the beasts come to bee deliuered, their brutishnesse is suche, as it is no telling of them that they muste keepe themselves quiet, and that they muste haue yong ones, and that they shall bee gladd of it, as it is sayde vnto women that they shall haue wherof to reioyce when they see a manchilde borne into the worlde. None of these things can bee sayde to the beastes, for they knowe not what shall passe out of their bodies, nother can they tell whither the thing which they carie shall burst their bellies and make their bowells fall out. And yet notwithstanding they keepe it still, & afterward when they come to the bringing forth their yong, they know how to remedy their needes, without any succour. They make their yong ones cleane, and for all the payne that they haue had, yet do they go abroade after them, so that they miscarie not through their default. Seing then that wee perceyue all this: haue wee not cause to magnifie our God? And specially when wee consider the diuersitie of beastes, and yet see that they multiply after that maner; I pray you is it not proued to our faces, that God stretcheth out his arme and worketh by way of miracle? Neede we to go to schoole to vnderstand it? Neede we to be of high capacite, or to haue the matter debated with great and profound reasons? There is not so slenderwitted and ignorant a person, but he knoweth as well the begetting of menne, as the ingendering of cattell and beasts to be a miracle of God, and that Gods hand must needes be perceyued there, according also as it beareth the whole sway. And in knowing this, ought we not also to wonder at the goodnesse of our God, which extendeth it selfe euen to the brute beasts? VVhen wee see him pitifull in that behalfe: ought wee not to glorifie him for the same? Ought wee not at least wyze too yeeld him the sacrifice of prayse, when wee see his power and wisdom? Lo howe the ignorant are conuicted of vnthankfulnessse, if they set not their minde to the considering of Gods wisdom, power, iustice, and goodnesse, which shewe and viter themselves euery where, yea euen toward the brute beasts. Now although mention be made here precisely of the Hynds and of the shee rokkegoates or other wilde Goates: yet haue wee a generall lesion to gather of all beasts: namely that God muste needes stretch out his hand in guyding the sayde order when he intendeth to multiply liuing creatures, and that by his guyding thereof they haue offspring and increace, and that without the same guyding, all things would come to horrible confuzion. And specially sith we know the sayd secretes, how there are peculiar difficulties in Hyndes ouer that there are in other beasts, as I sayd afore, and that therefore God giueth them the skill too seeke out the sayd hearbe: Let vs profite our selues by that knowledge. And who hath bene the Phisitiō of the Hyndes? In what schoole haue they learned the skill to seeke out an hearb, and to know that it is expedient for their deliuerie, & for the voyding of their yōg ones out of their bodies? VVho hath shewed it them? VVho hath bene their teacher? Ought not God to be knowne and glorified in this cace? So then we ought to marke well these particular kindes that are set downe here before our eyes, wherein Gods glory sheweth it selfe liuely. But yet must we also gather this foresayd generall lesson, that God worketh throughout, as shall be sayd hereafter of the Egges which fowles dolay, and whereout of their yong birdes do come: for euen there also must Gods prouidēce be acknowledged. Howbeit when we haue so applyed our whole indeuer to consider Gods doings in the wilde beasts, it behoueth vs also to come backe to our selues. For the cheefe poynt is that me should know Gods goodnesse, power, wisdom, and iustice according as they be shewed vnto them, and as they perceyue them and are partakers of them. Therefore whereas it is sayde here, that the caluingtyme of the Hyndes is not knowne vnto men: that is to say, that it is not in men to appoynt it: let vs vnderstand that we must not trie maystries with God, in going aboute to wrestle our selues out of his subiection. And why? For before we were borne, God hath shewed that our life is not in our owne hand, but at his order and disposition. It is wel ynough knowne how long time Hyndes do go with calfe, and men may iudge it by certayne coniecture. Not that men do looke so narrowly to it: but if men marke from the time that the males and females go to rutte, he shall finde that they go full eight moneths. Very well, their caluingtyme then may wel be knowne. But here it is sayd, knowest thou the Caluingtyme of the Hyndes? Yea: for that is not to the purpose that God speaketh: but yet hath he so ordered it. It is not for vs to know how long the Hynds should go with calfe: that is to say, it is not we that haue appoynted them eyther their monethes or their dayes. VVe be skilfull foike. Nowe then, seing that God will haue the Hyndes to go with calfe full such a time, & that when the terme is expired, he deliuereth them, giuing the helpes and guyding the matter as he himselve hath ordeyned: It behoueth vs to conclude therevpon, that he hath reserued the Lordship of all beasts to himselve, and that in asmuch as he fedde them in their dammes bellies, he holdeth them in subiection after they be come foorth, so as he guydeth the at his owne pleasure. And when we haue so thought vpon the beasts, lette vs come to our selues. I would faynestart out to play the suttleheaded fellow in replying against God, saying: why doth God deale thus or thus with mee? VVhy doth he not sende mee mine owne desires? But when we enter into such n.urmurings to lift vp our selues after that fashio against God: let vs come backe to our birth and say, Alas howe camest thou out of thy mothers wombe? who tooke thee out of it? True it is that there were helpes: but yet must we come to that which is sayde in the two and twentieth Psalme, that it was Gods hād which tooke vs out of our mothers wombe. All the women in the worlde may beate their

braynes about it, but they can do nothing in that cace, except God worke with them, euen by a wonderful power. Therefore if we do no more but thinke vpon our birth, we must needes stoupe to say, Lorde, before I came into the world thou diddest well shewe that I was in thy guiding. For in what cace was I when thou tookest mee out of my mothers womb, yea and of all the whyle that thou diddest maynteyne mee there? VVere it not a passing straunge thing, if the shetting vp of children there, were not an ordinarie matter among vs? VVe liue by the ayre: and whensoever we cannot take breth, by and by we be choked out of hand: the life of man consisteth in his breath: do but stop our breath, and we be dispatched immediatly. True it is that the little babes haue some vent to take breath at in their mothers wombe: but whereby? euen by the nauill. And in the meane while, wherewith is the childe susteyned? with all maner of corruption: he lieth there among all maner of excrements, and all kinde of wretchednesse: in somuch that if it be considered how he is borne there by the space of eyght moneths, and howe he is maynteyned: a man may see Gods mightie hande, yea and that so passingly, as wee must needes be amazed to thinke vpon it, and acknowledge that it is God which gouerneth all things and which hath the ordering of vs all. And if wee bee not moued with such and so mightie workes of God, and stand astonished at them: I pray you must wee not needes be worse than hardhearted? And if wee will not be touched by our owne record, the brute beasts must condemne vs, and beare witness agaynst vs at the last day. So then let vs learne to profit our selues by this doctrine, specially to confesse that God is wonderful in all his woorkes, and that the order of nature is such a tootingglasse, as wee must needes be rauished to wonder at the knowledge of the things that are seene there. Howbeit let vs alwayes knit it vp with the bridling of our selues, knowing for a certentie that wee be not of power, wit, and capacitie to iudge of Gods doings, and therefore that wee must not fall to controlling of him, to aske why this or that is done. No: but let vs vnderstand, that when soeuer we go about to find fault in his doings, we shall be confounded, yea and bee driuen to perceyue our owne ignorance and weakenesse, euen to our vndoing if wee presume to auance our selues beyond our bounds. Then sith it is so, let vs learne to be contented with that which it pleaseth God to reueale vnto vs, and let vs restreyn our selues from this diuelish ouerweening which we see to be in some men: specially when the cace concerneth matters that passe our capacitie: like as when it is sayde that God doth so dispoze all things, as it is not for vs to finde fault in any of his doings, notwithstanding that all bee guyded and performed by his prouidence. Herevpo some do reply: as for mee, I cannot beleue it: for I vnderstand it not: and therefore I conclude that it is naught. How now thou vnhappy wight? wilt thou shet vp God in so small a roome as thy foolish brayne is? It is all one as if thou shouldst say, I beleue not that there is a God, except I may see him before mine eyes and as it were betweene my legges. And what a dealing were that? But we must not do so. VVe must not presume to draw downe Gods maiestie vnto vs: but it behoueth vs to mount vp alofte and to send vp our wittes thither, to honour the incomprehensible greatnesse that is in him. Yea and wee must mount vp thither with humilitie, without presuming any thing of our selues, but rather acknowledging that we do nothing but creepe here bylow. Thus yee see how it behoueth vs to put this doctrine in vre, according also as it is set before vs to the same end.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to open our eyes, that wee may learne to perceyue howe wee ought to be so beaten down in our wants and wretchednesse, as wee may be cleerely bereft of all pride, so as wee attempt not to vaunt our selues, nor too chalenge any thing at all vnto vs, but that we acknowledging that there is no goodnesse in vs, and that we be altogether vnprofitable, may resort to our good God to receyue power and strength at his hande to follow his will, to the end that in walking according to the same, wee may be brought to yeeld him prayse and thanksgiuing. And for the doing thereof, it may please him to tame the pride that is in vs, and which hindereth vs to prayse him as he deserueth, to the end that being all of vs made cleane, we may returne vnto him with one comō accord, framing our selues peaceably vnto his woord. That it may please him to &c.

The. clij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxxix. Chapter.

8. VWho hath set the vvild Assē at libertie, or vvho hath loozed the bondes of the vvild Assē?
9. It is I vvhich haue set his house in the vvildernesse, and his dvvelling in the salt places.
10. He laugheth the multitude of the Citie to skorne, he heareth not the crie of the Extercioner.
11. He seeketh out the mountaynes for his pasture, and searcheth after euery greene thing?
12. VVill the Vnicorne serue thee? or vvill he tarie at thy crib?
13. Canst thou tie the sayd Vnicorne vvith his line, (to labour) in the furrowes? or vvill he breake the cloddes of earth in the vallies after thee?
14. VVilt thou trust him bicause his strength is great, and yeeld vp thy labour vnto him?
15. VVilt thou belecue that he vvill bring home thy corne, and gather it together into thy barne?
16. Hast thou giuen the Peacocks their goodly vvings, or feathers to the Stork and the Estrich, 17. VVhich leaueth hir egges on the earth, and maketh them vvhot in the dust?
18. And forgetteth that the foote may treade vpon them, or that the beast of the felde may breake them?
19. Shee shevveth hir selfe cruell tovwards hir yong ones, as though they vvere not hers, or as though hir labouring vvere in vayne, vvithout any feare.
20. For God hath depriued hir of vvifedome, and not giuen hir vnderstanding.
21. VVhen time is, shee mounteth on high, and skorneth the horse and his rider.

If we had no more but some one onely kinde of thing to looke vpon in the whole world: yet ought the same to suffyze to make vs to giue glorie vnto God. For there is not any thing wherein he sheweth not himselfe such a one towards vs, as wee be compelled to honour him. But God perceyuing men to be still to negligent and slowe in knowing him, purposed too stirre them vp with such varietie, as they should no more excuze themselues of their not knowing him, after they had seene the infinite number of things that offer theselues to our sight both aboue and beneath. I say that if a man did but only thinke vpon himselfe without pasying any further, he should well haue wherfore to magnifie God: or else if hee looked but vpon any one kinde of creature, wee may say the like. But if wee make our circuites and discourses, & after we haue seene Gods glory in one part of the world, wee turne our eyesight to another, and make as it were a numbering or perusing of his creatures: it is certayne that wee must needes be then moued, to confesse that there is such a perfection in his workes, as we be not able to magnifie him sufficiently. Lo why God doth here set vs downe many fundrie sortes of them. Not that here is a perfect storie and full reckening vp of the properties of liuing things: but yet notwithstanding, in the examples that are set downe here, we haue so much as ought to suffyze vs: like as now when mention is made of wilde and vntamed Asses, God sayeth it is not for vs to giue them libertie. It is all one as if he sayd, that when we behold the vvild Asses, we must thinke that if all the whole world were gathered together, they could not giue the vvild Asses such a nature as they haue. Therefore lette vs confesse that God hath disposed all things aboue our abilitie and power, and that our finding of fault with them commeth of to foolish rashnesse: and that there is no more for vs too do but to lift vp our eyes to honour him which sheweth vs so infinite a power & mightinesse. After mention made of vvilde Asses, hee speaketh of Vnicornes, or some other such kinde of beast: howbeit men commonly agree that it is the Vnicorne which is spoken of here. It is sayd, that the Vnicornes will not be in subiection to vs, and that wee cannot occupie them as wee do Oxen and Horses & Asses: nor by any meanes tame them, that they might till the ground, or drawe home our corne into the barne, or vnto the threshingfloore. Sith it is so, let vs vnderstand that it is not for vs to ouerrule Gods workes: wee may well streyne our selues to it, but we shall neuer bring it to passe. For if wee cannot tame a vvild Assē or some other woodbeast: how shall we rule the whole worlde? And if we cannot do that: how dare wee lift vp our neb against our maker, who hath ordered all things with such wisdom, as no fault can be found with him? Finally he speaketh of Peacocks and Estridges or els (as some haue vnderstood it) of Storkes. Howbeit although the Storkes are spoken of in the second place: yet notwithstanding, the things that are added in the ende, cannot agree but to the Estridges, that is to wit, that they despise the horse and the horseman by reason of their swiftnesse: and agayne that they forget their egges, and are so foolish that they lay them in the Sande and thinke no more of them. There is then a great fondnesse in that foule, which agreeth to the Estridges rather than to the Storkes. So then the effect is, that if one mirroure of Gods glory be not able to cōtent men: at leastwise the great varietie that sheweth it selfe euerywhere ought to stirre vs vp and moue vs to seeke God, and to submit our selues to him when wee haue founde him, yea euen with such obediēce, that although we perceyue not the reason of his workes: yet we may not ceasse to hold our selues as prisoners, so as we grudge not against him in any wyze. Now let vs come to euery part. VVhere the wilde Asses are spoken of: it is sayde that God vntieth them and setteth them at libertie, and that they go to seeke feeding in the mountaynes, and that they dwell in wilderneses and salt places: and that therewithall they sken such as are in Cities and are subiect to tallages, imposts, and such other charges. The wilde Asses knowe not what any of these things meane: for they haue a free state. Now when God speaketh after that maner, it is to rebuke men for setting by themselves, and for forgetting their owne state. For most men are vnderlings, and yet we see how they brag themselves, so as it seemeth to them that the earth is not woorthie to beare them. And whereof cometh such ouerweening? For if they compare themselves with the wilde Asses, they shall find that the Asses haue a more desirable thing than they haue, that is to wit, libertie or freedom. Euery man cōfesseth freedom to be the chief benefite that we can enioy. But so it is, that we be in bondage, and the wilde Asses are free. And yet notwithstanding we fall to boasting, and beare our selues in hand that there is such an excellent woorthinesse in vs, as we ought to be caried aboute the clowdes, and God ought to reach out his hand to set vs vpon his shoulders. Thus see wee the folie of men in that behalfe. And therefore lette vs marke well that God ment here to humble vs, and to correct the pryde that is in vs, because we cannot refrayne frō esteeming our selues beyond measure. And why is that? Because wee thinke not vpon him, nor vpon his workes. Howbeit we neede not mount so high as vnto his maiestie to humble vs: the very beasts can teach vs and be our schoolemaysters: for we be not woorthie to haue other teachers than them. Neuerthelesse it might be demaunded whither the wilde Asses are to be preferred before mē for that they roame abroade euerywhere, and are not hidde in awe or subiection, nor can be tamed by man. The answer is, that if men had continued in their vncorruptnesse, they should haue bene subiect to reason, not as in the way of bondage, but euery man should haue had such rule of himself, as God should haue reigned euerywhere: there should haue needed no lawes, no iusticers, nor no swoorde to haue executed menne for doing euill: there should haue needed none of all those things. For euery man should haue bene as a lawe and rule to himselfe: he should haue had Gods lawe printed in his hart. And such a willing subiection should haue bene more noble and excellent, than all the dominions in the world. But forasmuch as wee be corrupted, it behoueth vs to be hidde in thraldome: for therein God sheweth vs that wee be not able to rule our selues, sith he will haue vs to be brought vnder awe of others. And not onely by lawes and ciuill order are men hild vnder the yoke: but also God suffereth hard and comber some charges to be layd vpo them, according as we see diuerse times that when tyrants beare sway in the world, they be so farre of from being fathers to their subiects: that they vexen them, pill them, poll them, and bite them asmuch as they can. In this behalfe then our state serueth as it were too shame vs: and God teacheth & telleth vs that the beasts in some respect haue a better time than we. Yet notwithstanding it is not to be sayd, that God hath in all respects so vtterly reiected mē, that the beasts are in better case than they. For wee see that when he compareth his people of Israell to a wilde Ass by his Prophete Osee: it is to shewe that there was nother reason nor manhood in them. Thou wilt be alone by thy selfe (sayeth he:) that is to say, I cannot tame thee. For our Lord intendeth to hold vs in his flocke, and when we haue his woord, his meaning is to play the teacher among vs. Now if we cannot abide to be gouerned by his hand: it is against kinde, and we shew our selues to haue an vncommendable nature. Moreouer it is certayne that in this subiection which God hath layd vpon men, we see still some print of his goodnesse, so as it is much more for mennes behoof to be subiect, (yea though they be handled amisse and rigorously) than for the wilde Asses to be so vntamed, and to stray abrode in the mountaynes. For in the meane while men are warned of their finnes when God chastizeth them roughly and with mayne blowes: and his so doing is to draw them backe to repentance. And againe, whatsoeuer come of it, he sheweth them that there is a difference betweene good and euill: whereas the Asses are let alone still in their brutishnesse. Then let vs learne, that whatsoeuer subiection God hath layd vpo men, yet hath he not ceased to vse continuall goodnesse and fauour towards them. Howbeit, the warning that is giuen in this text, tendeth to this poynt, that if men will needes be proude and make too great account of their owne worthinesse and nobilitie: they deserue well to be sent to the wilde Asses, and that God should mocke the, saying: Go to, what are you ye wretched sooles? For it seemeth to you that I ought not to reygne any more ouer you, but that you ought to be fellowlike with me. But yet for all that, you shall be subiect to many charges, ye shall not be able to liue together without many troubles, complainentes, and outcries, and euery man shall stand in doubt of other: according as wee see that men cannot liue one with another, but there shall be mistrust and hartburning, and one shall do another wrong by guyle, still practizing one thing or other, and indeuening to overcome their enimies by treacherie and maliciounesse, so as they be full of poyson, and grinde their teeth when they see they cannot redresse their owne harmes. Lo what the state of men is: and in the meane while the wilde Asses sport themselves in the mountaynes, seeking for pasture and scorning all the policies wherewith men tyre themselves so much. Then seing it is so, let vs learne to set lesse by our selues: for the wilde Asses that wander in the mountaynes must teach you your lesson, and make you to perceyue that ye are not such as you weene your selues, that you should make such vaunting. Now we see after what maner it behoueth vs to apply this text to our instructiō. On the one side let vs vnderstand, that God intendeth to humble vs by the example of the beasts, too the ende to subdue all pryde in vs: and on the other side lette vs consider, that although our state bee in some respect woorse than the state of the brute beasts: yet notwithstanding God neuer ceaseth to holde on with his gracious goodnesse towards vs, & to turne the euill into good. In somuch that whereas wee haue not a free and vnbridled life in this worlde, by that meanes wee be taught to come so vnto him, as the subiection of men becometh better than the libertie of the beasts, and our being in bondage is more for our behoofe, than it is for the beasts to stray abroade without mayster or restreynt, or without knowing of any lawe or aught else. Thus ye see how on the one side we haue to consider of Gods grace: and on the other side, to stoupe, that wee exalt not our selues in our own worthinesse: but vnderstand that our Lord subdueth vs to himselfe. Now after that mention hath bene made in that sort of the wilde Asses: by and by there is speaking of the Vnicornes, which is a matter like vnto the other. God sayeth that the Vnicorne cannot be tamed: that we cannot vse him to our commoditie: that although he be strong and light, yet will he not till the earth at our pleasure, nor drawe the plough, nother will he drawe the carte to bring home corne into the barre: to bee short, hee is not to serue mans turne, but altogether for himselfe. Here wee haue to note, first of all, that whereas the beasts do vs seruiue, it is because God tameth them, and putteth them in-

to our

to our hands, to the end we should inioy them. And for prooffe thereof, why doth a horse suffer himfelfe to be ruled by a man, and draw the plough or the harrowes, and carie a rider or other burthen on his backe? How happeneth it that men do breake Mules, Affes, and Oxen? For a horse is ftrong ynough to withftand a man, and wee fee he is a ftoute and coragious beaft. Howe then doth man get the mayftrie of him? And furely if a man were not acquainted with the taming of Oxen, their hornes were a terrible thing to looke vpon: the very shaking, of their head were ynough to abafte a man: their great eyes and thicke neckes [would agaft him]: and if they fhould bend their hornes at him, they were ynough to runne him through if he came nere the. Againe we fee what huge bodies they haue. And how could men haue any vfe of them, if it pleased not God to giue vs the mayftrie of them? For as well might the Vnicornes be tamed as horses and oxen, if God had not giuen them that [diuerfe] nature. So then let vs behold Gods goodneffe in applying thofe beafts to our feruice, which otherwise were able to amafe vs with their only looke, fo as we durft not come nere them. A little childe will rule oxen, in fomuch that when they be accuftomed to the yoke, he fhall keepe the there with a little fticke, he fhall make them bow downe their thicke neckes, and ftoupe with their brode hornes, and (to be fhort) he fhall weelde them in fuch forte, that whereas they were able to beare downe all things afore them, there fhall be no refiftance at all. Sith wee fee this, let vs acknowledge that God hath fhewed himfelfe bountifull towards vs, feing hee hath after that maner made fuch beafts fubieft to vs, as were able to haue made vs a frayde (as I fayd afore) and will neuertheffe haue them apply themfelues to our feruice, fo as menne may tame them. Behold, the Eliphant is tamed, which is a pafing terrible beaft: for the very looke of him ouercommeth all other beafts. Truly he is as a muuntayne, and feemeth to ferue of purpofe to deftroy vs: and yet notwithstanding, when he is fubdued, he becōmeth after a fort tame: not that he keepeth not ftill fome incling of his owne kind: but yet is it a wonder to vs that mē can after fomme maner ouermayfter him, and make him too ferue their turne. On the contrary part, the Vnicorne being but a fmall beaft, and hauing no more but a certaine nimble- nefe in him, keepeth alwayes his fturdineffe, in fomuch that all the men in the world cannot by their cunning and ftrengh bring him to fubieftion. Sith wee fee this, let vs be conuicted at leaftwife by fuch comparifon. And when we haue learned to acknowledge Gods goodneffe in that he applieth the beafts to our vfe and profite, which do vs feruice: lette vs marke alfo on the other fide, that it were not in vs to rule a Snayle, (as ye would fay) if our Lord did not giue vs power ouer him. True it is that at the

Gen. I. d. 28.
2. c. 19.

Creation of the worlde all beafts were giuen vnto Adam to haue Lordfhip and dominion ouer them. But we haue loft the poffefion thereof in that we be gone away from God, like as when a fubieft committeth any lewdneffe or treason agaynft his Prince, his goods are forfeited and he himfelfe is quite out of fauour. Euen fo is it with all mē. For we fhould haue reigned peaceably ouer all beafts, if we had not bene vnthankfull to our God, in breaking the allegiance which wee ought vnto him. That then is the caufe why we be bereft of the Lordfhip and foverayntie which was giuen vs ouer all beafts. Nowe feing that the beafts fhould rife vp agaynft vs, and wee could not inioy them, but that God refertueth the vfe of them vnto vs, yea and fubdueth fome of them too vs according as wee haue neede of them: thereby we be warned, that it is an exceeding great madneffe for vs to lift vp our felues againft our maker, and that the beafts can wel ouermayfter vs if neede require, & God needeth not to arme the Lions or Vnicornes, but can giue vs battell by lyce and fleas if he thinke good, and fo make a fcorne of all our pryde. Therefore feing that fometimes we cannot by any meane rule the beafts: lette vs remember from whence the fame commeth: that is to wit, from Adams finne and our owne naughtineffe, in that wee be ftubborne agaynft him that had made vs Princes of the worlde, and put all creatures into our lande. Let vs confider this and be forie for our finnes: and as oft as the wilde beafts do vs any harme, let vs bethinke vs thus: Behold, God fheweth vs our owne wants: and therevpon lette vs pray him to graunt vs the grace to obey him in fuch wife, as we may beare his mark, that the beafts may know the power which he hath giuen vs as his children: and yet for all that, lette vs affure our felues that he intendeth to holde vs alwayes in awe. Lo what we haue to marke in the fecond place. But now a mā might afke a queftion, why God keepeth ftill fuch kinde of beafts, feing they do men no feruice. For it fhould feeme that the caufe ceaffeth why God fhould nurriffh them any longer: but let vs marke, that they ceaffe not to be as beuifyinges of this world, to the end that men might behold the maieltie of God in them. And that is one reafon fufficient ynough of it felfe. Againe (as I haue fayde already) they ferue for our learning: God fheweth vs diuerfe fights in them, to teach vs by that varietie to vnderftand his power, goodneffe, and iuftice the better. On the other fide, they are a good inftruction to vs, bicaufe that fith we canot haue the vfe of them, we muft not prefume to exalt our felues to high. For euen the very horses and oxen would rufhe agaynft vs and ouerrun vs: in fomuch as although God haue put them vnder vs, and will haue them to ferue vs: yet notwithstanding now and then one ftroke of a horses foote is ynough to flea a man. Sith wee fee this, haue wee not alwayes a good leffon to shrinke in our heads, and to giue ouer the making of too great braueries? Yee fee then what wee haue to beare away here. Furthermore whereas mention is made of the breaking of the cloddes, and of tilling of the ground, and of carying the corne into the barn: it is to the ende that men fhould be the better warned, that they had neede to be prouided of many helps at Gods hand. We could not continue in the world, if we had not meate and drinke: we could not liue two dayes, if we were not nurriffed. And who is he that giueth vs bread? Are men fo able of themfelues as they can till the earth alone? No: they may well imploy all the ftrengh of their armes, and they may well digge and delue: but alas, all that is not ynough to make the corne growe for their fufenance. And who fhall clothe them while they be tilling of the earth? where fhall they get coates, hozens and fhooes? who fhall furnifh them with all their neceffaries? for wee fee we be fubieft to fo many things, that onely meate and drinke will not ferue our turne. What a number of helpes haue wee neede of to mainteyne vs in this wretched life? confidering then that God had neede too giue vs fuche an innumerable forte of helpes: let vs therefore thinke vpon the great number of benefites which he hath beftowed vpon vs: as in that he hath ordeyned horses and oxen to till the ground for vs, and to bring home the corne into our Barnes, and furthermore giuen vs fuch skilfulneffe, that when wee haue done amiffe, by and by we haue a remedie at hand. Seing that God hath made vs to beholde his goodneffe after that maner before our eyes, let vs alfo confider how deepe- ly we be bound and indetted vnto him to ferue him with all lowlineffe. For behold, the chief poynt that is fhewed vs in this booke, is that menne fhall neuer yeeld God his

due honour, except they stoupe vnto him, without presuming to grudge against him, or without taking vpon them to teach him his lesson. And vndoubtedly it is not our schoole, that he ought to come vnto. He hath suche wisdom in himselfe, that (as hath bene shewed heretofore, and as shall be shewed further hereafter) we be constrained, (I say wee be constrained) to be abashed at the sight of Gods doings. And as wee be abashed in that behalfe, so also behoueth it vs to learne to glorifie him: for that is all that we can do. Now let vs come to that which is sayd of the Peacockes and Estridges. VVbo u he (sayeth God) that hath giuen so goodly wings to the Peacockes? God sheweth vs in one woord, that one only feather is ynough to proue vs starke fooles, in that we cannot be contented with his doings. Let vs looke vpon a Peacockes feather: is there not so wonderfull a workmanship in the same, as we wote not what to say to it, but only to glorifie God? I say that euen the vnbelieuers are compelled therevnto. Seing it is so: I pray you are our wittes able to reache so high as to the skanning how God governeth the world, and to the things that are much higher without comparison? Must they not needes come short? If one feather of a Peacocke rauish vs, and hold vs as it were in a gaze at it: what shall all the workmanship which appeareth in the whole worlde do? what shall the speciall governing of mankind do? And yet notwithstanding, that is the thing wherewith men do vtter their blasphemies: that is the thing for which they chafe and storme against God, beyng desirous that he should governe by their aduice and after their fancie. And that is because they haue not their own liking, nor are dealt with at Gods hand as they themselves would wish. Yet must we needes be proued to haue fayled of our duetie, if we can consider what he telleth vs. Thus yee see Gods meening in this texte. Afterward he maketh a comparison with the Singes of the Estridges: but that is rather to stay vpon that which is added concerning the forwardnesse, lightnesse, and strength that is in them. Also he speaketh of Storkes: and that may be the rather to bring vs to the reasonableness that is in them: for there is more kindnesse to be found in them, than there is of-40 rentimes in men. For when the yong Storkes are grown great, they reknowlege their dammes, and feede them in their old age: & requite that which they did to them in their youth. Surely if this were well considered, there needed none other doctrine to condemne the vnthankfulness of children that are stubborne to their fathers and mothers, and could finde in their hearts that they were in the bottome of the Sea, and therefore would be very loth to spend themselves in their behalf, or to spare the meate from their own mouths to giue it vnto them. So then yee see a sayre mirrour which we haue in this birde. But are not we more than guiltie, seing we acknowledge not our souerayne father that created vs all, which nurrisheth vs, in whose hand we be, and which wexeth not old that he might haue neede of vs? he giueth vs innumerable good things: and we consider not so much as to yeelde him his due prayse: now seing we be so lewde and froward, neede there any other witnesses than the Storkes to condemne vs? howbeit for asmuch as God stayeth here longer vpon the Estriche: lette vs come to that which is spoken of it.
 60 Behold (sayeth he) the Estrich mocketh both the horse and his Rider. This serueth to shew the nimbleness that is in that great birdbeast: for it is half a bird [of the ayre] and half a beast of the earth: and he hath such a weightie bodie, as he can not mount vp to flie aloft, but flickereth in such wise as he cannot be out gone. A man may well runne poste after him, but he cannot ouertake him. For what with his halfe leaping vpon his Clees, and what with his halfe flying [with his winges,] he passeth all the swiftnesse that can be in horses, or in any other beastes. Marke that for one poynt. And the same swiftnesse is matched with pollicie, so as those beastes can take vp stones by the way and throwe them at such as follow after them. Thus see yee two things in this Birdbeast: on the one side foolishnesse, howbeit matched with aduisednesse in gathering vp stones as he runneth, and in casting them backward at such as pursue him. This (I say) is one wonderfull thing that is to be seene in Estridges. On the other side there is such foolishnesse in them, that if they may once hide their heads, they thinke that all their bodies are hidden, and yet the huge carckesses of them are seene still. And as touching their egges, they sitte not vpon them, but for asmuch as they keepe in whote countries, they hide them in the sand, & the Sunne giuing warmth vnto them, doth by that meanes hatch them. If a man consider, on the one side the forecast of these Birdbeasts [in defending themselves,] and on the other side their foolishnesse in hiding their Egges: shall he not see a wonderfull worke of God in guying all after that sort? Furthermore wherewith mention is made of the strength and swiftnesse of this Birdbeast, lette vs vnderstand: that in those things it surmounteth vs. VVe may well make our brags: but the Estriches go beyond vs in that case. Marke this for one poynt, that men must not set so much store by themselves as they haue bene wont to do: for God will sende them backe continually too these examples, which serue to mocke their foolish boasting. On the other side when we see that these Birdbeasts which haue strength and nimbleness, yea and pollicie also in other things, are so fond in one poynt, that they shewe nother wit nor skill: ought not wee to glorifie Gods goodnesse towards vs? For who hath giuen vs more vnderstanding than the Estridges haue? Haue menne gotten it by their owne power? Is there eyther Gold or Siluer that can buy such a marchandize? Then let euery man acknowledge how much wee be bound vnto God, for giuing vs such discretion: and lette vs beare in minde that it behoueth vs to yeelde him his due prayse. Thus yee see what Gods meening is in this text. Also wherewith it is sayd, that God hath beneft the Estrich of wisdom: let vs vnderstand that it is to warne vs, that in asmuch as wee haue reason and discretion, wee be so much the more bound vnto God, for giuing vs so inestimable a benefite and priuiledge. For what a thing is it to discern betweene good and euill, and to know what is our duetie, not onely for walking in this worlde, but also to attayne to the euerlasting life? what a principal thing is it, that we know how God hath created vs after his owne image, and prepared our heritage for vs about? Seing then that we haue the skill to discern betweene honestie and dishonestie, and betweene vice and vertue: and that moreover God doth so inlighten vs by his holy spirite, that the heauens are after a sort opened vnto vs, and we passe about the world to come to the companie of the Angelles, and to the endless glorie which is purchaced for vs by our Lord Iesus Christ: in asmuch (say I) as wee haue all this: how much ought wee to make of such a treasure? And by the way, who is he that giueth it vs? For (as I haue eist sayde) we should bee lyke these foolish Birdbeastes that are spoken of here, and wee shoulde haue no more witte than the Estriches: but that God provideth otherwyse for vs.

Thus then yee see howe men ought to bridle themselves, and to apply all their wit and reason to the honoring of God, and not aduance themselves any more against him. But the cheefe thing is that they muste obey hum,

him, and consider that there is infirmitie still in themselves: & that it is ynough for them if they can in some small quantitie discern the greatnesse and heights of Gods workes, and that in creeping vpon the earth, they go forward still with all hūbleness and modestie, knowing well that they cannot as yet atteyne to the depth of Gods secretes. And that is the thing which I touched at the beginning for the better confirmation of this texte: namely that God on the one side intendeth to make vs perceyue his goodnesse, to the ende wee should haue no cause to be greued or to be out of patience, as though he had giuen a better state to the wilde beasts than to vs: and yet neuertheless to the intent to humble vs, wee see our selues in such plight, by reason of the corruption that wee caught by sinne, that the beastes do passe vs in some respects and particular poynts. True it is that we shall alwayes bee preferred before the beastes, and be placed in higher degree about them. Yea and whereas we haue not so great strength and nimbleness as the beastes haue: the same is to our profite, that is to wit, to humble vs with all: for otherwise wee would neuer be tamed. VVee see that although wee be put in minde of our weakenesse by many things which we behold: yet notwithstanding God is fayne to complayne of vs, that we be like wilde beasts, as hath bene sayde. And (which woofe is,) an Oxe will know his owners cribbe where he is fedde: and an Ass or a Horse will know his maysters stable: but we will not know our maker: to be short, he can by no meanes tame vs. Therefore it is good for vs that wee haue not such force and strength as the wilde beastes haue: for what a thing were it? how could we be delt withall? Moreover by the way let vs alwayes beare in minde, that wee must haue recourse to the number of benefites that God hath specially bestowed vpon vs, and not vpon the beastes: according as it is sayde here of reason and vnderstanding. Howbeit lette vs not simply consider the reason that is common in all men: but let vs also come to that it hath pleased God to inlighten vs with the wisdom that is conteyned in his Gospell, and to open our eyes by his holy spirit, so as wee bee able to see his secretes which else should be hidden and incomprehensible to vs: [and therefore] let vs learne to magnifie him for the same. These be the two things we haue to beare in minde. And by the way lette vs marke, that whereas mention is made here of the Estridges egges: if God extend his prouidence to the hatching of hir egges, euen when they be left and forsaken: it is much more likely that hee will neuer forget vs, vs (I say) which are more excellent creatures. And in good sooth we see he hath prouided much better for mankind, than for those cattell. For behold, the hennes of them are so foolish, that they forget their owne egges and their chickens that should come of them: but our Lord hath printed a kindnesse in women, that they know their yong babes, and nurrish them with their own blood and substance. Seing then that our Lord hath set such an order in mankind: thereby wee know that he hath a fatherly care of vs. Howbeit wee muste not measure his goodnesse by that only: but let vs come to that which he sayeth by his Prophet: Can the mother forget hir child? Although all the mothers in the world should forget their children: yet will not I forsake thee, (saith the Lord). God then on the one side sheweth himselfe a father, in that he holdeth the mothers at such stay in giuing themselves willingly to the charge of nurcing their children. True it is that we see not this in all mothers: for there are a number of these tender and nice things, that cannot finde in their hearts to take payne with their owne children, but a nurce shall bee more kinde to a childe that is none of hir owne, thā the owne mother is. Neuertheless the sayd kindnesse appeereth commonly. And whence proceedeth it? Euen of God, whose will it is to maynteyne mankind by that meane. Moreouer when wee know his fatherly goodnesse which sheweth it selfe to his creatures: very well, surely God doth afore hande make vs to feele his fauour, and the care that hee hath of vs: howbeit let vs vnderstand, that in himselfe he surmounteth all: that euer we can perceyue in this worlde, and that if we come vnto him with humbleness, he will alwayes shewe himselfe as he is, that is to wit, the wellspring of all mercie, and will pitie our aduersities and succour vs in them. Therefore let vs haue the sayd trust: and although we be wretched creatures, yet let vs not therefore cease to trust in him and to glorifie him: assuring our selues that if we yeeld vs teachable to him as his obedient people, he on his side will shewe vs that our acknowledging of him to be our God is not in vayne.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgmet of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better: and generally too open our eyes, that we may no more be puffed vp with pryde and presumption, nor be any more drunken with our own vayne fancies, to stande in our owne conceyt and to boast our selues: but that wee may rather learne to submitte our selues to him, to holde all our goodes of him, and to do him honour for them, acknowledging that if he continue not his mercie towards vs, we be vterly vndone at euery minute of an houre: that by that meane wee may be alwayes hild in his feare and subiection, and profite therein more and more, and that moreover he may vouchsafe to beare with vs still, so long as he seeth vs yet hemmed in with so many infirmities and corruptiōs, vntill he haue vterly bereft vs of them, and transformed vs vnto his glory and image. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable &c.

The. cliij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xxxix. Chapter.

22. Hast thou giuen strength to the horse, or inuironed his necke with neyng?
23. VVilt thou make a horse afraid as a grasshopper (or Locust?) the neyng of his nostrilles is terrible 24. He diggeth the earth with his foote, he reioyceth, he goeth with boldnesse before the armed man.
25. He passeth not for scaring, he feareth not, nother shunneth he the svvoord.
26. Let the Quiuer rattle, and the Steele of the speare and of the shield.
27. He svvallovveth vp the earth in rage and fiercenesse, and he passeth not for the noyze of the trumpet.
28. VVhen he heareth the trumpet, he sayeth, ha ha: he smelleth the battell a farre off, and the noyze of the Captaynes, and the shouting of the armie.

29. VWill the hawke take him to his fetters by thy vvifedome, or vvill he fpreed out his vvinges towards the South?
30. VWill the Eagle mount vp at thy commaundement, and make hir nest in the high places?
31. Shee dvvellerth vpon the rocke, and abideth vpon the hygh mountaynes as in fortresses.
32. And from thence shee espieeth hir pray, and hir eyes looke farre of.
33. Hir yong ones sucke vp bloud, and haunt vvhere dead bodies are.
34. And the Lord answered and sayd vnto Iob.
35. Is it learning to stryue vvith the Almighty? let him that reprooueth God answer to this.

If we were disposed to be taught of God, hee also on his parte would deale so with vs, as all his teaching should be to lift vs vp out of hand vnto himselfe, yea and that after so familiar a fashion, as a father talketh to his children. Howbeit, for as much as wee be harde to be gouerned, and in steede of yeelding our selues teachable, wee will needes bee over-<sup>20</sup> wyze: God is fayne to fend vs to schoole to the beasts, as wee haue scene heretofore, and as hee proceedeth to do here still. For in speaking of Horses and of their nature, he sheweth that men knowe not his workes, when they will needes auance themselues after that sorte agaynst him. And therewithall he sheweth that vnlesse it please him, he will not vouchsafe to answer any of our replies, but it shall be ynough for vs to be disproued by the brute beasts: Yea euen by the horses which are of householde with vs, so as he shall not neede to go farre to stoppe our<sup>30</sup> mouthes. For he shall haue aduocates ynough to pleade his cace, in the streetes, in the fieldes, and in the houses, and he will not raise vp great Oratours among men, but will (as I sayde) content himselfe to haue the brute beasts [to pleade for him.] Furthermore here is no curious discoursing of the nature of horses: for God ment not too deale with such maner of processe, but he alledgeth simply the things that are knowne to the ignorantest sort. A man neede not to bee greatly practized for the vnder-<sup>40</sup> standing of the things that are spoken here: for little children knowe them, lyke as when hee spake of the starres and planets, hee did it not after the maner of the greates doctours and Philosophers. VVhy so? By cause fewe folke should haue fared the better by it: for all haue not capacitie to conceyue it: but hee spake grossely of the Sunne and the Moone and of the things that are to bee scene. VVho soeuer hath eyes although he haue nother skill nor aught else, nor be a great Clerke: may notwithstanding comprehend the things that haue bene spoken<sup>50</sup> alreadie concerning the Sunne and the Starres: he needeth no Astrologie in that behalfe. In like cace is it here, where he speaketh of the beasts. Now then hee keepeth on the self same course: and that is, to the intēt that none of vs should take excuce, as wherevnto wee be inclined. Truly men are loth to confesse their owne ignorance: but yet when it commeth to the excusing of themselues before God, then they make a buckler of it, saying: This passeth mine vnderstanding, this is too curious geere for mee, I cannot fasten vpon it. For as much as most men take such lurkingholes: hee sayeth that euen the ignorantest sort shall haue it proued to their faces, that they haue bene vnthankfull & malicious to him, and that they haue not knowne the things that were vtterly apparant vnto them.

Thus then yee see the cause why that when mention is made here of horses, the things are rehearsed simply in such sorte as they be knowne to all men both to great and small. Yea (sayeth God)? Is it in man to giue sub strength as is scene in Horses? Or specially to giue them so lustie and corageous a nature? For besides that horses are strong of limbes, wee see that they be partly be edde of purpose for the warres Men see how they cast themselues into the middes of daunger: and they are inflamed with such a furiousnesse, as a man would say that they bee of one minde with the Trumpettes and with the great shoutes, yea and that they do euen encourage the menne. Sith wee see this, and that there is terriblenesse euen in their nozetbrils, so as he is a dreadfull beast of himselfe, and yet menne know but a small peece of Gods working in that behalfe, for he hath not vttered all his power there to the full, but hath onely giuen a little signe and marke what he is able to do: if men consider it throughly, ought they to strue or checke any more? dare they nowe set themselues agaynst the liuing God? they durst not answer a horse, they durst not rubbe him vpon the backe, they would be afrayde of him: and yet they bee not afrayde of the infinite power whereof they see but a small droppe in all the horses of the worlde.

Ye see then what we haue to remember in effect vpon this streyne. And euen in the same we see that God hath vsed no superfluous language in speaking heere of the hardnesse of horses, and of their strength, and that men cannot scare them as Grasshoppers, but that they runne vpon the speares and arrowes. It was needefull for him to speake so. And why? For wee be hardie and bolde ynough to carpe at God when we know not his glorie. And it is our owne blockishnesse that giueth vs that boldnesse: for in as much as wee drawe a curtayne before our eyes, which keepeth vs frō the sight of Gods glorie, that is the thing that maketh vs so brutishe. So then, bicause wee play the sharp sighted menne, and will needes comprehend all things in our owne fancie, to know the infinite power of God: therefore doth God treat here of Horses, and set before vs the strength and power that is in them. And why so? To the ende we should bee rauished in wondering at his guyding. For it behoueth vs alwayes to come-<sup>60</sup> backe to this poynt, that God hath not vttered his power altogether in horses, nor giuen vs there to vnderstande the vttermost that he is able to do: but hath set forth but onely as it were one droppe of his prouidence there. And yet for all that, if wee consider well what is sayde here: were it not that wee bee accustomed with the sight and handling of horses, euery of vs would runne away before them, and they would be terrible beastes to vs, specially at the sight of their boldnesse which they shewe in battell.

Thus yee see how wee must apply all the things to our instruction, which are rehearsed here particularly concerning horses. Yea and on the other side we must note the goodnesse of god, in that hee tames horses after that sort, to subdue them vnto men and to apply them to their seruice. I thinke we that a horse which is vntame of his owne nature, yea and bredde as it were of purpose for battell, would suffer himselfe to be so ruled and weilded, if God had not cooled that great corage of his, to the intent that mennes mennes turnes might bee serued? Durst wee do this of our selues? Then let vs conclude, that God sheweth vs his power in that he hath giuen such boldnesse vnto horses, and made them so fierce: and that he hath also giuen vs a singular record of his goodnesse and loue, in that we which are nothing, are able too breake horses after that maner to our own vse, so as they suffer vs to trauell them, to put them to the Chariot and cart, too labour them in tilling the ground, and to take their backs to ride vpon them.

Seing then that horses suffer themselves to be so governed: no doubt but our Lorde sheweth vs how beneficiall he is towards vs, and maketh vs too knowe him. Thus much concerning that poynt. But the chiefe poynt is the lesson that I haue touched: namely, that the same muste serue vs to repressse our boldnesse. Therefore when wee bee tempted to murmur against God, or to gaynesay him in any thing: wee must cast our eye vpon the brute beasts, for they can teach vs, and we also are woorthie of such schooling, when wee will not hearken peaceably to our God to obey his simple voyce. Afterwarde he speaketh of Hawkes and Eagles. Haiste thou (sayeth he) giuen wings to the Hawke? or will he fly at thy commandment when he soareth towards the South? or when it seemeth that he would stie vp into the Sunne? Haiste thou shaped the Eagles (sayeth he) ? Is it thou that giuest them their nestes in the Rockes, and in the towers of the mountaynes? that is to say in the high and loftie places? Art thou able to set such an order in nature? And whereas their yong ones feede vpon blood, and are bredde therevnto: is it thou that haste in- vured them to bee fedde and nurrished with such a sustenance? The Eagles finde where the dead bodies are, and they smell them out a farre of: yea and they be so sharpesighted as they bee able too spie them out euerywhere: and surely it is certayne that this soule hath the sharpest sight of all others. Is it thou then that hath giuen such nature to the Eagles, sayeth God? VVe see how God both aboue and beneath offereth vs mirrours (or rather liuely images,) wherein wee may perceyue his mightie power to humble our selues: and yet notwithstanding wee must confide also, that in the same there is wherewith to stoppe vs, when we bee so foolish or madde as to runne rushing agaynst him. And he needeth not to pleade his owne cace or to open his mouth to speake one worde: for looke how many creatures there are aboue and beneath, as many witnesses are there to confound vs vterly. No doubt but wee will be bolde ynough to aduance our selues agaynst God, as though wee would plucke him out of his seate with our blasphemies, and wee beare our selues in hand that wee may preuayle by our ouertoldnesse: but he hath stoppes ynough to cast in our wayes: for there is nother beast on the earth, nor bird in the ayre, which shal not beare witness agaynst vs. VVe see then that Gods cace shall bee pleaded by his creatures without troubling himselfe with it: and yet notwithstanding, all that wee shall haue deuized agaynst him muste returne vpon our owne heads. Now although this lesson be easie ynough: yet is it very ill minded on mens behalfe. And for proof hereof, wee see the foules flie in the ayre, and wee see the beasts go vpon the grounde: and yet howe fewe are there of vs that wake vp, to thinke vpon God? dayly we haue store of temptations, and the Diuell breatheth into vs the spirite of grudging and hartburning against God: If wee bee not handled to our owne liking, by and by we fall too carping and wrangling, saying: who was aware of that which is shewed or done heere? VVe graunt well ynough that the thing is vterly apparant: and yet notwithstanding wee forget it, and it neuer commeth to our minde agayne. The easier then and the commoner that this lesson is: the lesse excuse shall there bee for vs, and the more blamewoorthie shall wee bee before God, for not minding the things which wee ought too haue knowne vnspoken too, or without putting in remembrance. And ought not this to be vnderstood of euery one of vs? If wee thinke not vpon God when the Diuell commeth to pricke vs so against him: what lettereth vs too do it but our owne malice and vnthankfulnesse? Seing then that wee bee so slowe, and the things that ought too be euer rediest with vs, come not to our mind: we ought so much the more to marke what is touched here, howe euery man should furnish himselfe aforehand with such warnings. Looke me then vpon the hawkes that flye in the ayre. It is a straunge thing, onely to see that a liuing creature can cast forth it selfe and mount vp with such force, as it seemeth that it should pearce through the clowdes: and no doubt but wee would bee exceedingly abashed at it, if wee were not accustomed with it. For do wee surmyze that the same is done by haphazard? VVe it possible for the birdes to mount vp after that fashion, if God had not giuen them that nature? Nowe if wee see Gods hande apparant in a bird: which of vs shall take vpon him to teache God his lesson? for wee be confounded in a very small thing: and what proportionablenesse or increnesse shall there be, if we make comparison betwene God and his creatures?

Agayne, if wee compare a hawke with the residue of the whole worlde: it is nothing. And if so small a portion of Gods woorkes ought to rauish vs and amaze vs: what ought all his woorkes to do when wee come to the full numbering of them, so as wee fall to discourfing of all the things which wee see bothe aboue and beneath? Morcouer when wee consider that the maiestie of God is yet hygher aboue all the Heauens, and so farre of from vs as wee cannot reache vnto it: doth it not become vs to stoupe to honour and reuerence it, and to bee restreynd from passing any further, whensoever the Diuell shall labour to make vs carpe agaynst it, or to grudge at it by any maner of meane? As for the things that are spoken heere concerning the nature of Eagles: it may bee takē, that their yong ones do sucke blood anon after that they bee vnlozed, bycause that one kinde of Eagles do caste their yong ones out of the nest, so as they bee driuen to shifte for themselves: and it is sayde that they bring vp none but the blacke ones: howbeit they that write of such matters, do varie in that poynt: for some say that the Eagles do caste away their yong ones as bastard eagles, if their sight be not strong ynough to looke full vpon the shyning Sunne. But wee haue not to do with the curious poynts of the Philosophers, it is ynough for vs that God doth here shew vs the nature of Eagles in such wyze as it is knowne: and he vseth (as yee would say) that grosse fashion, to the intent we should haue no cloke nor excuse of ignorance. Looke mee then vpon the Eagles that are bredde to the pray: yea euen from the shell they haue the propertie of sucking blood: and it is a straunge thing that a bird should so feede and nurrish itself with blood.

Behold what a cruellie is put into them, needes therefore muste they haue that nature giuen them of another. And whence commeth the diuersitie that is betwene the birdes that liue by pray, and the other foules? Most not that difference bee of Gods putting, who thereby sheweth vs suche signes of his providence, as wee bee forced to confesse that it is he which gouerneth and ordereth all things, and that as the birdes made not their owne bodies, so also they gaue not themselves that incarnation which which they haue, but the same commeth from elsewhere, and God sheweth himself in such wyse, as we must needs woorthip his Maieftie. Thus yee see the chiefe poynt which wee haue to remember in this text. And therefore a man needeth not to go to schoole for the matter: lette him do no more but open his eyes, I meene euen the veriest idiot: for the thing that is shewed here is knowne to all men, and therefore wee must needes be condemned if we be so brutish and blockish, as not to know the things that are vtterly apparant, specially seing it is added, that the Eagles resort thither as they perceyue any dead bodies too bee, and that they smell the dead carkeffes a farre of, and spie out theyr pray too make their flight thitherward. Nowe when wee see such things, lette vs vnderstande that our Lorde hath put a secreete mouing into them: for it were impossible that the Eagles should haue it of themselues, but that God hath inured them to it, & imprinted I wote not what a thing in them, whereby he sheweth himselfe to be wonderfull.

So then, when wee looke aboute vs and beholde the diuersitie of workes, we be inforced spyte of our teeth, to knowe that there is a Creator or maker which beareth sway: for if all beasts were of one nature and inclination: Gods prouidence should bee more darkefome than it is, Then by all likelyhood it seemeth to be sayde, that it is nature which beareth the sway, according as wee see that when the Philosophers themselues had searched and considered things throughout: in steade of worshipping and magnifying God in his woorkes, they bent all their witte and vnderstanding to forge a nature that should serue to deface God and his glorie, and therein the Diuell ruled them to their great and horrible damnation. But when as we see such varietie, that one bird is of one nature and another of another, and that the beasts also do differ: it can not be sayde, that this is one nature, as it might be if all living things went by one line, and men sawe one answerable conformitie in all beasts. If things were so disposed, menne would by and by say, Nature, Nature: and they would neuer thinke vpon God. But now sith we see that one birde hath fearfulnessse, and another hath not: therein Gods working appeereth the better. The dooues (as wee see) are as fearefull foules as any can be: and contrarywise wee see that the Goffehawkes and all other birdes of pray are as hardie. Againe there are other foules that are very great, which yet notwithstanding giue not themselues to the pray. As for example, looke vpon the Swannes: will they feede vpon Carion? are they birdes of pray as the Eagles are? Seing then that there commeth such diuersitie before our eyes: God doth therein shewe vs his prouidence the more apparatly, and we be so much the more conuicted. And that is a thing well woorthie to be marked. For without going any further, if all men had one countenance, and all women likewyze, so as they were all of one stature, of one colour, of one making, of one looke, and of one mind: we should not so wel know that there is a creator that shaped vs, nor that hee dealeth forth the graces and gistes of his holy spirite in such measure as it pleaseth him: It would seeme that our mothers wombe shaped vs, or that it was the seede of our father that gaue vs substance and shape and all that euer wee haue. To be short, men would not thinke themselues beholding to God for any thing, nor yeeld him any honor. But when wee see such diuersitie of menne, so as one is bigge and another small: and their dispositions differ, so as one is sharpewitted and another dull, one is of great eloquence and vtterace in speech, and another is as good as halfe dumbe: when wee see all these things: muste wee not needes (if we be not tooo malicious, and fro-ward) confesse that God at his owne pleasure distributeth vnto vs the gistes of his holy spirit, and that it is hee which hath made vs and fashioned vs: according as wee haue seene heretofore, that like as when a woman hath milked hir kyne shee maketh hir cheefe of what fashion shee hir selfe listeth, so God also dispozeth vs in such wyze, as wee wote not what to say to it, but that it is his hande that woorketh it, yea euen after a maruaylous fashion. And therefore lette vs learne not to be blinde in suche diuersitie of things as God setteth afore vs: but whensoever we open our eyes, and so many things come to our sight, so as one man hath this shape, & another hath another cleane contrary: lette vs vnderstand that God draweth vs to himselfe, and that forasmuch as he seeth vs slow in coming, he cheereth vs vp and pricketh vs forward, so as we be in a maner forced to go onward, except we will of malicious stubbornnesse withstand him, and carpe at him in saying, I see and will not see. There is yet another poynt, in that it is sayd, that the Eagles gather togis ther to the place where caryons are: that is to wit, that sith the birds which liue by pray haue skill to seeke their feeding, and specially that the Eagles do smell a farre of where aught is for them to feede vpon: much more reason is it that wee should resort to the place where God sheweth vs that our life is. And therefore seing that the birdes resort together for corruptible foode, yea and runne thither and take payne for it: what excuce is there for vs if wee on our side refuze our [spirituall] foode when it is offered vs, and haue not the wit to resort to the place where our life is? Shall there neede any other witnessses against vs than the Eagles? according also as our Lord Iesus setteth foorth the same similitude vnto vs. For after he hath spoken of the greates troubles that shoulde bee in the world: he sayeth that where soeuer the dead carkeffe is, thither will the Eagles resorte, according wherevnto wee of this countrie may say the like of Rauens. Yee see then that these poore birdes haue a naturall inclination too seeke their meate and pray: and where shall wee on our side finde our lyfe? Should we bee so witleffe, when our Lorde Iesus Christe calleth and allureth vs vnto him, telling vs that when wee be come thither wee shall finde all that wee want, and bee enriched with all maner of good things, so as wee shall bee fully replenished with his nurishment and strengtb, euen too our full contentation?

Therefore lette vs thinke vpon it: for seing wee haue such assurance, muste not the Eagles beare witnessse agaynst vs at the great day, if wee bee rechlesse now? But lette vs come backe too the principall poynt which I touched at the beginning, according also as God concludeth with the same: namely, Is it learning too contend with the Almighty? Lette him that correcteth God answere too it. Thus then serueth to shewe vs to what purpose so many things haue bene discoursed. For a man might thinke it straunge, that God intending to maynteyne his rightuousnesse and to stoppe mennes mouthes that they should not carpe agaynst him, should speake of the Starres, of the tilling of the ground, and of the maner of sayling, and sette foorth the natures of beastes. To what purpose is all this? It should seeme that God seeketh rousing reasons. Yea: but when wee shall haue considered the poynt that I touched, we shall finde it much more auaylable for vs that hee maynteyneth his rightuousnesse after that maner, than if hee had disputed of it without setting his creatures afore vs. And why? For wee must come backe to this conclusion, that although he should let vs alone with our babbling, yet should we winne nothing by it: for wee coulde not crie so lowde as too beate his eares eares with it : hee coulde set many stoppes in our way : looke how many creatures there are in heauen, on earth, and in the sea, all of them should rise vp & bend themselves agaynst vs, so as we should not be able too come nigh God. Nowe we see that this maner [of dealing] which God vseth to daunt Job, and in his person all such as are impacient, or which will needes aduance themselves to high) is as fit as may be, and that he could not haue taken a better way to teach, than that which he hath hild heretofore. And that is the cause why I sayd, that it behoueth vs to marke well that conclusion. Doth he then shew himselfe to be wise, which contendeth with the Almighty? True it is, that forasmuch as the Hebrew word that is sette downe here, signifieth as well to Teach, as to Correct, (for worde for worde it is thus: Is it learning or correcting too striue with the Almighty?) It might be taken as though it were sayde, doth the man that so quarelleth and striueth with God, prepare himselfe to bee chastized? No: but contrariwise he hardeneth himselfe. Now our true wisdom is to haue skill to chaſtice our selues, and to know our own wants, that we may be soie and ashamed of the, & haue none other helpe but to pray God to receyue vs to mercy and to pitie vs. That is the true wisdom of men. Then must we conclude on the contrary part that such as do so list vp themselves agaynst God, are starke fooles. And the meaning will come alwayes to this poynt, so as there will be no diuersitie of matter, but the doctrine will tende alwayes to this one marke: namely, That men are not onely misadvised, but also vtterly destitute of witte and reason, when they take so vpon them to plead agaynst their maker. And for the better vnderstanding heereof, let vs holde these two degrees that I haue spoken of. Let the first be, That our true wisdom is to ouermayster our selues. So long as a man standeth in his owne conceyt, or looketh to loftily, or is ouer scornfull: he dooth nothing but throwe himselfe headlong into decay, and the ende of it cannot be but deadly. Therefore there is nothing better for vs than to correct [or amende] our selues: that is to say, to beate downe our selues in such wise as God may weelde vs, and we acknowledge that we be nothing, but that we bee so full of wretchednesse as hee must bee faine to gouerne vs, and we take our selues too bee beholding to him for all good things. Againe, for the seconde poynt, seeing wee bee needie, vnfurnished, and destitute [of all things:] let vs runne vnto him who is the weispring of all power, wisdom and righteousnesse, and (to be short) let vs vnderstande that it is he of whom we holde our life, and all the appurtenances thereof. Ye see then that the way to bee well taught or learned, is to be ashamed of our selues, and to flee vnto our God, and therewithal to condemne all our wicked deedes & sinnes, and too acknowledge that in our nature there is nothing but frowardnesse & corruption. When we haue learned to hate our selues after that maner: we be sure that wee haue greatly profited. But now, can a man amende himselfe when he intendeth to plead agaynst his God? Surely it is euen as good as a draught of poyson too make vs madde, if the diuell can bring vs too the poynt too take piteche agaynst God, or to bee discontented with him, or to accuse him of doing wrong, or to take displeasure that he should handle vs otherwise than we our selues would haue him: I say, the diuell putteth a furiousnesse into our heades, so as we become starke madde. Then is it a verie awke thing for vs to chaſtise our selues when we be in such a chafe, and chawe vpon our brydle, and that although God afflict vs, yet notwithstanding in stead of humbling of our selues, we cease not to be on fire agaynst him.

And therefore it is no teaching of vs, that is to say, it is no seeking of true and good learning, nother is it any right wisdom to stande so in contention with our God. Lo here a poynt which comprehendeth verie much, if we can skill to put it in vre as it should be. But forasmuch as we be so giuen to toyes and so wilfull withal: God addeth that if we take vpon vs to correct him, we must answer to this: that is to say, to the things that hee hath alledged afore vs. True it is that some restreine that saying to this verse, That wee must answer for it if wee pleade agaynst God to correct him: and that forasmuch as we see it cannot bee, and that it is altho her apparant: wee must therefore conclude that wee haue no cause to pleade. But if all bee throughly considered, it is certaine that God ment to make heere a generail conclusion of the matters that hee had discoursed heerebefore.

So then let vs marke, that when we wil not correct our selues willingly, yea euen by vtter absteyning from all murmuring, so as we keepe our mouthes shut, and go not about to finde fault with God by any meanes: we must bee enforced to come to it: and when wee haue pleaded our fill, God hath ynough wherewith to reuenge himselfe of our foolish attempts. And why? For hee will arme all his creatures, and hee shall haue as many Adoucaters and Proctours of law agaynst vs, as there are Lirdes of the ayre, fishes of the sea, or beastes of the lande. To be short, a man needeth not to go out of himselfe too bee disproued: for do we not see a woonderfull workmanship of our God in euerie of the tippes of our fingers endes? Is there any of our nayles that witnesseth not that God is so excellent a workemaster, as we ought to be confounded as oft as we thinke vpon the least thing that he sheweth vs there. Nowe then we haue the true and naturall meaning of the sentence, where it is sayde, Let him that reproceth the Almighty answer to this. Howbeit, it behoueth vs to marke howe profitable this doctrine is for vs. True it is, that all of vs will at the first sight say, that it is to lewde and heynous a dealing too go about to reprove God: but in the meane while, who is hee that forbeareth to do it? We will well make countenance to haue that modestie: but yet there is none of vs all but hee starkleth if Gods hande bee anye thing rough to vs, or if things fall not out to our liking. And at whom do such starklings pushe? If wee thought that the afflictions came to vs from Gods hande, and that all the troubles whiche are seene in the world are iudgements that proceede from him: and that euen when the good are persecuted, and the wicked beare sway, it is his will to exercise our pacience by that meanes, and too clenze vs from all our vanities, and (to bee short) to mortifie vs to the worldwarde: [I say] if wee wilt this, they that are offended when they see that the Church hath no peace nor rest, and that good men are troden vnder foote and vexed, so as one is pinched with sicknesse, and another with pouertie, and in the meane while the wicked haue their full scope, and are free of such inconueniencies: I say, if wee knewe this, wee would learne to humble our selues. But contrariwise, when wee do so ranckle inwardly as wee cannot holde our selues from murmuring agaynst God, though it bee but euen within our teeth: I pray you do wee not accuse God of crueltie, as though he had no reason too handle vs after that maner? We will not with open mouth say that God is cruell and vniust: no truly, we will not say so: but yet do we tende to that ende.

So then wee see that this is a lesson that belongeth to all men: namely, that if wee take vpon vs too re-proue God [or to finde fault with him] wee must aunswere to all his workes. But nowe let vs applie all our wittes, and let euerie of vs do what he can: and yet when wee haue debated vpon all the things afore rehearsed, I pray you is it possible for vs to aunswere them, and to replie vnto God in the things that he hath done and disposed in the nature and creation of things? No doubt but we shall finde store ynough of folie in our selues, according as we see howe men ouershoote themselves, and the diuell also blindeth them in such wise, as they sticke not at all to carpe at their maker. But it behoueth vs to come to the pith: Can we (say I) gaine say the order of nature as it is settled? Can wee denie the prouidence of God? Can wee abolishe his power which sheweth it selfe? Can wee say that hee hath not done and disposed all things with wisdom? Againe, can wee displace his iustice which appeareth to vs matched with his goodnesse and wisdom? Can wee bring any of these things too passe? No, it is vnpossible. Now then, must not men needes bee blockish, when they will aduance themselves after that maner agaynst their maker? But what is to be done? To the intent we may fare the better by this doctrine, wee must begin at this ende: namely to feele how weake we bee to answere the thing that God will put to vs. Seeing then that we bee not able to furnishe our selues for it: let vs learne too humble our selues. After what sort? Let vs runne too the foresayde wisdom: which is, to correct our selues. Therefore when men haue looked well to themselves, and considered their owne wants: there will bee no more cause for them to stande any more vpon their owne reputation, or too sooth themselves, or to beare themselves in hande, that they be able to do this or that: but they shal be faine to fall out with themselves, and to bee ashamed of their owne filthinesse. They will hate and abhorre them-ues when they be so mortified: and it shall behoue them to offer God the sacrificize that is spoken of in the Psalme Ps. 51. 19 that is to witte, the sacrificize of a broken heart. VVhen wee bee come to that poynt: then is it true wisdom. Let the despyzers of God ruffle it oute, and let them sling abroade as it were at randon as muche as they list: for they doo but woorke their owne mischiese, and in the ende after their mounting vpp, they must tumble downe againe. But let vs bee sure that in humbling our selues we shall haue a good foundation and stay, and wee shalbe vphild by the grace of our God. Thus see you the wisdom and power of our God, the which it behoueth vs to magnifie as in respect of his creatures, sith hee maketh vs to inioy so many benefits in this worlde. Also ye see our wisdom: which is, that in looking vpwarde and downwarde, too beholde the diuersities of his creatures which he sheweth vs there, we must alwayes resort vnto him to bee certified of his prouidence. And seeing hee hath graunted vs the grace to call vs once vnto him: let vs learne to come quietly vnder his hande, and to let him gouerne vs at his pleasure. And in the meane time if hee handle vs after a fashion that seemeth hard and combersome to vs: let vs take al patiently, and pray him to comfort vs, and strengthen vs in such wise in his loue, that howsoeuer we fare, we may not at any time go about to murmur agaynst him.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him that we may be so touched with them, as it may thoroughly beat vs downe before him, and make vs flee to his onely mercy, as the onely remedie for vs: and that hee not onely forgie our sinnes past, but also gouerne vs in such wise by his holy spirite henceforth, as oure whole desire may be to walke in his obedience. And so let vs all say, Almighty God heauenly father, &c.

37. I am of base degree, and what shall I ansvvere thee? I vwill lay my hande vpon my mouth.

38. I haue spoken once, and I vwill ansvvere no more: yea tvvice, but I vwill not turne againe,

AND the Lorde speaking out of the vvhirlewinde sayde vnto Iob,

2. Girde vp thy loynes lyke a valiant man: aske me, and I vwill make thee vnderstande.

3. VVilt thou disanull any iudgement? v wilt thou condemne me to iustifie thy selfe?

4. Hast thou an arme like God, or thunderest thou vwith such a voyce?

5. Cloth thy selfe vwith glorie and maiestie, be excellent, put on thy costly apparell.

6. Spread out the indignation of thy vvrath, looke vpon all the proude to bring them downe.

E haue scene already that God too teach Iob right humilitie, spake to him out of a whirlewinde. For although his onely voyce ought to be ynough to astonish vs: yet notwithstanding, thereby hee sheweth yet better how hard we bee, in that hee is faine too vse some further meanes too abate our pride, or else hee shoulde not bring it aboute. True it is, that humilitie proceedeth of Gods spirite, and that suche as are stubbornly bent vntoo naughtinesse, do neuer submitte themselves willingly vntoo him, though hee giue them sufficient warnings and experience too leade them, and as it were too driue them therevnto: but yet for all that, God in vsing the same violent meanes towardes those whome he gouerneth by his holy spirite, intendeth therby to shew vs the lewdnesse and frowardnesse that is in our nature, considering that he is faine to thunder and rore, or else we continue blockish still, so as we perceiue not his maiestie & power to submit our selues vnto him. Nowe is shewed vs the frute of the things that God hath done. For whereas hee sayth, that Iob graunted himselfe to be of base state, and that it behoued him to holde his peace, and to keepe his mouth shut: therein it appeareth that God magnified not himselfe in vayne, and that his speaking so oute of a VVhirlewinde, was not withoute effect. And why? For lo, Iob is tamed as a little lambe, and he goeth not about to replie anie more. Heretofore he had stryued, and taken vpon him to contend with god in mainteyning his owne coce: but nowe is all that geere layde a water, and he sayth that hee dares not speake anie more: and whereas hee had gone faire forwarde in the matter, hee leaueth off and forbeareth vtterly. Then let vs learne that if God thunder vehemently agaynst vs, it is for our welfare, although wee thinke it rough at the first sight. God (say I) must bee faine to feare vs: for wee on our side are dull vpon the Spurre, and not easie too bee brought in subiection, and therefore wee haue neede of great violence to abate the pride that is in vs by nature. Howebeit let vs marke also heerewithall, that when God shall haue spoken so, as it were out of a whirlwinde, there is no excuse for vs, if we follow not Iob's example in acknowledging the wretchednesse that is in vs, too the ende to become altogether quiet. And it is a poynt worthe too bee noted. For wee see dayly howe sharpe and rough God is, to the ende to ouermaster men, and to bring them home to him, and yet they be neuer the better for it. If God touche one with sicknesse, and chastize another with pouertie: is it not all one as if hee spake to them out of a whirlwinde? Yea and doth he not then rappe vs with maine blowes vpon our heades? And yet for all that, verie fewe of vs doo amende. VVe shall see that some gnthe their teeth at him, some fal into a furious rage of rayling, and other some become wilfull and hard hearted, so as all that God can do to them shall not moue them. Iob's example will condemne such bluntnesse and sturdinesse. And why? For although Iob was impacient for a while and were caryed away with some pang that were in him: yet in the ende he gaue care to the roring voyce of God, and the whirlwinde strake such a feare into him, as he corrected himselfe and hilde his peace. Euen so must we do: and therefore let vs bethinke our selues to come too conformitie. For after that God hath beene boystous towardes vs, and scared vs: if wee continue wilde beastes till: surely wee shall pay verie deere for it. So then, although wee haue ouershotte our selues, yet let vs not stande in it. If we cannot yeeld our selues vnto God at the first blowe: yet at leastwise, let vs beware that wee bee not wilfull, when we see that hee presseth vs, and compelleth vs in maner by force to bee obedient to him. Then if God vse his ordinarie meane, let not vs resist them. For what hope we to game by it? In the ende we must be sunken vnder his hande. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place.

But heerewithall let vs learne to beare patiently the stripes that God giueth vs, assuring our selues that that is the meane whereby he intendeth to make vs readie too be subiect vnto him. And forasmuch as it is good for vs, that of wilde beastes hee shoulde make vs too become as sheepe and lambe: let vs not take such preparatiues too hart, but after Iob's example let vs say, Lord I see now I am of base state. Truly it shoulde seeme that this saying caryeth no great pith in it: but if we consider well the foolish ouerweening that is in men; we shal see that Iob had profited greatly in that he could say, that he was of base state. If it be demaunded of whence wee bee come, [and what wee be:] we will answere, that we be wretched creatures, taken out of the earth, so frayle as it is pitie to see, and fraught with store of infirmities. VVe will confesse these things with our mouth, but yet in the meane while wee will not ceasse to esteeme of our selues: wee forget from whence wee came, and whither wee must returne, and what our present state is: none of this commeth too our minde. Men then are (as ye woulde say) drunken, by bearing themselves in hande that they bee muche worth, and they challenge a worthinesse to them through fantasticall imagination. And therefore when'oouer a man doth truly and vnfeynedly knowe howe to despyze himselfe, and that he hath not aught in him wherfore he should aduance himselfe: it is verie much, yea it is great wisedome. And let vs marke well, that we shall neuer come to such reason, till we bee [thoroughly] touched with the Maiestie and glorie of God. For so long as men looke one vpon another, they take occasion too esteeme of themselves, saying: Am not I as well too bee lyk'd as hee or hee? This comparison then which men make one with another, blindeth them, and maketh them too thinke alwayes that they be I wote not what. But when we come vnto God, and he sheweth himselfe as he is: all this ouerweening of ours must bee faine to vanish away, and to disperse and come too nothing. And so wee haue too beseeche God to make vs perceyue his glorie, too the ende wee may enter into the sayde examination of our owne wretchednesse, and disable our selues in such wise, as none of vs may beguile himselfe any more by his owne foolish ymagination. And that also is the cause why Abraham (when God appeared to him) sayde, Alas, I am but dust and ashes. VVe will well ynough say so (in a maner all of vs) though God be farre out of our minde, & that we thinke not at all of him: howbeit, all is but hypocrisie and feinednesse, and we neuer do it hartily and earnestly till we haue felt what God is? And therefore let vs marke well the order that is set downe heere: which is, that after God had spoken to Iob out of the whirlwinde, Iob confesseth himselfe to be nothing, and that hee ought not to be so bold as to speake one way or other. Howebeit let vs bethinke vs well also, that whensoeuer God is so fauorable as to appeare to vs, wee must not bee so foolish as too make any account of our selues or of our vertues. It is no maruell though the wretched Papists imagine a free will, and ground the obteyning of Paradis vpon mens owne meritis, weening too make God their detter: And why? For they neuer were acquainted with the light of the Gospell, which bewrayeth mennes wantes, inasmuch as God vttereth his owne righteousnesse there. These filie soules then, neuer hauing felt what the power of God is, do abuse themselves with such deceytes. But as for vs, seeing that God telleth vs howe perfect his righteousnesse is, and therewithall discouereth our filthinesse, and sheweth vs that there is nothing but abomination in vs: wee must no more bee tyed too suche dotages, but vtterly disable our selues, that all pride may bee beaten downe in vs, and our God bee glorified. Those therefore that haue beene taught purely in the Gospell, must come too this poynt of wisedome, of vtter disabling themselves. And that is the cause why wee saye, that sayth bringeth menne too lostinesse. For after as God reuealeth his goodnesse vnto vs, so must wee assure our selues, that his dooing so is because there is nothing but cursednesse in vs, and that wee shoulde bee vtterly vndone and forlorne, were it not that hee vouchsafeth too succour vs by his mercie. And so the doctrine of the Gospell bringeth vs to the meeknesse of vtter abacing and disabling our selues in all things.

Nowe heerewithall Iob sayeth, that he will lay his bande vpon his mouth and where vs be hath spoken once, hee will not fall to it againe: and that where as hee hath spoken twice, hee will do so no more. VVhereas he sayth he will lay his hande vpon his mouth, it is a signe & protestation that he will not proceed any further & that maner of speech is rise in the scripture. And it serueth to do vs to vnderstande, that wee must restraine our foolish appetites, & that when our flesh tickleth vs to speake, we must resist it, as if it were by putting a muzzle or a bridle vpon our mouthes to reueyne them. If a man were so wise of himselfe as hee woulde not be tempted too feake amisse, hee shoulde not neede too laye his hande vpon his mouth, for hee woulde refrayne of his owne accorde, and hee should neede neither stoppe nor barre. But nowe on the contrarie part, whereas it is sayde that we must lay our hande vpon our mouth: it is to do vs to wit, that we haue to fight against our fonde lustes and lykings, which do continually make vs to halstie in speaking, inio much that our tongue shall still be sharpe sette to cast forth some thing or other that is nought worth, agaynst God. Heere then we bee warned of a vice that is great, wicked and hurtfull: which is, that we will needes be sharpe witted in pleading agaynst God, and set forth our selues with a brauerie, to the end to cloke our wantes with vaine excuses. Ye see then that the thing wherunto me tend & are wholly inclined, is that they woulde faine cloke themselves by hypocrisie, and rather condemne God, than suffer themselves too bee brought to reason, so as they will alwayes haue some lie or startinghole, yea and in the ende fall to spewing out of blasphemies. For when our tongue is venomous and altogether soked in lying and falsehoode: at the last it bursteth out [euē] agaynst God. Sith we know this, haue we not good cause to mislike of our selues? And therefore whensoever we heare this maner of speech, that the holy men layde their hande vpon their mouth: let vs remember howe forward we bee to speake amisse. And specially when wee compare our selues with Iob, if hee could not holde his peace without streyning of himselfe: alas, what shall we do? For we come farre short of profiting so much as he did. Ye see then that as touching the first poynt, men ought alwayes too mistrust themselves, when they haue occasion to speake, knowing wel that their nature doth continually prouoke the to speake amisse, & that their tung is nothing else but a warehouse of leasing & hipocrisie, and that in the end it appeareth that there is nothing but poyson according as it is said in the Psalme, that the poyson of Aspes is vnder the tungs of those that are vnreformed. Vntil such time as god hath made cleane our mouthes, they can skill to vtter nothing but cursednesse & bitternesse. And therefore let vs learn hereby to refrayne our selues, euen with a hatred towards the euill that we haue bene too much accustomed to, and to frame our selues to the meeldnesse and obedientnesse that are shewed vs heere by the holy Ghost. For in asmuch as we be so forward to speake amisse: it standeth vs in hand to indeuer to amend suche faultinesse. And out of doubt it is not ynough too haue acknowledged it, no nor too haue condemned it: but it behoueth vs also too redresse it. Did Iob then lay his hande vpon his mouth? Haue the other holye Prophetes done as much? Let vs follow them in so doeing: that is to wit, whensoever we be prouoked to grudge agaynst God, though we haue neuer so fine shittes to disguise the truth, and too turne it into a lie: let vs resist such lewdnesse, and fight agaynst such vngraciousnesse, seeing it is so vntowarde and condemned of God. And howe shall wee do that? By laying our hand vpon our mouth, that is to say, by putting a stop in our owne way: for it behoueth vs to brydle our selues as wilde beastes.

Therefore let every man looke neerely to himselfe: and if we happen to be afflicted, or to be crossed with some ouerthwart thing, so as one of vs fretteth, another chafeth, and the thirde is so ranckled with poyson, as we be prouoked to speake amisse: let vs restreyn our selues. It were good wee did so (will some man say) but I finde it verie hard for me, and I do alwayes incline to the other syde. Yea, but it is ynough if wee resist agaynst it. Not that wee bee not worthie to be condemned though we overcome it: (for the verie onely ymagination and conceyving of it in oure thought, is wicked and sinfull before God: ) but for that hee of his infinite goodnesse taketh it in good worth, when hee seeth that the euill lyketh vs not, but that wee labour to repress it. God then perceyuing vs to haue that inclination, fayleth not to accept vs. VVherefore seeing hee is so gracious towards vs: wee ought to haue so much the more courage to stoppe the wicked woordes, blasphemies, and moylings, that might burst our agaynst God. It is sayde that Iob, having spoken once, leaueb off: yea and that seeing hee had spoken twice, hee woulde do so no more. VVherby he betokeneth first of all, that if wee haue gone too farre in speaking amisse, we must not therefore harden our selues as we see many doo, who when they haue once ouershotte themselves and raunged farre out of square, wil not be brought backe againe, but play double or quit as they say. VVee must not do so: for although the euill be of continuance, and wee haue followed it to farre alreadie: yet must wee turne heade so soone as God warneth vs of it. Therefore let not men play the bedlems when they haue done amisse a long time together, and doubled their euill doing: and when they haue cast forth a foolish worde vnadvisedly, and clapped two or three mo in the necke of it, let them not therefore growe spytefull agaynst God: but let them condemne themselves double and trebble, and therevpon returne agayne into the right way. Thus ye see that the thing which wee haue too marke in this streyn, is that although we haue continued to offend God a long time, it is neuer out of season for vs to turne a new leafe. The seconde poynt is, that we must not flatter our selues though we haue many occasions to do it, as we see of Iob heere, who had many fayre colours: he alledged not some one reason alone for the maintenance of hys case: he had great store, and doubled his proofes in diuerse sortes, insomuch that hee seemed to haue had matter ynough: yee woulde haue sayde that hee had bene fully perswaded of it, and that hee had looked determinately to haue gone away with the victorie, and that hee had no sooner set downe one article, but he was able to haue come to another: and yet notwithstanding, nowe he giueth ouer all his replies, and all the goodly likelihoodes that he had to plead with agaynst God. VVhereas I haue spoken once or twice, (sayeth hee) I renounce it euery whit, and I will no more do so. Heereby we be taught (as I sayde) that although wee had neuer so many faire clokings, and thought our selues to haue verie good reasons and well grounded to mainteyne our case: they bee nothing worth, all must fall to the ground. And therefore let vs not any more flatter our selues in our fondnesse: for in the ende we must be faine to come to that which hath bene treated of heretofore: namely that God will haue a thousand articles for one. Then let vs keepe vs from entering into contention with him, and also let vs stoutly withstande all the fancies which the diuell putteth into our heade. If hee go aboute to make vs chafe agaynst God, or if he tempt vs, and set vs on fire with grudging and stubbornnesse: let all this be thrust downe, though we had whole hundreds of replies that might seeme fayre and good.

This done, it is sayde that God began yet once againe to speake out of the whirlewinde, saying vnto Iob, Gyrde vp thy loynes like a man, whiche saying wee haue hearde heretofore. Nowe a man might thinke it straunge that God shoulde still speake terribly vnto Iob, and as it were defie him, and mocke at his presumptuousnesse: seeing hee was vtterly caste downe in himselfe. But heereby a man may see, that when we be humbled, there is yet still some remnant of pryde hidden in vs, which appeareth not but before God, and hee must bee fayne to purge vs of it. It is certaine that when Iob confessed himself to be a wretched creature, and a man of no value, he vsed no feynednesse, but spake as his heart gaue him. Ye see then, that hee was fully tamed and come too a meeke and humble minde, desyring to be wholly obedient vnto God, and yet for all that, he needed to be chastized still, and to be better schooled, to the end he might acknowledge himselfe to bee as he was, and therevpon yeelde all glorie and prayse vnto God. And why so? Because (as I sayde) there is alwayes some backnooke: and although men be brought vnto God, and be desirous too frame themselves to Gods will: yet are they not throughly clenfed of all pride at the first, but God perceyue that there is still some secrete discafe behinde, the which it behoueth him too amende. Lo heere a verie notable text. For haue wee once slightly confessed that Gods afflicting of vs is rightfull, and acknowledged our sinnes: wee wonder that he should go forwarde still in handling vs roughly. It will make vs to say, howe now? Ought God to be so rigorous towards mee? For he knoweth that I haue humbled my selfe: and whereas I haue done amisse, I haue acknowledged my faultes, yea euen my faultes, I confesse them, I accuse my selfe of them. Is not that ynough for him? What would he haue more? It seemeth then to vs, that God after a sort doth vs wrong, if hee strike vs still when wee haue once in a woorde or twaine confessed our selues to be sinners. Yea? But let vs looke at Iob: he had not onely confessed himselfe to be a man of no value, but also thought it [with his heart,] and had restreyned himselfe from replying any more, and was striken in feare with the glorie of god that had appeared vnto him: and yet notwithstanding he needed still too haue God to thunder at him, and to shewe himselfe terrible too him in a whirlewinde to make him more asfraid. If Iob hauing bin throwne downe after that sort, had neede too bee put in feare still, to the ende hee might knowe himselfe better, and feele his owne wretchednesse, & forget al rebelliousnesse: alas what had we need of? And yet notwithstanding ye shall see a number, which haue nothing in them but hipocrisie, and yea very shamelesnesse, who wring their mouth aside too say, It is true that I haue done amisse. And when they haue once said that word, as it were but in way of scorne & mockerie: if men accept them not in posthast as righteous, and handle them not verie nicely: it seemeth to the that they bee vnreasonably delt with. But (as I sayde afore) although wee haue felt our sinnes yea euen earnestly, and confessed them without feygning, and desired hartely that God should gouerne vs, and haue all dominion ouer vs: yet dooth it not followe but that there is some naughtinesse lurking still behinde, though it bee not knowne of. Truely (to our owne seeming) there is no pride in vs, bycause we see it not presently: but within a day or twoo it woulde bee seene if God remedied it not. And therefore let vs not thinke it straunge, that God should speake vnto vs in a whirlewinde as in a thunder, euen when he shal haue scourged vs till we can no more. Let vs not woonder though God continue to speake vnto vs so, for hee knoweth good cause why too doo it. And although we perceyue no faultes in vs, yet let vs not ceasse to condemne our selues. Yea and although there were none at all in vs [presently:] yet doth God know that we might fall into them to day or too morowe, yea euen euerie minute of an houre: and [therefore] God in chastizing vs, vseth a preferuatiue medicine. Wherefore let vs beare patiently the afflictions that God sendeth vs, assuring our selues that by that meanes he procureth and furthereth our welfare. But nowe let vs come to the matter that God handleth heere. First of all, hee defyeth Iob in saying, Giude vp thy loynes lyke a lustie stouie fellowe.

True it is, that in the Hebrewes there is but the one woorde man: howbee it the same importeth as muche as a valiant, hardie, stouie, or courageous man. His meening then is, Shewe all thy valiantnesse. And therein wee see that God speaketh not onely to the person of Iob: but also to all mankinde without exception: as if he should say, let men bring all the force that they can, let them put themselves in as good aray as they list, and let them come with all their furnitur: and what shall they gaine agaynst mee? This therefore is as a defyance that God maketh both to great and small to shewe that they cannot bring any power that shall be able to match his: and that is the first poynt. Howbeit it seemeth that this is verie commonly knowne: for there is no man but hee woulde bee adrad, to take vpon him to match himselfe with God. If it were demaunded of them whether it were their intent to mount so high, as to disposseesse God of his superioritie ouer them: they woulde aunswere, no I trowe: were we not worfe than made then? But yet notwithstanding, in carping agaynst him wee do it. If wee iustifie our selues and excuze our faultes, is it not a spying of God? Is it not a warring agaynst him? Therefore when we enter so into battell with him, wee beare our selues in hande, that wee bee able to make our part good, according as in verie deepe if a man bee not asfraid of Gods Maiestie, hee will presume to compassse the things that hee taketh in hande, and hee will not by anie meanes bee hilde backe. Then if our rashnesse do carie vs so farre away as to fight agaynst God: it is a token that wee imagine there is as great power in our selues as in him.

And therefore not without cause doth God defie vs heere euerie chone of vs both great and small, shewing that it is a madnesse in vs too bid him battell after that sort, and that wee shall neuer bring our enterpriise about. And let vs marke well, that when God sayeth, Giude vp thy loynes lyke a man: therein he declareth, that our presuming so vpon our owne strengthes, is to no purpose. What maketh vs so bolde as to presume to bee righteous, and to desire too seeme wise: but that wee surmize the thing that is not? If wee were not ouertaken with that soude opinion that there is some valour in vs: wee would neuer be so bolde as to incounter after that fashion with God. Therefore heere is expresse mention made of mens power and strength, to the end to shew that all that they weene themselves to haue, is but smoke: and that they may wel make themselves beleue that they be strong, but yet God knoweth and taketh them to be as they be. Herewithall he sheweth that he will haue no counterfeyt humilitie, as we see the woont of many men is, which do but lie when they pretend humilitie before God: that is to say, they confesse the thing with their mouth, which they thinke not with their hart. Among the Papists there is much preaching of humilitie: but yet for al their saying they be but wretched sinners, they ceasse not too haue a cleane contrarie meening: which is, that they deserue well before God, and that although they be sinners, yet they haue their satisfactions to redeeme themselves out. Ye see then that the Papists are swolne with pride like toades, and yet in the meane while pretend to condemne themselves alwayes as guiltie before God. Yea and what a number are there euen among vs, which are ful fraught after that maner with pride? To bee stouie, men cannot shew any signes of humilitie but in way of mockage, bycause they beleue themselves to be of some valour For this cause God declareth heere, that when wee haue throughly tryed all our owne strength, and well considered what is in vs: we shall finde in the ende that all is nothing, and that it is not for vs too arme and apparell our selues any more, to encounter agaynst him. Ye see then that the thing which wee haue to marke in effect, is that our Lord bereueth vs not of the things which we haue, to the ende too haue any aduantage of vs: for when wee haue well looked about vs, let vs but onely consider what maner of ones we be: and then shall we well see that there is neither power nor strength in vs wherewith too bende our selues agaynst him. Whereas mention is made of gyrding vp the loynes: it is spoken after the maner of that time, and of that countrey also, by cause men went in long garments: and when they did set forth eyther too battel, or to iourney, they gyrded vp their loynes to weed theselues the better. God the sheweth here, that when me haue done al that they can, in the end they shall be cōfounded. And therefore let vs not attempt to vaunt our selues, for it shall alwayes but argue the more foolish pride in vs. But let vs win our spures by condemning our selues, as which is the onely meane for vs to get fauour in Gods sight, according as it is sayde that we shall be quitte at his hand, if we learne to condemne our selues. But if through pride we fall to iustling agaynst his hand which is to strōg for vs: wee muste needes be crushed and broken too peeces vnder it, and feele that it is to heauie a load for vs to beare. Nowe it is sayde further, Wilt thou ouerthrowe my iudgements, and condemne me to iustifie thy selfe? If thou intend to do so, see [first] if thou beest able to leate downe all the proude folke in the worlde. Here God entereth into the case which he hath to pleade agaynst Iob: that is to wit, whether of them shall be more righteous: Not that Iobs intent was to blaspheme God so lewdly, as I haue sayde afore: for hee would rather haue dyed a hundred thousande times, than to haue conceyued so cursed a thought, as to purpose to condemne God. But yet for al that, whēsoeuer a man will iustifie himselfe, or hath that imagination running in his head: he must needs condemne God: and if he will needes mainteyne his owne case, he must needes ouerthrow the iudgement of God: This matter hath bene layd forth afore: neuertheless it must needs be brought to remembrance againe, and it is no superfluous repetiton which the holy Ghost setteth downe heere. Therefore let vs marke well, that whēsoeuer a man vndertaketh too mainteyne his owne case as rightfull: his meening is too condemne God, howbeit not directly. And although he intende it not of set purpose in his heart: yet dooth hee it [in effect.] Why so? For God cannot be iust, and a Iudge also, vntill wee be all damnable.

So long as men haue any righteousnesse in themselves, howe shall God be their Iudge? But hee condemneth vs all at once: nowe if there be righteousnesse in vs, then doth hee vs wrong. Therefore must all our owne righteousnesse be cast downe: that is too say, wee must acknowledge that there is nothing but iniquitie in vs, and that we haue not one sparke of vertue in vs that is allowable, but all is starke filthinesse, dung, and infection. Til we be come to that point, god cannot be Iudge of the worlde. And therefore whosoever will mainteyne his owne quarell, and make himselfe and othermen beleeue that hee is pure and innocent: ouerthroweth gods iudgement to the vttermost of his power, and therewithall condemneth him as cruell. It is sayde that too the ende that God may be righteous, all mouthes must be stopped, and all the worlde confesse themselves indaungered vnto God. These are Sainct Pauls wordes in the thirde too the Romanes. Sith it is so: on the contrarie part there shall be no more righteousnesse in God, but hee shall be viterly defeated of it, if wee on our side, haue our mouthes open, so as we may come too replie agaynst him, and too pleade our owne case. VVee see then that it is not for naught sayde heere vnto Iob, that hee ment too ouerthrowe Gods iudgement, and to condemne him in iustifying himselfe. Now if this befell vnto Iob, who had an angelicall holinesse, and did alwayes euen in the middes of his temptations protest himselfe willing too giue the glorie vnto God, yea and gaue it him without feyning: alas, what shall become of vs who are so frayle? Haue wee bene trayned long aforehande in the feare of God as he was? Haue we had practise of it? Haue wee giuen our selues too it? Haue wee such knowledge as was giuen vnto him? Haue we such humilitie? Alas we be farre wide. And yet notwithstanding we see hee overshotte himselfe, yea euen so farre as to condemne God by cleering himselfe. Then let vs consider what our murmurings are, when God layeth any affliction vpon vs. Howe go we too worke? Like woode beastes: our passions are so headie as it is pitie too see. And therefore it may rightly be layde too our charge that wee labour too ouerthrowe Gods iustice, too the intent he might no more be Iudge of the worlde, and that we condemne him in going about too mainteyne our owne righteousnesse. This ought too teache vs well too holde our selues short as oft as wee intende too pleade agaynst God, and thinke our selues too haue a good case. [It ought too make vs say thus in our heartes:] Alas who am I, that I shoulde fall too exalting of my selfe agaynst him that hath made and fashioned me? Or that I shoulde intende too rob him of his righteousnesse? It cannot be but that God hath all perfection of righteousnesse in himselfe. And therefore if I overshoot my selfe after that sort in struiuing agaynst him, must hee not confound me, and must not the same neede turne too my destruction? Lo what ought too holde vs in awe. Therefore whēsoeuer we happen too grudge agaynst God, and cannot receyue afflictions at his hande: let vs enter into our owne minde, and consider with our selues that it is all one as if we woulde bereeue God of his righteousnesse, and put him off from being anie more Iudge of the worlde. And seeing it is so: let vs keepe oure selues from suche blasphemies, and abhorre too come therevntoo: knowing that if wee be once entered intoo it, it is as a deepe Dungeon whereout of it will be harde for vs too get out againe. Then let vs not lift vp our selues any more agaynst God, but rather let vs in all cases humble our selues too him. Lo howe we ought too do. The residue shall be reserved till too morow morning.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs feele them better than wee haue hitherto done, and that we may learne more and more too glorifie him, yea euen in such wise as we may be viterly throwne down, knowing that there is nothing but all wickednesse and cursednesse in vs: and that in glorifying him, wee on our syde may haue our mouthes shette as in respect of presuming any thing, and not be caryed away by the example of the proude, which thinke themselves too beare as much rule as God, but learne too knowe what wee be, too the ende we may yeeld our selues wholly subiect too his Maiestie, that by that meanes hee may acknowledge vs and auowe vs for his people, and wee on our part consider howe muche wee be beyrde vntoo him. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely too vs, but also too all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the 4. 5. & 6. verses, and then vpon the text which is added beere.

7. Cast thine eye vpon the losue to pull them dovvne, destroy all the vicked, and rase them out of their places.
8. Hyde them in the dust, bind their faces in darkenesse.
9. And then vwill I say that thine ovne hande can saue thee.
19. Looke vpon Bemoth vvhom I made vwith thee, he vwill eate hay as an Oxe.
11. His strength is in his loynes, and his force is in the nauill of his bellie,

18. Beholde, hee drinkech vp Riuers, and is not astonished at it he hopeth that Iordan shall passethrough his throte.
19. A man vwill take him by the nose vwith a hooke, and strike him through.

Whe sawe yesterday, that when men chafe and frette in their aduersities, they go to law with God, intending to condemne him by iustifying themselves. For although a man speake it not with his mouth: yet in verie deede if hee go about to cleere himselfe, he condemneth God. And who shall have the better ende of the staffe? That is the cause why it is sayde, that when we haue layd our strength together, it shall be nothing, neyther shall we euer be able to match him that hath created vs, and holdeth all things in his hande. And now it is shewed vnto vs what we bee in respect of God, to the ende to make vs lay away all our crowing at him. And in good sooth, the loking of men to their own state, and their considering therewithal what the giorie and maiesie of God are, is the thing that should bring them vnto lowlinesse. For if men looke but singly vpon themselves, they will not leaue for that, to presume and to liit vp themselves still vnto some vaine trust. But when they liit vp their eies aloft, and beholde God, and afterward come downe to themselves: then are their combes quit cutte. Therefore it is sayd, Is thine arme like the arme of God? or rorest thou with such a voyce as he doth? Now if a man loke vpo his own arme, yea or vpon all the force of the world: what shall he find in comparison of the infinite power that beareth sway ouer all? True it is (as I haue sayd aliedie) that men are foolish ynough to think their own strength great, so long as they looke no further. But as soone as God sheweth himselfe, all other things must needs be as it were brought too nothing. And too the end that this thing may touch vs the better, Iob is willed to cloth himselfe with glorie, power, and maiesie. After the same maner speaketh the Scripture of God. And (as the thing it selfe sheweth) what else is the heauen than an imperiall or kingly robe of God, so as we be inforced too a reuerentnesse by the beholding of his creatures? For there is not any thing which serueth not to set forth the maiesie of God, to the end that we should honor it as it becommeth vs, and as it deserueth. But now let vs go seeke out the like apparellings: who shall be either the Tayler [to make them] or the imbroyderer [too decke them:] VVhere shall we finde such stuffe, that we may clothe our selues with the like glorie that God is clothed? Needes then must men bee out of their wittes, when they will bee so blinde and forgetfull, as too grudge at God, and to take part against him, and to prouoke him against themselves. Do they not deserue an horrible condemnation? Yee see then that the thing which we haue to marke heere in effect, is that whereas mention is made of Gods arme, we haue an exposition of it heere. As howe? Gods arme of it selfe is vuisible: not that hee hath anye armes or handes: but in speaking so, we meene his whole beeing. God then in himselfe is vnknowne vnto vs: howebeit, he sheweth himselfe in his woorkes, in somuch that the heauen (as I sayde) is his garment. Sometime it is termed his seate, but therewithall it is sayd also, that it is a visible shape of his maiesie. As much is too bee sayde of the Earth. Too bee short, both aboue and beneath God sheweth himselfe to vs, not in his beeing (as I said afore) but in the things which we are able to comprehend, in somuch that they are a witnesse too vs that there is an infinite Maiesie in God. And therefore let vs learne, that although we cannot attaine too mounte so highe as too know God: yet notwithstanding, forasmuch as he leauech vs not without witnesse, but sheweth himselfe to vs as much as is for our behoofe: let vs learne (I say) to behold him euen in his creatures, and to applie all things to this vse, namely that wee may perceyue how there is one God which hath made & doth gouerne all things. Moreover as touching that which is sayde of the roing voyce: True it is that men will crie out too lowde, according as wee see howe they whet their tongues to blasphemie and spyte God. It is sayde in the Psalme, that the wicked thinke it not ynough for them to be proude among men, and to accuse one falsely, and to defie another, and too worke treasons and wicked practises: but they also cast vp their groynes agaynst heauen, and assault God himselfe: and their pryde is so greate, that they dare bussele agaynst the Maiesie of God. Nowe then yee see that men rore, but yet will God make them holde their peace well ynough if hee liit. And after what maner? VVee haue seene heeretofore (according also as it is sayde in the Psalme) that the Thunder is Gods voyce.

Then sith the Thunder maketh the hilles too rore, so as the ayre is after a sort clouen asunder, the Earth quakech, Trees are torne vp, and the Rockes are shaken: I say when wee heare all this, whiche of vs shall presume anie more to speake agaynst God? For he hath a voyce that can welyough put vs to silence. Let vs crie alowde with full throte, yet will God be heard spite of our teeth, and ail our moylings must fall to the ground. Furthermore, although God thunder not after such a fashion, yet must he needes stoppe all our mouthes in shewing vs his will, and make all our outcries to be layd downe. He needeth not to come downe from heauen to doo it, nor to shewe himselfe heere in visibill shape: but like as hee made all things by his woorde, and all things are vphilde by the power therof: so will hee by the same cause vs to solter, not only in our tongues, but also in our wits and in all our powers. God then hath diuerse maners of speaking, where by he putteth men so to silence, that if they would carpe agaynst him, they shall haue no audience: and therefore let vs learne to holde our peace willingly, and too put in vre yesterdayes lesson: which was to lay our hand vpon our mouth (that is to say, to resist the diuelishnes of our pride, notwithstanding that naturally we be bold to aduance our selues agaynst God) and therewithall learne to giue glorie simplic vnto God, in confessing that there is nothing but wretchednes in our selues. VVhen we be once so contounded with our owne good will: Gods voice will not onely not be dreadful any more vnto vs: but also it wil cheere vs vp, and he wil opē our mouth that we may speake freely. VVherof commeth it that the faithfull can vaunt thēselues agaynst the diuell & despise death? VVherof cometh that boldnes of ours, that we cā cal vpō god as our father, & protest our selues to be his childrē? It is bicause we hild our mouthes shet when wee were condemned, and haue learned that we be nothing but vanitie. Therefore when we haue our mouthes shet after that sort, so as we chalēge not any thing to our selues, ne maintein our own quarel, but passe vnder condemnation, willingly: God of his infinit goodnesse giueth vs libertie to speake, not only among men, but also before him, & to call vpon him frankly, not doubting but that our voice is caried vp to his throne by his Angels, & there both heard and accepted. Ye see then that the things which they gaine that simplic hold thēir peace to graunt that all glorie belongeth vnto God, & to disable themselues vtterly: is that they haue their mouthes opened, as hath bin declared. But cōtrariwise, all they that will be talkatiue, and puffe vp themselues with their pride too maintaine their owne righteousnesse, must bee faine to feele how terrible Gods voyce is, and besides that, let them crie out as much as they list, yet will God spyte of their teeth breake them in peeces, and then shall all their crying ceasse and vanishe away. And howe shall that bee done? For he hath an ouerterrible voyce. Nowe after the speaking of this: there is also another reason alledged to humble men withall: which is, that God defyeth them, to wit, whether they can destroy the proude with a looke: or whether they can roote out all the wicked. If they can do that: then shewe they themselues, that they haue somewhat whereof to boast. But if they cannot: howe dare they commence any quarell agaynst God? Heere is still the same comparison that I haue touched: which is, that when we knowe what God is, and what his nature and office are: wee must fall to considering of our selues on the other side, too the ende the same may giue the greater glosse, both to Gods incomprehensible glorie, and also too the manifolde miseries that are in our selues. To bee short, we be done too vnderstande in this Text, that it belongeth too God too destroy the proude with his onely looke, and to roote out the wicked vtterly, insonuch that when they shall seeme too haue their full scope, and to be in their cheefe ruffe: then shall they be swept away cleane from the earth. God chalengeth this to himselfe. But nowe, can men doo the like? Haue wee a looke that is able to destroy our enemies, and specially to make cleane riddaunce of the wicked? Furthermore, let vs marke heere, that God speaketh not of an absolute or lawlesse power (as I haue sayde erst) but of a power that is matched with rightfuisnesse. And that is the cause why mention is made purposely of the proude and wicked sort.

Therefore let vs marke well these two things: namely, that God doth here magnifie himselfe, forasmuch as hee can with his onely looke ouerthrow and destroy the wicked: & yet notwithstanding spareth his creatures, and vttereth not his sayd power but vpon the proude and the wicked. God then is almightie: but yet howsoeuer the worlde go, he will haue his righteousnesse knowne to go with it, and he will haue men to confesse (according as the thing itselfe sheweth) that his so doing is to vanquish the affections and lustes of all suche as yeelde and submitte themselues to his maiestie: and that on the contrarie part, he thundreth vpon al such as presume to much vpon thēselues, and become proude, and vse replying and incountering with God, too make him their mortall enemie. And as we haue spoken of Gods voyce before, so must wee nowe speake of his looke or countenance. The faithful beseech God to shew thē his countenance: for that is the thing wherein consisteth all our ioy, happinesse, and welfare, according as it is sayde in the Psalme, Lord shew vs thy cōtenance and we shalbe safe. That is all our welfare, that is al our contentation, that is al that we can wish. VVhat is the thing then that is most to be desired of vs? It is Gods countenance: like as contrariwise when he turneth his backe vpon vs, and hydeth himselfe from vs, we must needes be as forlorne and out of heart: for there is not any thing wherein a man may finde rest: but onely in knowing that God hath a care of him. So long then as God vouchsafeth too haue his eye vpon vs, wee haue whereof to be glad, for we be sure that he will mainteine vs, and that wee shall not neede too bee afrayde of anie thing. But if God forget vs: we be at our wittes ende, and not without good cause. For we be as it were left vp to Satan to pray vpon, and an hundreth thousand deaths beset vs rounde about, & there is no remedie for vs. VVe see then that Gods looke is a thing to be wished for, specially if we come to him with all humblenesse, and with a desirousnesse and true intent to stick vnto him. But if we looke aloft as it is sayde in another place, and haue a foreheade of trasse, and be puffd vp to vaunt our selues before God, as it were in spite of him: then must he be faine to looke vpon vs with another maner of countenance, which shall not serue too cheere vs vp, but to destroy vs vtterly. Then needeth there no more but one looke of God too rid all men quite and cleane out of the worlde, when they cast a proude looke agaynst him. And therefore let vs learne that which is sayde heere, namely that Gods looking vpon the proude sort is to destroy them vtterly. And why? Bicause that they haue had a wicked looke. VVherefore let vs cast downe our heades, and go vnto God to do him obeyfance: & therewithall let vs pray him to lighten our eyes, that we may seeke him as our father, and he looke vpon vs in such wise, as we may haue thereby all perfectnesse of ioy and true contentation to rest our selues vpon. But by the way it is shewed vs in this streyne, that (as the Scripture speaketh ostentymes) it is Gods office too ouerthrow such as aduance themselues, according as it is sayde that who soeuer exalteth himself shall be brought lowe.

Then let vs marke well, that God is at deadly & vnreconciliable fode with al such as kepe not within their boundes ne acknowledge their own slenderesse by humbling the felues, but will needs make themselves greate men, so as God must be fayne to incounter them, and they two must iustle together. VVere this throughly well considered, wee should not neede so many sermons to bring vs to loweli-nesse. For is it not a horrible thing, that woormes of the earth should come of set purpose too fight against God?

 Bur yet so it is, that all such as presume of themselves, all such as think they be of anye valour at al, all such as beare themselves in had that they be eyther wyse, or vertuouse or ryghtuouse: al such (say I) do make warre against God.
 Though they speake it not with their mouth: yet is it all one: for so it is in verie deede: and therefore God telleth vs that a man cannot iustifie him self, but that in so doing he assalteth heauen. Now then, if we were throughly persuaded of this doctrine, that all proud folkes are Gods enemies and prouoke his wrath against themselves: wee would walk in another maner of meeldnesse and simplicitiethan we do. But what? It seemeth to vs that God ought to shrink away to make vs room. Marke I pray you how men besotte themselves. Neuertheless if wee would nowadays herken to this doctrine to frame our felues thereafter: wee should at length perceiue by experience, that it is not for nought sayd, That the countenance of the Lord is vpon the lofty ones, too roote them out of the world, and that none but the meeke ones haue the euerlasting heritage. Howbeit to the intent we may profit the more by this lesson, let vs marke well who be the proud ones. For the pryde is not alwayes knowne vnto men too condemne it: but whosoever trusteth in his owne strength, whosoever presumeth vpon his owne ryghtuoussenesse or wisdom, whosoever setteth himselfe in his owne greatnesse and credit, and (to bee short) whosoever [wilfully] ouerpasseth his bounds [in any thing:] the same is a proud bodie before God. And how is it that men ouerpasse their bounds? Euen when they thinke themselues to haue any spark of goodnesse of themselves. For vntill such tyme as we bee (as yee would say) quyte and cleane emptied: there is nother meeknesse nor meeldnesse in vs. Furthermore when God shall haue giuen vs any grace and bestowed the giftes of his holie spirit vpon vs: let not the same make vs to set vp our bristles against him to offend him. If we haue a good and sharp vnder-standing, the same commeth not of our owne moother wit: and therefore we must not take occasion to exalt our felues for it: for we bee so much the more bound vnto God. Again, let him that is greatest, indeuer to serue the smallest, and let him not despyze those whom God hath inhonored, by setting them in like degree with him. Then if we imagin that there is any thing in vs, or if we be puffed vp with pryde to disdeyne our neyghbours by reason of Gods graciousse gifts: it is a presumptuousnesse that offendeth God and prouoketh his vengeance against vs.
 VVhat is to be doone then? If wee will not haue God against vs, let vs learn to distrust the things that are in ourselues, and not conceyue any presumption that may lift vs vp, but (to be short at one woord) let vs say, wee be nothing. Again, if God aduance vs in honor aboute other men, or if he indue vs with any vertues: let vs acknowledge the same to come of him. And furthermore let vs be louing, and forbear to do our neyghbours wrong, or to despyse such as are Gods children as well as wee, or at leastwise are created of one selfsame likenesse and nature with vs. Thus much concerning that it is sayd, that it is Gods office too beste downe the pride of all men with his looke.
 And he addeth therunto the wicked, to shewe that he is an enemy to all wicked folk in generall. Howbeit foras-much as it can hardly bee auoyded that pryde and lofti-nesse should not beare sway, forasmuch as the wicked sort rushe forth into all euill, as who bee despyers of God: therefore heere is a more expresse and long discourse of these lofty ones, which forget themselves and beleeue, that they bee able to woork woonders of their owne power. For if men were not so proud as to despyse God: surely they would hold themselves still, and not giue the brydle so to their lustes. Needes therefore must pryde carye vs away, when we vse violence and outrage towards our neyghbours, for when we deuour one, and fleece another of all his goods, and shewe all the spyte and malice that we can: it is a token that there is no feare of God in vs, and that we know not so much as that we be mortall men. For he that knowes how he hath but as a iourney to passe through this world, and that his lyfe is brittle and transitorie: will certainly brydle himselfe, if it were but euen in that only one respect. And therefore needs must men be bewitched, and vterly ignorant what themselves are, and what their state is, when they ouershoote themselves. And verely that is the cause why the Prophet Abacuck (when he sayeth that the righteous man shall liue by faith) auoucheth on the contrarie part, that all loftinesse shall bee beaten downe. VVhat meeneth he by all loftinesse? he meeneth all sturdinesse against God, and all skornefulnesse against men.

Ab. 2. a. 4. 5

Howbeit hee vseth the woord loftinesse, bycause men forget themselves, and are as it were out of their wits, when they ouerhoote themselves after that sort to chafe against their God. But now it might bee demaunded, whether God doeth roote out al proud folks out of the world. For by all lykelyhod he rather spareth them, and laxeth the reynes of the brydle looce in their necke, so as they triumph at their pleasure. Howbeit let vs marke, that it is not for vs to appoynt the terme, too say that at such an hoere God shall confound and destroy all proud folke: he will doo it, howbeit in his due season. And therefore although the proud folke do beare sway, and God seeme to let them doo what they list, yea and that they laugh [in their sleeues] as though there were no power to repress them: yet hath he still his office which belongeth vnto him, namely of rooting out the proud and wicked sort with his only looke. Yea, but (as it is sayd in the scripture) sometimes he hideth himselfe from his faithfull ones, not that he euer forgetteth them or is not carefull of them: but he sheweth not himself in outward working, to the intent to try our fayth and pa-cience. It may seeme to vs that God hath forgotten vs when we be in any danger, and specially when wee feele the blowes, and finally when we see death present, and in the meane whyle we perceiue not that God myndeth to reache vs his hand, and yet euen then we crye vnto him, Alas, Lord where art thou? why halte thou forgotten mee? Such complaints make we according to our fleshy vnderstanding: and so God seemeth not too looke vpon the proud, when he suffereth them to cast forth their poyson after that fashion, and beareth with the numbers of outrages and enormities which they commit. Yea, but forasmuch as their tyme is not yet come, let vs tarry till God open his eyes vpon them, and then shall they be destroyed. Then if they be borne withall for a tyme, and God winke at them: let vs assure our felues that their tyme is not yet come wherein he will looke vpon them in his wrath, to roote them out, as I sayde afore. Now this lesson ought to serue to double vse. For the faithful ought to take comfort at it: and although God deliuer them not from the tyrannie of the wicked at the first brunt, yet haue they cause to rest vpon him. VVhy? For he hath nor giuen ouer his office, no though they exalt themselves against

Bbbv.

gainst him: but their time is not yet come. He shall feedeth them as men do Oxen: and like as men knowe when it is tyme to kill the Ox, so doeth God knowe well ynough the day of the destruction of the proud and of all the wicked. Ye see then how first of all the faythfull ought to be patient, when they see God delay the rooting out of the proud and wicked sort, and therefore that they must hold themselves quiet till the thing bee doone. In the meane whyle let the proud sort bethinke themselves, and let vs be afrayd to flatter our selues. If God spare vs, let vs not thinke that wee be scaped out of his hand: nother let vs gather the more boldnesse to attempt one thing or other, vnder colour that he beareth with vs and winketh at vs. And why? for in the end he will looke vpon vs, and then shall our faults be bewrayed to our greater confuzion.

So then, let vs marke well that although men perceiue not Gods iudgements in eyesight day by day, yet must they not therefore cease to walke in feare and carefulnesse, but the rather bee bridled by the word of God. For herein also doeth our sayth shewe it self: namely if in the midds of our aduersities we can fasten our eyes vpon Gods graciousse promises. And on the other side when the state of the wicked seemeth too bee better than the state of the godly, let vs not cease to hope continually for the euerlasting lyfe, although it bee not to bee seene. Why so? Bycause God hath promised it, and whatsoever cometh out of his mouth cannot bee deceyuable. Ye see then after what sort wee ought to put this lesson in vre. But now let vs see if wee can doo the like thing as is reported here of God. Can wee destroy the wicked with one only looke? Can wee rid the earth of all proud folke, as God can doo when he thinketh good? Alas, what are wee? So then, let vs learne to giue glorie to him which sheweth himselfe to be iudge of the world, which hath all power in his hand, and which vseth such order and vprightnesse in it, as no fault can bee found therewith. And although things seeme oftentimes troublesome and out of order to vs, yet let vs not cease too looke still to the power that God sheweth therewithall, and to his goodnesse: And then if wee haue cleere eyes, surely wee shall neuer misse to espye and discerne that God governeth the world rightfully. Ye see then that the way to put this lesson in practyze, is that when wee knowe God in himselfe as he is, and that he hath vitered himselfe by effect and experience: wee must come downe to ourselues, and examin our owne weaknesse, that wee may humble our selues, and not attempt to quarrell with God who hath the perfection of all rightuousnesse and power in him. This in effect is that which wee haue too beare in mynd. And specially let vs wey well the saying that is added for a conclusion: that is to wit, that if a man had that [power] he were able too saue himselfe by his owne hand, as if it were sayd, that God confesseth, that then a man myght passe him. Therefore when any of vs hath the power that is spoken of here: he needeth not to resort any more too heaven for refuge, nor too call vpon God to saue him: for euery man myght saue himselfe. The saying of this, is to bring men to knowe that they haue neede of another bodie to saue them than themselves, and that they haue not their lyfe in their owne hand, nother can by any meanes warrant it. Let vs consider then that we liue not of our selues, nor haue any meane to maynteyne ourselues, yea and that although the whole world fauored vs, so as it myght seeme that wee had all things at will: yet are we nothing, but must bee fayne to depend wholly vpon our God, and be saued by his hand. Let that serue for one poynt. Now at the first sight, it seemeth too bee a meely common thing, and men are taught by nature to resort vnto God: but yet for all that, see yee not the drunkennesse or rather madnesse which caryeth vs away, so as euery of vs is of opinion that he can saue and warrant himselfe? And who hath told vs that, but Satan, who hath put this faise dotage into our brayne that there is some power, some rightuousnesse, and some wisdom in ourselues? So then, let vs marke, that Gods vpbroyding of vs that none of vs can be saued by his owne hand, is no common schoole poynt. For it serueth to shewe vs that wee must distrust ourselues and all our owne powers, and be so viterly disabled, as wee may haue no rest, stay, nor contentment but only in him. What is it then that saueth vs? It is the hand of God. And wherfore? Euen for his owne mere and free goodnesse only. For if man had any thing of himselfe, God would not enuye him for it, but would rather say, verie well, let vs part stakes, this is mine, and that is thine. For hath God anie neede to borrowe of vs? Hath he neede to catch any of our due and ryght from vs, to furnish out himselfe withall? No no: let vs not imagin any such conceyts, but let vs confesse that there is not so much as one droppe of safetie in ourselues, but that we must run simply vnto our God.

This is it which wee haue too marke in this streyne. Neuerthelesse it is true that sometymes the wicked shall bee destroyed and throwne downe by mannes hand, for to that end is iustice ordeyned: but can they that set in the seate of iustice and hold the swoord in their hand, do any thing of themselves? Is it not bycause God hath appoynted them, and bycause it pleaseth him to bee serued by them as by instruments? So then, it is not meete that the meanes which God hath ordeyned in this world to set out his maiestie, power, and rightuousnesse, should deface him and hinder the knowing of his glorie: but rather that they should giue him the greater bryghtnesse. Furthermore wee see how he woorketh when it pleaseth him, without the putting to of mannes hand. In conclusion it is told vs heere, that God hath created beastes, bothe in the Sea and on the land, euen terrible beastes which are able to make vs to quake, to the intent we should bee no more so saucie as to come to set ourselues against him.

And heere is expresse mention made of Bekemoth. Now the woord Bekema signifieth simply a Beaste, and vnder that name are Oxen and all other beastes comprehended. Heere it is sayd in the plurall number, looke vpon Bekemoth whom I created with thee: and although the woord Bekemoth bee the plurall number in the Hebrew: yet is it spoken but as of one beast and no mo. Howbeit forasmuch as God ment too betoken heere one sort of beastes: that is the cause why he setteth Bekemoth in the plurall number. Neuerthelesse it cannot bee coniectured what kynd of beast it is that he speaketh of, except it bee an Elephant, by reason of the howgenesse of that beastes bodie. But it is euident that he speaketh not heere nother of Oxen, nor of Horses, nor of any such other beastes: for it is sayd, looke mee vpon Bekemoth which eateth hay as an Ox. God then maketh an expresse difference betweene that kynd of beast wherof he speaketh and Oxen. And therefore without troubling ourselues too much [for the matter,] let vs marke that God in this text hath chozen a kynd of beast more woonderfull to vs than any other. The same is the Elephant, which hath so strong a bodie, that it is sayd of him, that his [greate] bones are as brasse, and his little bones or gristles (as men terme them) are as lannes of yron. For it is an incredible thing to vs which are not acquaynted with it, but

but they which see those beasts ought to be afrayd at the only looke of them: the bignesse of them is so howge, as they seeme to bee things made by arte [and not by nature.] But if wee were wyze ynough, we needed not too go out of ourselues to behold the maiestie of God: howbeit men must bee sent to the beasts bycause of their vnthankfulnesse, in that they knowe not God as he sheweth himself vnto them. Therefore by reason of our blockishnesse and vnthankfulnesse, we haue neede of such mirrors as are set before vs here in respect of the Elephants and other like beastes. Seing then that wee perceyue that God hath created those bealts of such bignesse and shape although wee had none other warrant of his power: yet haue wee good cause too hold downe our heads and too woorschip his hygh maiestie which sheweth it selfe in those wilde bealts. And it is purposely sayd, that these Elephants were created with vs, to the intent too shewe vs, how God hath made the difference [betweene things] as he himself listeth, and that he hath set a wonderfull order in the world, so as men must needes bee rauished besides themselues when they thinke thereon, at leastwise if they haue the discretion too marke the things that are wyde open before them. Behold, a man that hath but a little bodie, is neuerthelesse appoynted to bee a Lord and mayster in this world. VVherfore are all things created, but only for our vse? And wee see an Elephant is so strong, that he is able to strike downe a greate sort of men with one stroke of his foore. Then sith wee see such things, and that there is such order in the world: it doth well shewe vnto vs, that God hath doone vs greate fauour in making vs so little as wee bee, and yet notwithstanding that he hath shewed himself in the brute beastes also. In somuch that if the knowledge of the things that be put into ourselues be not ynough for vs: if we looke vpon the beastes, there wee shall finde things too astonishe our witts. And therewithall also let vs marke wel, that if gouerning should go by greatnesse, then myght the Elephants well reygne ouer vs. But what? wee see they suffer themselues too bee ruled by men like little colts in a stable. Also wee see on the other side, that God hath left them destitute of manie things. Behold what howge bodies they be, and yet notwithstanding they cannot bow their legges, but are fayre too stand continually: for if an Elephant bee downe vpon the ground, liec cannot get vp again.

Now when we see such a force on the one side, and such a default on the other, (that is too witte, that those bealts cannot bow their legges, but are fayre too sleepe standing, in somuch that if an Elephant bee layd flat, he cannot ryze againe alone, but a man were as good too rayze vp a whole house): ought not such a sight too make vs to glorifie Gods goodnesse? For wherof is it long, that the Elephants deuour vs not all? They eate hay as Oxen doo. Seing then that these beastes which were able too excute such crueltie as to roote out all mankynde out of the world, doo feede of grasie in the mountaynes, and hyde themselues vnder the shadowes of trees, and yet notwithstanding breake not out intoo such rage as they myght doo by reason of their howgenesse: wherof cometh it but of that it was Gods will too tame them, too the end to giue vs roome to dwell on here beneath? Again, wheras wee bee hemmed in on all sides with so manie sortes of other wyld beastes, could wee continue vndeoured one day in this world, if God restreyned not their rage with a secret brydle? Therefore let vs learne to looke so vpon Gods woorks, as we may worthily magnifie his power, goodnesse, wisdome, and rightuouesnesse, by humbling yea and cuen by vrtter disabling of our selues, according as in deede we be nothing.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may all learne too walke in his feare, and to put vs wholly intoo his hands without presuming any thing vpon our selues, but rather acknowledging our weaknesse and infirmitie, and beseeching him to help vs: and that forasmuch as wee should be ouercome a hundred thousand tymes a day, if he were not our defence, sheeld, and safegard: it may please him to gard vs from all our spirituall foes, and too deliuer vs from all our temptations by giuing vs power to outstand them, till he haue taken vs out of this earthly lyfe, which is a continuall battell. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also too all people and nacions of the earth, &c.

4. VVho

4. VVho vill open the forepart of his garment, or vvho shall come to him vvith his double brydle?
5. VVho shall open the gates of his face, and the rovves of his so terrible teethe?
6. His scales are as strong sheelds, fast set as the print of a seale.
7. One of them is clozed to another, so as the vvind cannot ger through them.
8. They be shet one vvithin another, they cleave togetlier, and cannot be fund red.
9. His neezing is like the shyning of light, and his eyes are as the dawning of the day.
10. Out of his mouth go lampes, and sparkes of fire leape out.
11. Smoke steameth out of his noze as out of a seething potte or cauldron.
12. His breath fetterh coles on fire, and flame flassheth out of his mouth.
13. In his necke dvvelleth strength, and labour is reiected before his face.
14. The parts of his flesh are knit together, euery one is substantiall in it self vvithout fleeing.
15. His hart is substantiall as stone, and hard as a neather milstone.
16. The mightie are afrayd vvhen he riseth vp, and the vvaucs are troubled.
17. VVhen the svword toucheth him he vvil not stay [for it] nor for the speare, nor for the dart, nor for the haubergeon.
18. For he regardeth yron as strauve, and brasse as rotten vvood.
19. The Archer cannot put him too flight, the stones of the sling are returned into stubble vntoo him.
20. He esteemeth darts as much as stubble, and laugheth at the shaking of the speare.
21. Vnder him are sharp stones, and he spreadeth out sharppoynted things vpon the myre.
22. He maketh the deepe too see the like a cauldron, and maketh the sea like a pot of oynment.
23. He maketh a path too shyne after him, and esteemeth the deepe as an old thing.
24. His dominion is not vpon the earth, and he is made to bee afrayd of nothing.
25. He beholdeth all hygh things: He is king ouer all the children of pryde.

Shewed you yesterday, that after God had set foorth many liuing things of the earth too witnesse his power and glorie, heere he bringeth in, on the one side the Elephants, & on the other side the whales. And it serueth to conclude this matter, that although men see not Gods being, yet ought they to perceyue what his maiestie is, only by beholding the beastes which he hath created, and specially such as are able to fray vs with their looke, to the end that God might be glorified so much the more at our hand. Again, wee sawe yesterday what was discoursed concerning the Elephant, which is a terrible houghe beast, and ynough too scare vs out of our wittes. Now then if we tremble at the sight of a beast: should we play the bold fellows against God, to contend with him when he chastizeth vs, and to stomacke the matter when he intendeth to humble vs? Should we be such fooles as to murmure at his iustice, or to gaynsay him in any thing, or to desire to deface or diminish his soueraintie? So then, seing that the beastes do make men to tremble, let the consider their owne madnesse in matching themselues with God. Howbeit before I go any further, wheras heere is so long a discourse vpon the sayd kind of beastes of the land which I sayd was an Elephant, (albeit that it be named heere by the generall terme of Behemoth) and also vpon the Leuiathan: we haue to marke therevpon, how men haue bene of opinion, that by an allegorie the diuel is spoken of heere, rather than eyther the Elephant or the VVhale, and that they haue gone about to proue that fantasticall denyce of theirs by this, that in the end it is sayd, that the sayd whale is the king of the children of pryde. But in speaking of the other kynd of beaste that I touched yesterday, it was sayd, that God maketh them to eat bay and grasse like Oxen. VVe see then that his intent is to shewe vs Gods myghtie power in the things that are to be seene, and not to descrybe the diuell to vs. As touching the woord Leuiathan, through the whole scripture it signifieth a VVhale: and we see it to be so in the hundred and fourth Psalm, where the Hebrew woord Leuiathan is translated a VVhale: and it is well ynough knowne, that there the Prophet speaketh of Gods wonders which men see in the sea, yea much more than vpon the land. There is one peremptorie reason to shewe vs that we must take this text simply as it standeth, and not shiftingly. For we haue seene heretofore how it was gods intent to teache men after a grosse and homely maner, according to their owne small capacitie, and that his dooing therof is to the end that his mightie power should be the better proued vnto them. Moreouer he ment also to vpbraid them with their follie, in that they dare set themselves against him, forsomuch as the verie beastes are able to reprove them. VVherfore let vs marke well, that heere God giueth men a lesson, therby to skorne their pryde, in sending them to the brute beasts: but this could take no place, if it were spoken of the diuell. And wheras his will was, that the whale should be the king of all the children of pryde: it is not for that the beast hath any such affection. But rather it is sayd to compare men with the VVhale, as if our Lord should say, It is true that men will lift vp their sheelds verie hygh, and fetch leapes about the cloudes: but when they haue gathered all the force they can, and presumed to the vntermost, what is it in comparison of the VVhale? VVhen a man hath vaunted himself to the vntermoste, let him but come to incounter with a whale, and the whale shall haue more cause to vaunt himself than he. For if a man compare him with a house or a Tower, if a man compare him with artillerie, or if a man compare him with a mountayne: he shall finde all these qualities in him, yea he shall finde such terrible force in him, as is able too turne vp shippes vpside downe. And where is the man that can approche vnto such strength? VVe see then that God hath shewed expressly, that wee shall always be overcome by the VVhales, and that therefore our pride is to fond: and specially that when wee become so bold as to lift vp ourselues against him, and too go about to plucke from him the things that belong too him, and to robbe him of his ryghtuousnesse: in so doing wee must needs bee put to shame, yea euen without Gods comming downe from heauen, and without any shewing of his maiestie: for the verie beasts are inough to maynteyne his honour. Neuerthelesse truly, by conueying the discourse from the one to the other, a man myght wel vse this similitude of the whales and the Elephants, to make men perceyue how greatly the power of the diuell ought to fray vs, seing he is termed the prince of the aire and of the world. Not without cause doth God giue him that title: for it is to the intent that seing we be so weake of our selues, and haue so myghtie and strong an enimie, we should walke in feare. Therefore we may well from the one to the other take a good warning, that if we wil not be subiect to God, we must be bondslaves to Satan, and he shall ouermayster vs well ynough, so as we shall haue no strength to withstand him. As for example, wheras the creation of the world is spoken of, Moyses treateth not of the Angels: for he ment to be a teacher to the little and vnlearned ones, and therefore he setteth down but only those things which are seene with our eyes. But yet for all that, the present lyght which is perceyued, must leade vs yet further: that is to wit, to the espying out of the lyght of the heauenly kingdome by fayth, though it bee hidden from vs presently. And forasmuch as we see Gods maiestie shyneth foorth cuery where: let vs vnderstand that there is a farre greater fulnesse and perfectiō of lyght in the Angels, and in all things that concerne the heauenly lyfe. Yee see then that it is a good conueyance, when we goe so by degrees from the least things too the greatest, and from the lowest to the hyghest. But yet howsoeuer we deale, wee must hold vs still too the simplicite of the text: for it is an euill thing to dally with the holic scripture by transforming of it intoo allegories, nother ought allegories to be drawn but out of a naturall meaning as we see that Saint Paule doth in the Epistle to the Galathians and in other places. Therefore let vs come backe againe to the matter we began with. God doth heere make his triumphes bothe by sea and land, to the end that men should knowe, that they shall alwayes be confounded in their pryde, if they set themselves against him. And after he had spoken of manie other sorts of beastes, heere he setteth the Elephants before vs, which are so terrible, as they must needes amaze vs: for in the howge bignesse of their bodies, we behold miracles without number. VVee see on the one side how they surmount vs; and we see on the other side how god hath not giuē thē the things which he hath voutsafed to giue vs, yea euen of his owne free goodnesse. And therefore let vs learne that we shall gayne nothing by exaiting ourselues: for we shal be surmounted by the brute beastes, when we haue done all that we cā & yet notwithstanding our vnthankfulnesse bewrayeth it self, in that we yeeld to slender and nigardly a recōpence vnto God, for the benefits that he hath bestowed vpon vs. For of whom is it long that we be not brute beasts? As it was said yesterday, was not the Elephāt created with vs? Are we made of any preciouer mould than he? Is there any qualitie in vs, why we should be more excellent? No: there is nothing that maketh a difference betwixt vs, but God. Now we see that the Elephants which haue so terrible a force, are notwithstanding not so hold as to bend themselves against vs: they go and hyde themselves in moyst places, and cannot haue any couert: that is commodiouse for them. Seing it is so: we see on the one side how greatly we bee bounde vnto God, and therefore wee ought of good reason to acknowledge our owne weaknesse when mention is made of the brute beastes whom we durst not come neere, no nor so much as looke vpon them. How should we do then, if God restreyned them nor? Now after this, God leadeth vs too the sea, and sheweth vs that there also we haue wherewith to pull vs downe: nor only by reason of the greate multitude and diuertie of fishes that are there to be seene, insomuch that euen the heathen and misbeleuing wryters were constrained to say, that wheras men sawe manie miracles vpon the land, the sea was the true storehouse of the woonders of nature: but also euē in respect of anye one sorte or kynd of thē: as for exāple let vs take but only the whale, and is it not an incredible thing to see so hougē a creature, liuing in the water? who were able to fashio the mould offo great howge, & strong a beast as that is seene to be? For by lykelyhod it should come foorth to pray vpon the land, and there shuld not be foode ynough to suffize him in the water. Also we see what is in his bones, or in his backebones, which are more than bones: they bee (to see to) yron and Steele: and it is a woonder to looke vpon his flesshinesse. Therefore a man had neede of greate riches that shuld interteyne such a bodye. And who can sted his turne but only God? For he hath appoynted the world to keepe him, and therefore hath he provided all things for him. VVherfore, sith wee see this, let vs learne to submit ourselues to him, or else there shall neede none other iudges to condemne vs than the brute beastes, nother shall there neede any other euidence too cast vs, than the creatures that are disperfed through the world, as well in the waters as vpon the land. If we beare away this singlenesse, it will stand vs in better sted than all the curiouse expositions that can be deuysed, as when these Allegorimakers serched out his ribbes and backebone, and treated also of his skin and of this and that, and to be short, there was not that pece of him, wherin they found not some toy or other. But this is as it were to make the holic scriptūre a noze of wax, by transforming it from the naturall sense. VVherfore if wee beare away but this one foresayd article, that there shall neede none other witness to cast vs before God, thā the things that are shewed in the brute beastes: shall wee not haue profited greatly? Howbeit before we come to that condemning in Gods sight, we haue a good instruction now giuen vs to receyue. And first of all, to the intent wee may not be ashamed to be taught by the VVhales and Elephants: let vs vnderstand that Gods sending of vs too them, is euen bycause of our vntowardnesse, for that wee bee so spytefull, so sroward, and of so wicked and crabbed a nature, as we cannē be brought to reason. Therefore is God fayne to shame vs by sending vs to the beastes. Also there is such wilfulltubbornesse in vs, that whatsoever is told vs, though our wants be layd opē to our faces: yet do we euer seeke some startingholes, & shun Gods iudgement to the vtermoost of our power. God then must be fayne to breake this hardenesse as it were by mayne force, and to make vs to bow vnder him. And therefore if the Elephants should treade vs vnder their feete, and trāple vpon the bellies of vs: we be well woorthie of it seing wee wil not glorie him that hath made them as well as vs, nor yeld him his due honour. Howbeit let vs take it in good worth that God sendeth vs to thē to schole, to learne to humble ourselues. Befids this, we deserue to be swallowed vp of the VVhales and too haue the sea to ouerwhelme the whole earth, and so it should do (as hath bin declared heretofore) were it not that God of his graciousse goodnesse voutsafeth to lodge vs heere, and to maynteyne vs notwithstanding that we deserue to be drowned euery n inute of an houre. VVherfore let vs be contented that God giueth vs instruction bothe vpon sea and land, and that all things are ordeyned to turne to our welfare, according ding also as they shall, if we turne them not away by our owne rechelesnesse, ignorance, and naughtinesse. Thus yee see the cheef poynt which wee haue to marke in this text. Howbeit before I vnfold this description peece by peece, let vs mark what is sayd here: for God declareth to what intent he speaketh so of the VVhale. VVho is he (sayeth God) that can stand in my presence? Seing that no man da-reth waken vp a whale, no nor come neere him (sayth he): who is he that da-reth maynteyne himself before mee? This is the comparison that I haue touched a readye: that is to witte, that if the creatures (which being nothing of themselves are but a small portion of the power that is in God,) do astonish vs: what will his infinite maiestie doo? VVhat is all the whole world in respect of God? It is sayd that he holdeth bothe heauen and earth and that he needeth not to stretch out his armes too embrace that greete circuit, but it is al of it that cloce in his hand. Now a whale (how houge a masse of fleshe so euer he haue, yea and though he can do neuer so much in the sea) is but a verie small peece of it. So then besides the infinite number of other fishes greete and small that are in the sea, (all which God hath made and gouerneth,) the whales also are comprised there. Seing then that God in his glorie comprehendeth all things, yea and comprehendeth them as nothing: ought not wee to be sore astonished before him, when a fillie beast feareth vs, as is shewed here? And for confirmation therof it is sayd, that all things are his. For if a man should say, it is true that a whale is a terrible thing, but God is not so: Yea, would God answer? and what is a whale but as a dart that I shall cast, or as a stone out of a sling? Then it behoueth vs to knowe, that God hath printed some marke of his power in whales and other greete beasts, to the intent that men should knowe how that the same proceedeth from his hand, and that he serueth his turne with them, to apply them to such vse as he listeth, infomuch that a whale ought in our sight to be considered as if God should cast a stone out of a sling, and the ayre rang of it, so as we were astonished at it. Seing then that all things are so in his hand: we haue good cause to tremble before him. Neuerthelesse our Lord meeneth not too driue vs from him: but yet must wee needs bee abashed at the first brunt, to the end we may yeeld him his deserued reuerence. So then, he calleth and allureth vs to him, to the intent that we should find all ioyfulnesse there, but yet can we not come at him, till we haue bene vtterly beaten downe.

Therefore there must first goe care before, to daunt vs in such wise as wee may not be able to stand, but may find ourselues vtterly vndone and cast away, if God should vtter his power against vs. It behoueth vs to knowe this: and then shall all our feare be asswaged, that is to wit if we hold him for our father. But yet for all that we shall neuer yeeld him his due reuerence, except he daunt vs and tame vs in such wise, as wee knowe not where to become. That is the thing which we haue to remember in this streyne. And so let vs followe this generall lesson, that it is vnpossible for a mortall creature too stand before God. And how should he stand? For first and foremost he must needs cast vs flat to the ground, and afterward set vs vp againe. But if we will hold our owne, and fall to playing the lustie tall laddes: we shall neuer bring our purpose to passe, but it shall rather be the cause of our decay. The woord stand then betokeneth that a man can neuer haue a good case in maynteyning himself to be ryghteous and wise, but must first of all be vtterly disabled, and acknowledge that God hath all myght, power, and ryghteousnesse in him, and that we cannot be but ouerwhelmed in our owne nature. True it is that God not only would that we should stand, but also listeth vs vp about the heauens: not in respect of our bodies as yet, but by rayfing vs vp when we be beaten downe.

Then let vs marke well that there is greete oddes betweene mennes desyring to be somewhat of themselves, by taking vpon them to bee wise and ryghteous, and betweene vtter disclayming of all goodnesse, and therevpon to resort vnto God, and to pray him to set them in good state forsomuch as they be vtterly bereft of all glorie and haue nothing in themselves but shamefull confusion. VVhen we haue learned this lesson, that no man is able to stand before God, so as we acknowledge that there is nothing in vs but filthinesse and dung, that all the gay likelihood which wee weene ourselues to haue, is nothing but vanitie, and that all the opinions which we haue conceyued do but beguile vs, when we be once thoroughly perswaded of this, then wil God lift vs vp, and we wil think ourselues so beholden too him and to his mere grace for all things, that we wil glorifie him as our father, and as the giuer of them vnto vs, yea euen without being bound ther-vnto, and without finding anie desert in vs. And it is a generall principle of our faith, that all flesh must keepe silence before him, and that it behoueth vs to vnderstand, that if there be any iustinesse in vs, it withcreth away out of had: there needeth but one blast vpon vs, and by and by we fade away without hartinesse or strenght, and al our ryghteousnesse is but cursednesse. I pray you mark this generall principle of our faith, to the end that the grace which is manifested to vs in our Lord Iesus Christ, may be knowne, & we haue our recourse ther-vnto, not looking eyther for the beginning or for the full perfecting of our saluation elsewhere, than in Gods voutfasing to work the same freely: that is to say, without any bynding of him too it on our side, or without bringing any thing of our owne in that behalfe. And that is the cause why he expressly addeth, who wil preuent mee, and I will satisfie him? As if he should say, that if wee will pleade against him, he must needs be in our det, and bee bound vnto vs, and we must haue some ryght and interest. And where shall the man bee found that may preferre his tide vnto God, to say that God is bound vnto him? But wee see cleane contrariwise, that wee hold all things of him, and that he on his side oweth nothing vnto vs: and yet notwithstanding we be so wilful as we wil needs contend with him.

Now let this be extended generally to teache vs that wee must humble our selues vnder Gods myghtie hand, confessing him to be bothe wise, ryghteous, and mightie in all things that he doeth, as Saint Paule sheweth in the eleuenth to the Romaynes. For although he alledge not that text as taken out of the holie scripture: yet doeth he reherse the same doctrine. And to what purpose? There he treateth of Gods free election, and sheweth that God choze whom he listeth to be heires of everlasting lyfe, and also that he forsooke whom he listeth. If a man should demaund the reason why: it is not for vs to knowe it, nother is it lawful for vs to seeke any further than his will, which ought to bee in sted of al reason vnto vs. Not that he doeth any thing vnjustly: but because the secretes of his mynd are hidden and incomprehensible to vs, and his wayes are vnknowne to vs. Howbeit forasmuch as it is hard for men to hold themselves quiet, when they heare that doctrine: (according as we see how these doges bark against it nowdayes, and these gloriouse beggers intending to play the greete doctors, say they comprehend it not: and who art thou thou wretched dogge. Doeest thou not comprehend it? Get thee vp vpon thy dunghill and learne to knowe what thou art) forasmuch then as men are so proud that they cannot find in their hearts to submit themselves themselves to that doctrine: Sainct Paule twiteth them with this saying: VVho hath giuen aught vnto God: You step fourth here with gréate boldnesse, yee alledge your owne vertues and your owne strength: therefore it is meete that you should shewe God what he should do, and that nothing be doone otherwyse than you appoynt, and so, that he is greatly bound vnto you. Now if ye pretend such matter against him: come on, and let vs knowe what it is that you haue giuen him. And if yee knowe that he is nothing beholden vnto you: how dare yee murmure against him? Now seing that Sainct Paule dealeth after that maner, and wee knowe his meening in the case of Gods euerlasting election: therevpon wee haue to remember, that it is one of the principles of our fayth, [to beleue] that God holdeth not any thing of vs, and that we can not alledge that he hath receyued aught at our hand: but that all glorie must be giuen vnto him, and wee not think that he is our vnderling, or that he is any thing bownd vnto vs. But all the matter lieth in the well practizing of this lesson, specially that when our flesh tempteth vs to presumptiō and pride, we may be restreyned with this bridle: and consider: How now? with whom matchest thou thyself? For if thou wilt go to lawe with thy God, it behoueth thee to be well armed to answer him. And what wilt thou say to him? Seing thou haste nothing but wretchednes & cursednesse in thee, would it not stād thee in hād to submit thyself to him with all obedience and humilitie? And further let vs marke also, that by those words, all the rightuoufenesse of men is beaten downe, and it is shewed vs that all that ever we can imagin concerning the merit or deseruing of works, is but a drunkennesse of Satan, who hath so bewitched mennes vnderstanding with an opiniō of deseruing to Godward, that the kingdome of heauen was made as it were a wages. In poperie nothing is more common than to say that men can purchase heauen. And how? By their meritorious woorks (as they terme them.) And although the papists be forced to confesse that wee can do nothing without Gods grace, and that wee haue alwayes some imperfections in vs: yet doo they mingle their owne woorks with Gods grace. A man (say they) must prepare himself to receiue Gods grace: not of worthinesse, (they be forced to graunt our owne vnworthinesse) but of conueniencie, by cause (say they) it is conuenient and seemely that a man should offer and dispoze himself afore hand to receiue Gods grace. But is not this an expresse belying of the holie Ghoste? Behold here a saying which is cleere ynough and needeth no gloze, Who is he that hath prevented me [or bene afore hand with me] sayeth the Lord? Then let vs marke well that heere God bereeueth all mankynd of the false and diuelish opinion wherwith they are so befotted, by saying that he is not bound vnto vs but we vnto him, so as wee cannot bring aught vnto him, nother doth he receiue any recompence at our hands by the seruice that wee do vnto him, for he hath no neede of vs. Now we see in effect, that all the wisdom and rightuoufenesse of man is beaten downe and brought to nothing. For there are two things that make vs to lift vp ourselues against God: the one is when wee weene ourselues to be to wise, and the other is when wee think we haue some rightuoufenesse and woorthinesse of ourselues. Howbeit God sheweth vs on the one part, that we may wel prate and prate. but in the end he will put vs to silence well ynough. VVhyso? For what title can wee pretend against him? Then let vs forbear to be selfwys, and learne to be sober and lowely, and let vs acquaynt our selues with Gods woorkes so farre fourth as he sheweth them to vs, always restreyning our selues with this bridle, that wee passe no further than is shewed vs in the holie scripture. If wee do so, we shall be guided alwayes by the holie Ghoste.

Let vs then keepe ourselues from saying, O I would faine know such a thing. Let vs not be selfwise in seeking whatsoeuer we haue a mynd vnto, when we ought not to knowe it: but let vs be contented with that which is opened to vs in the holie scripture, and specially with the things that may edifie vs in faith and the feare of God. And if we meete with a thing that seemeth strange to vs, yet let vs consider that God hath spoken it, and therefore we must receiue it without gaynsaying. Furthermore if God let a thing alone and rel vs it not: it behoueth vs too stoppe there without going any further, and we must not be inquisitiue after our owne fancie. Therefore mark it for a schoole point, that it behoueth vs to bridle our tounge. & to suffer ourselues to be the schollers of our God, seing he doth vs the honour too teache vs as well by his owne mouthe, as also by his holie spirit. The second point concerneth our rightuoufenesse, that being conuicted to haue no woorthinesse at all in vs, and that when we haue done neuer so much, yet we can bring nothing vnto God, wee should yeld ourselues gilty. But (which is much worse) men are so farre of from giuing themselues to do good: that they employ all their force and powers to do euil, vntill God haue reformed them. So then, if we knowe (and put it in vre,) that we must not pretend to haue any worthinesse or deseruing in ourselues, but yeeld God the honour to graunt him to be almightie, then are we thoroughly humbled in all respects. This in effect is the thing that we haue to beare away in this text. Now too knit vp the matter, although it were not needfull, no nor expedient to stand vpon euery woord of this long discourse that is made of the whale: yet let vs assure our selues that this is not superfluous. VVe looke but slyghtly and as it were glauncingly vpon the recordes that God giueth vs of his maieltie. But were our witts well settled too marke what God sheweth vs, to the end we might honour him accordingly, we needed not too go out of our selues: for wee should find presidents ynou bothe of his power and of his will, so as we should behold bothe his myghtinesse & his goodnesse within vs, without going any further. And that is it which S. Paule meeneth by saying, that forasmuch as we haue our life, mouing, and being in him: we be sufficiently conuicted. Though we open not our eyes, yet doth God make vs to feele with our fingers, that he dwelleth in vs: and he setteth forth himselfe in such wise as wee ought of dutie to do him honour. But what? we notwithstanding do fall to this dornelle: wheras if we were well aduised and of good discretion, there should neede (as ye would say) but the tippe of ones little finger to hold vs in obedience vnto God. Howbeit forasmuch as wee overpasse that, and make no greate rekening of Gods woorks: therefore here is made a long discourse, yea and that altogether vpon beasts. Seing then that God maketh here a long anatomie: it semeth long in deede, but yet is it not superfluous. And why? By cause we be so fleeting, that wee despise Gods miracles: how greate and noble so euer they be.

Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place. Now herewithall it is sayd, Wilt thou hold him in thy seruice? or wilt thou put hookes into his nose? or wilt thou play with him as with a spannell or a bird? It is too doo vs too wit, that wee bee so much the lesse to bee excused, if wee acknowledge not our maker, seing we finde ourselues confounded in making comparison betwene vs and a whale. And yet for all that, when man dispute of Gods woorks, in their owne brayne, in conceit high and are not contented with him if hee woork not a ter their lyking: it is all one as if they would ouerthrowe him. And is that possible? Behold, there is a brute beaste which men cannot tell how to tame. True it is that this comparison is not peculiarly fit in all respects, nother is it requisite that similituds shuld match fully and answerably in euery point. But it serueth to shewe, that if a fillie beaste which hath nother reason nor vnderstanding, hath such force in him as to make vs afraid of him and to runne away: what shall he do which hath made and fashioned all things? Again, if a man dare not waken vp a whale: how dareth hee step forth to make warre with the liuing God, as all they do which fall to carping and quareling with him as much as in them lieth? Behold, our Lord would fayne shewe himself gentle and louing towards vs: and in verie deede we see how he is willing to beare with our weaknesse, & we play the madmen and wild beastes, and fall to carping at him openly, as though we were at defiance with him. And are wee able to abyde his presence? Shall it not be much more terrible to vs than the presence of a Whale? Again, seing it is said that the whales doe make the deepe too secte like a cauldron, and iumble the sea together like a pot of oynment (according also as it was sayd of the Elcphāt, that he would make the Riuer of Iordā to passe through his throte) I pray you if we were agast too see a beaste at that point to swalowe vp houghe waters: how much more agast coulde we be at the maiestie of God? It myght seeme to vs that the Whale might be choked in the middes of the waters: and yet notwithstanding he is so greate and houghe a beaste, as he curteth the sea asunder, maketh it to boyle like a pot with his snorting and neezing and (as it is termed heere) ouerturneth shippes, and is like to swalowe vp all that commeth in his way: and shall our Lords neezing be no greater than a whales? Yes, he hath a snorting that is spoken of in the Prophet Esay and also in the hundred and fourth Psalm, in somuch that if God do but pufte or bloye vpon vs, we must needes be destroyed at the first blast. Seing then that there is such terriblenesse in the nozethrils of a beaste: what is there in the breth of god which is the wellspring of all power, cyther to set vs vp & quicken vs, or to ouerthrowe vs and vndoo vs? VVee see then that these parts are not set downe and touched there without cause, and that these kinds of beastes are not picked out from all other, but for good instruction. at least wyse, if we haue the discretion to apply all these things to God, and to make such comparisons as I haue spoken of. VVheras mention is made of the barānesse of the whales flesh and of his bones: it behoueth vs to come to this consideration: How now? VVhat shall become of vs if God lift vp his hand against vs? See how the whale ouerturneth greate shippes and drouneth them in the sea, and hath not God barres of yron farre harder to strike vs downe if he list to touche vs with his hand? Now let vs go iustle with him [when we wil. Seing then that we perceiue so well how infinite the power of Gods hād and arme is, specially whē he is armed against vs: we may well see that this treating after that sort of the VVhales flesh and bones, is no superfluous talk. But on the other side let vs consider also, that if a beaste haue such power in him, insomuch that it is sayd of him, that he laugheth at the shaking of speares, and is not afraid of the sword or of any other weapon: therby it is shewed vs, that if wee be armed with the power of our God, we be in good suretie, and haue no cause to be afraid or to take thought for any thing. VVee see that it is God which hath giuen such strength vnto beastes: and why shē should not we trust to his protection? Furthermore let vs mark wel, that al the strēgth and power that is in VVhales or in any other beastes, shal perishe, how terrible so euer it be, according also as it dorch perish when it pleaseth God. Therefore it behoueth vs to beare in mind, that wee must not trust in ourselues, for that is to great a follie: but wee must repaire to him who hath al power and might in him self. And that we may profit the better by this lesson: let vs mark, that forasmuch we see Gods hād listed vp, & troubles to be through the whole world: we must on the one side learne to distrust ourselues, and as it were disable our selues by knowing our owne infirmities: and yet notwithstanding not cease to glorie in God, seing we be vphilde by his power. Lo how we ought to walk in lowliness on the one part. And on the other side, whē we resorte to our God and leane vnto his fauour and protectiō: we may defie al our enemies, not only of this world, but also eue Satā himself with al his power, & al that euer he is able to practice. Thus ye see that the two things which are requisite, (specially when our Lord warneth vs of any peril, and we see things out of order) are that wee must haue an eye to our owne weaknesse, and vtterly distrust our selues, and yet notwithstanding, in disabling our selues not cease too looke vp to heauen, not doubting but that we haue a good warrant, forsomuch as we be mainteyned by him, but in any wise not presuming vpo ourselues. For as for him that thinketh he hath any power in himself, what cā he do but ouerthrowe himself. Then let vs learne, not to chalendge aught to ourselues, but rather to abace ourselues vtterly: and yet notwithstanding to conceiue such boldnesse vpon trust of Gods protection, as we may not doubt but he is able ynough to defend vs from a hundred thousand deathes, sobeit that we referre our selues wholly vnto him, & trust that he wil always guide vs with his hand, and that although we must be faine to passe through the troubles & disorders of this world, and be intironed with a hundred thousand deathes: yet notwithstanding he will make vs to feele his help, & giue vs power to get out of it, till he haue drawne vs fully to himself, and that we bee come too the endlesse rest which he hath prepared for vs.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgemēt of our finnes, praying him to make vs so to fele how poore and miserable we be, that vpo the knowing of his goodnesse and loue towards vs, wee may couet nothing but to yield him his due glorie for bestowing so many of his graciousse benefits vpon vs, as in that he hath made vs Lords and Maisters of his creatures here bylowe, which were able to scare vs out of our witts, so as we may not be vnthankful for such priuiledge and prerogatiue as he hath graunted vs, but do him homage for all the benefits that we haue receiued at his hand, wayting to haue him increase them, euen till he haue brought vs too the full perfection. And so let vs all say, Almighty God heauenly father, &c.

The. clviij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xliij. Chapter.

IOb answered the Lord and sayd.

2. I knowe that thou canst doo all things, and that no thought shall be kept backe from thee.
3. VVho is he that darkeneth secrets without knowvledge? I spake and vnderstoode not: these things are vponderfull aboute mee, I haue not knowvne them.

4. Herken therefore and I vwill speake : and I vwill aske of thee too the end thou mayst teache mee.

5. I haue herd of thee vwith myne care : and novv myne eye hath seene thee.

WE sawe heretofore the frute that grew of the declaration which God made vntoo Iob : and wheras he doubled his words, it appeared more evidently vnto vs, how much he profited by that correction. He had alreddie repented : and now is he touched more to the quicke. And so we see that whē God hath once taught vs, oftentimes the same profiteth vs but in part : and although we think there is nothing amisse, & that we be come to the right point, yet shal it be but a little preparatiue to it. God therefore must be sayne to hold on in teaching vs, that the doctrine which we haue herd may be the better rooted in our harts, and wee be the more moued with it and settle our selues wholly in it. To be short, we see that repentance is not perfected at the first dash, but that after God hath planed vs, he had neede also to poolish vs : like as when a man maketh a peece of woork in wood or stone, he must haue much heauing about it. The same way also must our Lord take with vs. or else we shall haue but a small entrance into repentance, and the same wil vanish away by andby, or else continue a rude and vnperfect thing. And that is the cause why we must suffer God patiētly, if after once correcting of vs for our faults, he cōtent not himself with one stroke of the rodde, but pay vs double : for that is for our profit. Furthermore when wee haue herd any good instruction for our welfare, if we haue receiued the same, let vs assure ourselues it is but with smal tast, so as we be not yet rightly repented, but haue neede to go to it new again. VVherfore let vs not leaue the doctrin which we haue herd, but let vs indeuer to profit dayly more & more, knowing that it behoueth vs to draw neerer & neerer vnto God all the days of our lyfe, & to be stablished stil more and more in his feare and loue. Or else without that, we be vnstedfast & returne to our old byasse : & whē we think ourselues to be wholly brought home, it shal be nothing but a smoke that wil vanish away out of hand. Ye see then what we haue to beare in mynd. Also according to Iobs example, when we haue cōsidered our faults one day, let vs streyne ourselues to knowe them yet better the next day, and to be the more greeued at them. For if we think we haue discharged our dutie with the saying of one word, or with the conceyuing of some one good thought : we deceyue ourselues. So then repentance must alwayes be a conquest, insomuch that if it be vnfeyned, it must be doubled. But now let vs come to that it is sayd heere, I knowe that thou canst do al things, and that no thought shal bee kept back [or letted] from thee. Some expound this, as though Iob yeelded all power and might vnto God, and therewithal also an infinite foreceit to prouide for all things & to guide them : as though he should say, Lord I knowe thou haste al things in thy hand, and that nothing is hidden frō thee, and that thou art priuie to all things. But it is a common maner of speche among the Hebrewes, to say, No thought shall bee letted from thee, that is to say, whatsoever thou haste ordeyned and commaunded, yea and whatsoever thou haste intended in thy mynd, shall euery whit of it be redily executed, so as thou shall not neede to trouble thyself, as though thou were letted or as though thou couldest fayle in any thing. Then let vs marke that this is spoken simply of Gods infinite power, and the two sayings are verified bothe of one thing. God therefore is al-mightie. As how ? For looke what he purposeth in his mind, he can execute it by andby without any lette. But it should seeme that Iob heere confesseth not all that hee ought to do : for he had protested heretofore, that God ruleth the world : but yet he ceased not to murmur against him. It seemeth then that he hath not profited a whit, and that he returneth stil to the foresayd article, that although God be almightie, yet he fayleth not now and then to vse ouergret rigour, so as the poore creatures suffer to much, and are tormented to excessiue at his hand. Howbeit we must cōsider, that heere Iob acknowledgeth Gods almightinesse after another maner than he had doone at ore, that is to wit by humbling himself vnder Gods mightie hand : in acknowledging that it is not for mortall men too resist him nor to checke against him. Sometymes wee can say that God hath all things in his hand and guiding : but in the meane whyle we will not cease to fret and repyne if he do not all things to our liking. And wherof commeth that ? Euen of that we haue not thoroughly conceyued his hygh power to submit our selues to it, nor considered that he being almightie guideth all things iustly and vprightly, so as it is good reason that he should handle vs and weeld vs as he listeth, and we keepe our mouthes shet, without replying to any thing which he doth. Thē if we acknowledge Gods almightinesse by vter disabbling of ourselues vnder him, and by confessing it to be good reason that he should reigne and haue all authoritie ouer vs, and that we should obey him, yea and that not by constryent, but of a meeke and meeld mind : that is doubtlesse a true cōfessing that God is almightie. But if we will take vpon vs about him, and handle him after our mind, & haue him to followe our wills, and to do according to our conceyts and imaginacions : alas, it is an euill acknowledging of his almightinesse : for we would bee his fellowes, yea and we would be about him to in that point. Therefore let vs mark well, that Iob treateth of Gods almightinesse in an other sense heere, than he hath done heretofore. For he woorslippeth God in his fouerein dominion, and acknowledgeth that al things must needs be guided by him, & that it is his office to gouerne men, and that we haue no cause to murmur when he afflicteth vs, and that although things be hard & troublesome, yet we must alwayes come to this point, that inasmuch as he is righteous he canot deale amisse, and that it becōmeth vs to please him and to yeeld ourselues prisoners to him, to be handled and guided as it pleaseth him, and moreouer to hold al good things at his hand. Thus ye see in what wise we ought to acknowledge God to be almightie. Now in the second member, Iob defineth what Gods almightinesse is, and how it behoueth vs to cōceiue of it : for he speaketh of Gods thoughtes. We see many fantastical persons, who when they talk of Gods almightinesse, fal to gazing at this and that, saying : If God be almightie, why doth he not such a thing : If God be almightie, then can he do this. Yea, but we must not raunge abroad so after our own imaginaciōs, Gods almightinesse ameth not at our dotages nor at any common thing. VVherat then ? Gods almightinesse and his wil are things inseparable. God is almightie : but is it to do whatsoever man hath forged in his brayne ? No sic : but it is to accomplish whatsoever he hath ordeyned in his owne purpose. So then let vs learne to knit the se two things together, namely his almightinesse and his wil. And that is the cause why Iob said, that no thought shall be letted, kept backe or re- streyned fro him, that he shuld not execute it: not the things that men conceiue and determine, (for it is not for the [to haue their wills]) but the things that God hath ordeyned & which he knoweth to be good. Now we see after what maner Gods almightinesse ought to be knowne of vs: namely to the end we shuld not doubt but that al things shal be done which he shal haue determined, not by taking cōfessell at our hāds, but by cause it is at his assignement to appoint what is good to be done for so much as he is the fountaine of al wisdom. For al these things are so in his hand, as nothing can hinder his accomplishing of whatsoeuer he hath deuised. This wil bee the better vnderstoode by the practising of it. Such as blame Gods almightinesse without cause or reason, fall too seeking of by matters, saying: Why doth not God such a thing seing he is almightie? yea: Is it for vs to make him play tricks to and fro? It belongeth to him to determine & appoint, & afterward to bring it also to passe. Yet notwithstanding, those [forward fellows] take no heed of graunting al power vnto God, whē it cometh to the point that they should trust in him. And yet the verie thing wherunto we should apply Gods almightinesse, is that he wil not faile to keepe his promis, and that forasmuch as our welfare is in his hand, wee are sure that none euil can betide vs, and that sith he hath vs in his protection, we be out of doubt that no enimie shal preuayle against vs. This (say I) is the cause for which we should mind Gods almightinesse, according as it is shewed vs where it is said that no man shal plucke vs out of Christs hād who hath taken vs into his keeping. And why? For the father who hath committed vs to him, is stronger than al. Why & to what end hath Iesus Christ alledged to vs the inuincible power of God his father? It is to the end wee shuld be quit, and not doubt but he wil saue vs, notwithstanding all the attempts that Satā can do or deuise: for God is almightie. Herein we see that we must ioyne Gods almightinesse with his good wil, euen such as he sheweth it to be by his word. If we be once at that point, we shall not giue ourselues the bridle to gaze & raunge abroad: & yet shal we haue also wherewith to beate backe the skornes of such as can find in their harts to play with Gods almightinesse as with a tennis ball. As for example, looke mee vpon the Papists, who wil needs haue the breade to be chaunged into the bodie of Iesus Christe, and that the thing which was but bread before, shuld become god: & to proue their saying, they alledge, why not? is not God almightie? Yes: but is it to that end? Then wil him to darken the sunne, & to turne the moone into water, and to make the earth to be in heauen, and heauen to be in earth. Is it not a playne mocking of God when we fall to treating of his almightinesse after that maner? Is it not an ouerthrowing & perverting of all order, and [a laboring] that there might be no more difference betwixt whyte and blacke? Is it not a wicked rending asunder of Gods mightie power, and a laying of it opē to all reproche? And wherof cometh this? It is by cause the Papists haue not yet learned the lesson that is shewed vs heere: that is to wit, that God is almightie to accomplish whatsoeuer he purposeth too doo. But where is there any purpose of God in this behalf? It becommeth vs to looke whither God do will it or no. There fore when we haue Gods will [for our warrāt]: the must we also extend his mightie power to the performing of the things which he hath ordeyned in his will. But let vs not think that our Lord wil haue mē to make his almightinesse roue and raunge where they think good. Wherfore let vs beare the lesson in mind that is shewed vs here, for seing that God hath shewed vs his wil concerning our welfare & soulhelth, assuring vs that he wil mainteyne vs to the end, succour vs in all our necessities, list vs vp whē

we be downe, and strengthen vs in our weaknesse, seing (say I) that we haue Gods wil apparant in al these things, let vs not doubt but he hath his hād stretched out to performe whatsoeuer he hath spoken to vs. Ye see then that Gods hād and his mouth must agree together. His mouth (that is to say his determinacion or will) must go before: and afterward his hand must bring to passe the things that he hath determined. Now haue we these two things that is to wit, first we must submit ourselues wholly to Gods ordinance in this world. And why? For his will is good & besides that, wee knowe also that it is his charge or office to gouerne, and that it is good reason that all creatures should suffer themselues to be ruled by him, and not take libertie to rule themselues, but submit themselues to him in al points and al respects. When we be once fully persuaded of this, we shal haue profited greatly for al our life after. Now heere followeth immediatly, who is he that by detb secrets without knowledge? God hath heretofore vpbraided Iob herewith. And it shuld seeme that Iob mēt to cōfesse it to be so in deede, that is to wit, that he had wrapped vp Gods wisdom in his own foolish words. For if we reason of Gods woorks after our owne abilitie, and take vpon vs to be iudgers of them: it is a hyding or wrapping vp of his secrets: that is to say, a brabbling (as men terme it) euen without skil. For we would be to wise when we talk after that fashyon, and haue not bene taught afore. Ye see then that: wee may take this text for a confessing of the thing that had bin cast in Iobs teethe: as if he should say, alas Lord, rightly haste thou condemned me heere before, in that I tooke vpon mee to wrap vp thy secrets without knowing wherunto my words and reasons tēded. I know now that I haue delt foolishly: for it was for mee to haue accepted simply whatsoeuer it had pleased thee to appoint, and I haue taken vpon mee too play the mayster before I had gone to schole myself. So then, Lord I acknowledge that thou haste of good right bewrayed my follie. Now if we take it after that maner: then dothe Iob make a confession, wherin he attributeth such a wil vntoo God, as is matched with al knowledge: for here is as it were a cōtrarietie betweene God and men. God keepeth his will and determinacion secret: howbeit he knoweth cause to do so, and he hath always a reason redy shaped. On our side, when we go about to discouer more of Gods will than is lawfull for vs, we do but intangle it more and more: & all that is done without skil, insomuch that the more wee go about to shewe ourselues skilful, the more we bewray our owne beaftlinesse. So on the one side let vs learne that it is for God to keepe his secrets to himself without making vs priue to the, specially when he seeth the same too surmount our snial capacitie. God openeth the things vntoo vs, which he knoweth to be meete and expedient for vs, as hath bin declared heretofore, but yet must he referue many dark things to himselfe. And why? For we bee too weak as yet to mount so hygh. Thus then yee see that God may conceale his secrets: howbeit, that is with knowledge, for he is not ignorant of any thing, nother is it by cause he is not able to shewe vs why he doth this or that: but by cause we be not able to conceyue the things which as now are incomprehensible to vs. Now as for vs, truly when we would knowe more than is permitted vs, wee will well ynough alledge some cunning shift, and deuize many causes: but yet at length wee must needs bee confounded in our owne woords, and wheras men streyne themselues too bee wyse without following Gods woord, they alwayes shewe their owne fondnesse, how wauering their wittes are, and that there is nothing but lying in them. Will wee then haue a pure and cleere vnderstanding too speake of Gods woorks according

ding to skill: Let vs come to his schole: let vs hear him speake: let vs beare away his sayings: and specially let vs haue such sobernesse, as not to couet to knowe more thā he sheweth vs. VVhen we be come to that point, then shal we speake rightly, and to the edifying of our neighbours, so as they shal bee confirmed in it more and more. But if we passe the bounds that God hath set vs, and will needs gad astray further than we haue leaue: there will be nothing but vanitie and vntrithe in our doings. Thus ye see what we haue to remember vpon this verse. And therefore Iob addeth, I haue spoken I wist not what: these things are maruelouse about mee, and I haue not vnderstoode the. This confirmeth the thing that I said euen now. Iob confesseth that he had spokē without skil. As how? Because I vnderstoode not the things that I spake of, sayeth he. It is as much as if he had sayd, I haue put forth my self to vnadvisedly. And why? Because those things were to maruelouse for mee, and I haue not knowne them. And here we haue to marke, that the cause why Iob graunted himself to be ignorant, is the hyghenesse of the secrets wherof he would haue spoken. God made him to feele his hand, but yet did he not conceyue the cause why he should be so afflicted, and therefore he entered into these deepe réptations to say, what meeneth this that I am pinched with such extremitie? Can not God finde in his hart to dispatch mee out of hand? I would faine that he had destroyed mee. He maketh mee to linger in peine. He knoweth that there is nothing in me but frailtie, and that I am but a wretched creature: and why then suffereth he mee to be so long time in extremitie? If I were the wickedest wight in the world, he could do no worse to me, and yet notwithstanding he knoweth that I haue serued him vncorruptly, & that I am no such persone as I ought to be so cast out frō among men. These are the debatinges wherinto Iob was entered. And why? For he preaced to farre into Gods secrets. Now to correct himselfe he sayeth that those things were to woonderfull for him.

Therefore let vs marke wel, that when we come vnto God and fall to talking of his works, we ought to cōsider that they bee to hygh secrets for our weake wit to reache vnto. And I say it behoueth vs to haue the same persuasiō, as wel of Gods prouidence in general, as of the things that belōg to his spiritual kingdome. Then if it be told vs that God ordereth al things, & that there is not any thng done in this world without his wil: it is a secret which it behoueth vs to mark wel. For although euery man graunt that God is souerain Lord and gouerner: yet notwithstanding whē we come to this point, that the things which we see to be so troublesom & out of order, cease not to be guided by the secret prouidence of God, who holdeth the sterne about & turneth things to such end as he thinketh good: we wote not where we be. And what is to be done in that case? VVe must reuerently consider that wee be not able to mount vp to so hygh a secret, and therefore honour god in the things that wee knowe not, vntil he reuele vnto vs the things that are hiddē frō vs as yet. VVere this throughly wel known, these doggs that bark so against Gods prouidence, and rayle vpon the doctrine that is conteyned in the holie scripture, would sone cease their pratling. There are at this day certaine drunkards or braynesse fellows, which wil say, that if god govern al things, it must follow that men sin not any more, or else that their sins ought to bee fathered vpon him. Such blasphemies shal a man heare. And why? Because such naughtipacks cannot finde in their harts to yeeld vnto this point, that Gods prouidence and his maner of governing the world, are a woonderfull doctrine outreaching their capacitie. They leaue nothing vnto God, but wil needs determine all things after their owne mind. And what a raunging is that? Therefore let vs marke well, that Iob telleth vs heere for a general principle, that when Gods works and the scanning how all things are done heere bilowe, do come in questiō: it behoueth vs to bee alwayes so reuerend mynded aforehand, as to think, How now? Heere is a dungeon to deepe for vs, and therefore we must not presume to speake after our owne vnderstanding, but simply woorthip God, and be sober without inquiring ouerfarre: and in the meane whyle conclude that yet notwithstanding God guideth al things, and nothing commeth too passe at aduenture, but according as he hath determined of the same, as this doctrine hath often bene handled more at large heretofore. Marke that for one point. And for a second, let vs learne that whatsoever things concerne the spirituall kingdome of God, ought to be taken for woonderfull things about vs, accordingly as sainct Paule speaketh of them. The sensual man (sayeth he) vnderstādeth not the secrets of God: according as it said that the benefits which God hath prepared about for his chosen, are so excellent, as no eye can see them, nor mynde [of man] conceyue them. Then seeing it is so, let vs learne to pray God to inlyghten vs by his holie spirit, and too make vs stye about the heauens, namely by the power of faith (fer our naturall wit can neuer atteyne thither): and that when wee haue obteyned, that we may also haue the fore sayd modestie of not passing beyond the measure of our faith, as Iob treateth therof anon after.

Ye see then that the first point which we haue to mark in this streyne, is that Gods woorks, and specially his promises cōcerning our euerlasting welfare which are cōteyned in the gospel, are woonderfull things about vs, and therefore that we must step not rashly, malapertly, nor presumptuously to them, but reuerently pray God to make vs to taste his secrets so farre forth as is for our behoof, and to open the things from day to day which are dark to vs, and not suffer vs to passe our bounds, but that wee may take profit by the things that he shall open vnto vs, and tarye his increasing of our faith. And so let vs neuer speake nor thinke of Gods secrets, but with all reuerence and humilitie.

Furthermore wheras Iob confesseth that he spake he wist not what, forasmuch as he accuseth himself of rashnesse, let vs also learne by his example, to cōdemne all the talk that we shall haue cast forth before wee haue bene taught by the mouth of God. And let vs not be ashamed to confesse our owne follie, when wee haue shewed our beastlynesse [in speaking] without good ground. Let vs not do as they do which clatter when they be rebuked: for such do but gather more poysen, and they think it well done of them to go through with the matter, and to say, Tush I wil neuer say otherwise. I am stil of the same mind that I was. Let vs not haue any such hardhatednesse in vs: but when we haue bene overbold in speaking to hastily, and some wandering woords haue scaped vs, before wee were wel grounded in Gods trithe: let vs acknowledge our follie: and renouncing our ouerhastinesse in speaking at aduenture, let vs say with Iob, I spake I wist not what. But herewithall it behoueth also too bee wel advised for afterward, and to practize the forealleged lesion of beleeuing [or of being sure of our matter] before we speake. And let vs beware that wee beleuee not aught, but that which our God hath shewed vs. So then wee must come to this point, that our fayth be grounded vpon the woord of God, and that the holie scripture be all our wisdom. VVhen we be once come to that knowledge: then may wee speake, yea wee may speake of the things that passe our vnderstanding, inasmuch as God shall haue shewed vs them by faith, as wee haue sayd afore. Howbeit, it is not ynough for vs too acknowledge our faults: but we must also resort to the remedie out of had, according as Iob hath giuen vs example therof. For after he had sayd he had put forth himself without vnderstanding wel what he spake. he addeth, Heare me and I will speak: I will aske of thee, to the end thou mayst teache mee. Heere Iob pretēdeth to repress himself, bicause he sawe he had plaid the iooce colt, in not keeping himself within his bounds. Then his confessing of his fault is not after the fashion of many men, which think themselves quite discharged with saying at one word, I haue done amisse, and by andby after returne to their old byasse, and are alwayes new to begin: he doth not so: but he sayeth, Lord, seing there hath bene such foolish rashnesse in me, and that I haue so farre ouershot myself and run astray: now poze thou me, & when I haue bin well taught in thy schole, let me speake simply as thou haste taught mee, and let it not befall mee any more, to put forth the things wherof I haue no skill. This is in effect the matter that is cōteyned in this verse. And wheras Iob sayeth, beare mee, I will speake. his meening is not too craue audience to speake what he listeth (for he had done so to much already): but he excuseth himself in saying immediatly that his questioning with God shall be to be taught at his hand. Therefore let vs mark, that there are two fashions of speaking vnto God. The one is when mē pleade against him, and lay forth their interrogatories, and make their obiections, and think themselves too be very wyse. It is a lewd maner of speaking whē we presume to enter so into disputation with God, or to reply against his doings. Let vs keepe ourselves from that kynd of speche, for it were better that our tungs were plucked out of our heads. Although this be an ouercommon vice: yet is it a detestable vice, and such a one as is not in any wyse to be borne with.

Therefore (as hath bin sayd afore) let vs learne to keepe our mouthes shet, that we speake not of our own head: but when any imaginacions come in mynd, let them all fall to the ground. For wheras I say it is not lawfull for vs too speake: I meene that it behoueth vs to haue stay of ourselves, not only for our tungs, but also for all our affections. Not that we be able to do so much, that we shuld not still feele some tickling lust of desirousnesse to seeke somewhat to farre, and of disputing against God: but bicause it behoueth vs to fight against it and to beate it down. And that is the sobrietie wherunto it behoueth the faithful to be brought by the gospel, that they may simply giue glorie vnto God by confessing themselves to knowe nothing. Then must all Gods children practise this point: namely, not to presume to speake so at randō of whatsoever thing they thinke good. But there is another kind of speaking that is good and holie, which they must followe: and that is to inquire of God that he may teache them. For we see many that foade themselves in their beaklinesse, and if a mā labour to bring the to the truth, they be both too come at it: they play the brute beasts that they might knowe nothing, & so they become vtterly dul. Therefore it behoueth vs to speake, howbeit but as in asking counsell of God, that is to wit by desiring him to teache vs, after wee haue cōfessed that we haue no skill at al, that we be void of all light, reason, and vnderstanding, and that there is nothing but darknesse and lying in our owne wit. After wee haue confessed this, let vs come to aske counsell at Gods hand, saying Lord we beseeche thee voutsafe to shew vs whatsoever is good for vs to know. Neuerthelesse, verely it behoueth vs euen in that behalf also to haue a bridle to hold vs backe: for else we might aske God more than shall be requisite, as many men do, who would haue all things too passe through their heades. They wil peradventure come vnto God, and aske at his hand. But how? with such excessiue curiositie, as their asking is neuer at an ende. But when we aske ought of God, it must be alwayes with this exception: Lord shew vs the things which thou knowest to be expedient for our welfare, so as our knowledge may be to our edifying, both in trusting to thy goodnesse, and in the feare of thy name. And further, forasmuch as thou Lorde knowest our slendernesse, shewe vs thy will according to our abilitie. For when we eate honnye, no doubt but it is sweete in taste: and yet notwithstanding wee see that a man shall be swolne with it, and the sweetnesse will go neare to make him burst. Euen so is it with vs: if wee seke too high knowledge, the same wil in the end turne to bitternes. VVe may be beguiled at the beginning, bicause it will seeme to be a goodly thing, and suche a one as wee may attaine to the knowledge of it. Yea: but let vs consider what hapned to our father Adam. He would nedes know the difference betweene good and euill, more than God had giuen him, and therby threw himselfe headlong into the dungeon wherein we be yet still at this day. Sith it is so, let vs not couet too great a glorie: for in the end it will be no glorie to vs, as Salomon sayth: but like as honnye euen by reason of his swetenesse, turneth into bitternesse if a man eate to muche of it: so is it with vs when wee be more inquisitiue of Gods will and works than is lawfull for vs. Therefore let vs not couet to know more of them than we may wel away with, except we intend to be ouerwhelmed. Nowe it is expressly sayde, Heare mee, and I will speake, I will aske of thee to the intent to be taught. If we come to God to learne at his hande: it behoueth vs to yeelde our selues teachable. And what is the first point of teachablenesse? It is that we take him for our mayster and obey him fully in any thing that he shal list to tech vs. For when a yong child comes first to schoole, if he will needes chooze his bokes after his own lyking, to say I will learne such science, or I will be taught suche a thing or such a thing, before he haue gone to his Apcee, so as he will be a great Doctōr, before hee haue the meane whereby to be taught, or be come to the place wher learning is to be had: I pray you is that a schoierlyke modestie? But if a scholer that takes a man to teach him, ought to submitte himselfe wholly to him: what ought we to do to God? VVhat cōparison is there in that case? So then let vs marke well, that if we desire vnfainedly to be taught of God, wee will not followe our owne lustes, to say that hee should shewe vs whatsoever wee haue conceyued in our owne heade: but wee will hoide vs contented with that whiche hee knoweth to be for our welfare: and to descerne that it belongeth vnto him. And for that cause Iob concludeth, that heereofore hee had bearde speaking of God, but nowe hee hadde seene him with his eye. As if hee had sayde, Lorde, it is true that heereofore I haue hearde speaking of thy maiestie, but nowe I knowe it after another manner: and that is to the ende to submitte myselfe wholly vnto thee. Iob maketh comparison heere betweene the knowledge that hee hadde hadde before, and the Reuelation wher-in God opened himselfe so manifestly vnto him, that hee was vtterly abashed and touched with suche feare, as hee coude doe nothing but glorifye God, as wee see hee dothe. Howbeit, it ought too suffyze vs too haue hearde God spoken of: for thereof also proceedeth knowledge. Fayth (saythe Saint Paule) commeth by hearing. And fayth bringeth vs perfect wisdom, as it is saide in another place. And what desire we more, than to know that we be the children of God: & that it is known by faith, as Saint Iohn saith in his Canonick Epistle. And ageync S. Paule sayth in the first to the Corinthians,

that by faith we enter into Gods secrets, yea euen into the deepest of them. For his spirit dwelleth in vs, too warrant vs the things that enter not intoo fleshly vnderstanding. Faith then proceeding of hearing, bringeth vs to a true perfection of wisdom, and therefore it ought to satisfie vs to haue heard God spoken of. But here Iob ment to betoken, that the knowledge which he had had, was as when we heare speaking of a thing that we haue not seene, for when we see a thing we be the surer of it. The let vs mark well Iobs meening. It is not to refuze the doctrine wherewith we be taught when Gods woord is preached to vs: but to do vs to vnderstand, that if the doctrine do but only beate our eares, it is a dead thing, vntill God reuele himself in such wise, that wee knowe him as it were by eyesight. And when is that done? Dayly when the Gospell is preached. For there must God speake to vs after two sorts. He speaketh to vs by the meanes of a man, which is appointed to be the minister to teache vs: And again he speaketh to vs by the working of his spirit, when we be so touched inwardly, as we fare the better by the doctrine, and haue our harts perced with it: for without that the voice vanissheth away, and is but an vnprofitable sound. There are many that here the gospell speak dayly: but the more it is preached to the, the more do they growe hardharted. And that is it which is spoken in the Prophet Esay, Go to this people and tell them, they shall see with their eyes and heare with their eares, but they shal not vnderstand: and why? Bicause they haue a hard hart, which cannot by any meanes be softened. VVe see then that if God woork not by his grace, men shall alwayes continue stubborne. And therefore when God speaketh to vs, he must bee faine to discouer and shewe himself too vs, and to make vs to see him. And how? Not by bodily sight: but by perceyuing his maiestie in such wise, as wee may learne to reuerence him, and to put ourselues wholly into his had, that he may haue all authoritie and dominion ouer vs.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them more and more, to the end we may come to him with true repentance, & he not suffer his dayly calling vpon vs (as well by the doctrine that is preached to vs in his Gospell, as by the corrections that he sendeth vs,) too be vnprofitable to vs, but that we may learne to be confirmed more and more in the feeling of our finnes, so as we may craue forgiveness of them at his hand, and seeke the remedie of them in his goodnesse, and therewithall desire altogether to be taught in his schole, and to yeld our selues teachable vntoo him, euen till hee haue rid vs of our ignorance, and stripped vs quite and cleane out of al the wayne truits wherin we be wrapped as now. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only too vs, &c.

6. Therefore I abhorre it, and I repent in dust and ashes.
7. After that the Lord had spoken these vvords vnto Iob, he sayd vnto Eliphaz the Themanite: my vvrath is kindled against thee, and vpon thy two companions: for ye haue not spoken rightly before mee as hath my seruant Iob.
8. Therefore take yee seuen Oxen and seuen sheepe, and get ye to my seruant Iob, and offer sacrifice for your selues: and my seruant Iob shall pray for you: and I will accept his face, to the end that your folly be not layd to your charge: for you haue not spoken ryghtly concerning mee, as hath my seruant Iob.

Esawe yesterday what it is too perceyue Gods presence and to be touched with his glorie, bycause that without that, it is impossible for men to come to good order, whatsoever be sayd vntoo them. For eyther they will play the deaf folkes, or else let slip all that is spoken to them, as experience sheweth too much. Therefore it is requisite that when God speaketh, he should also shewe himself to vs, and giue vs some liuely perceyuerance of his maiestie, too the intent wee may feare him. And that is the cause why Iob protesteth that he is discontented with himself, and misliketh all that he had spoken: for men wil neuer vtterly mislike bothe their workes and wordes, except they feele God too bee their iudge. VVe knowe how euerye man is giuen to soothe himself through fond flatterie, and that when our eyes are once dazeled, none of vs seeth his owne shame, or if he do see it: yet doth he not willingly regard it. God then must be fayne to shewe himself before we ca come to so much reason as to mislike of ourselues, and too take hold of all that shall be doone and sayd to vs. Howbeit on the contrarie part also we wil not colour our vices nor seeke excuses any more, when wee haue once a true repentance, but rather wee will confesse that wee haue doone amisse, yea and euen bee hartely sorie for it. For if a sinner returne ryghtly vnto God: he will not only acknowledge his offence, and yeld himself gilty: but also condemne himself for presuming against his maker. Therefore let vs marke well, that true repentance importeth a hating of the sin, yea euen to the vttermost, insomuch as a man misliketh and hateth himself bycause he is not such a one as he ought to be, and full of Gods ryghtuousnesse he condemneth all that is in himself, and seeketh all meanes possible to be vncaced out of that old skin wherin he is wrapped. This is the true trial of our repentance. And herin we see how shamelesse they are which say they be repentant, and yet a man cannot get one woord out of their mouth, that sheweth any token of lowliness: but they are so farre off from intending to yeld themselues with their whole harts vnto God, and fro indeuering to make amends for the offences which they haue done: that they wil stil maynteyne themselues in their wickednesse. But put the case that a man acknowledge his fault: yet is it nothing worth to do so, except he vtterly mislike and hate himself, as I sayd afore. VVherfore if the one bee not as well as the other: wee see what a mockerie it is too say, that a man is repentant, when in the meane season he is hardharted towards God, and shamelesse towards men.

Now if Iob (who was as it were a stranger, in that he was neuer of the church of God, [that is to say] of that corporation which was chozen of the lineage of Abraham) spake after that maner, and knew what true repentance is:

what damnation shall lie vpon vs, if we be so brutish and rude in these dayes, that wee wote not what difference there is betweene the cheef grounds of our faith: Lo how we haue profited in the Gospell. They that were before the Prophets, yea and which were not of the bodie of the Iewes, nor of the people whom God had chosen to be his [visible] church, could skill to declare that it is no true repentance, except men do vtterly condemne and abace themselves in their vices. But nowadayes wheras those that will be taken to be Christians, do vse the woord repentance: they do but stayne and vnhalowe it with their leawd and filthie mouthes, coueting too haue men take that for repentance, which is but a flat mocking of God. So much the more then behoueth it vs to marke what is conteyned here: namely that if we intend to shewe that we be truly turned vnto God: it behoueth vs to haue an eye to our owne shamefulnessse, and to looke vpon it in such wise, as all that is in vs may be condemned, & we learn to be our own iudges to the end we may be quit before him, which desireth nothing but to pardon such as come back vnto him with true lowelines. But Iob addeth purposely, that he wil repent him in dust and ashes. As if he should say that he is redie to yeeld himself as a wretched offender vnto God. For a mā may wel repēt him without putting of sackloth vpon his backe, and without casting of dust vpon his head. Neuerthelessse, the men of old time vsed those ceremonies, when they intended to make solēne protestation, that they were vtterly condemned before God, and that there was no remedie for thē, but that God should be graciousse to them as to miserable offenders. Therefore let vs marke well, that Iob speaketh not here of a common repentance: but acknowledgeth his offence to be so greuousse and outragousse, as he deserueth well to come as it were with a halter about his necke, & to shew by open signes that there is nothing else but cursednesse in him, til God receiue him and gather him home too him. True it is that this matter myght bee layd fourth more at length, neuerthelessse it will suffice vs in effect, that the ashes and dust that are spoken of heere, are not the cheef poynt of repētance, but only an outward token of it. Furthermore this token is not alwayes requisite, but if it be to make open protestation of an outragousse crime. It behoueth the faithful too be wel aduised that they repent and mislike of themselves all their life long: for we passe not any one day, without many misdoings: we comit infinite faults without our knowledge, yea and euē thinking that we do well: so as if we examine ourselves throughly, wee shal alwayes find that there is somewhat stil amisse in vs. Therefore haue we cause of sorrowe: and yet notwithstanding we shal not neede to make open protestation before men. Then may repentance wel be without the outward signes ioyned with it: but when our faults are grosse, and Gods wrath sheweth it self towards vs: thē must we not only be sorie and mislike of our selues, but also (in confirmation, that the same may edifie our neighbours) we must adde some outward signes: as if a man haue giuen some stumbling blocke, & seeth that Gods name is blasphemed by it, and God discouereth his shame: he must not only mislike and hate himself, but also match his doing with outward humilitie before men, as with a record or seale to ratifie his repētance. And this must be not only in euery particular person, but also in the whole people, according as we see it hath alwayes bin the practize of the church. Moreover let vs marke wel that it is not ynough for vs to haue the outward tokens: but our hart must specially be wounded, that being throughly greeued for prouoking Gods wrath against vs, we may conceyue a sorinesse, and condemne ourselves, and be vtterly dismayed in oursel-

ues. And that is the sorrowe wherof Sainct Paule speaketh, which he sayeth that we must not shun, bycause it is to our saluatiō. And therefore it is sayd also in the Prophet Iuell, rend your harts and not your garments. True it is that vnto such as had offended greuously, and were desirousse that God should heare them, the Prophet giueth commandment to returne with sackloth, dust, and ashes, and to confesse themselves to be offenders, and to craue forgiuenesse, and too declare with solemne protestation, that they haue deserued death, but if he haue pitie of thē. Howbeit forasmuch as men are so sore inclined to hypocrisie, and wil needes content God with fayre contenāces, and forget that which ought to be the first & cheef poynt: the Prophet sayeth expressly that their harts must bee rent, and that the hardnesse of them must be put away. So we see that the effect which Iob ment to say, is, that in repenting him of his vnaduized speeche, he addeth that his so doing was no light nor small sin, but so heynouse that he is readye to shewe himself as a wretched offender, that had committed a crime woorthie of death, and hath none other hope nor refuge, but only to the mere mercie of god yea and euen to make the same protestation willingly before men, to the end that such as haue bene offended by him, may be set vp again, and all men knowe that he desireth nothing but to humble himself vnder Gods hand. Now seeing it is so, when we on our side haue doone any fault, let vs learne not to lessen it, nor to hyde it: but too acknowledge it, yea euen to the vtter abacing of ourselves. Againe when we haue begonne to mislike of our sinnes in our hart, and to lothe them and to be sorie for thē to the end that God should not enter into account with vs: let vs also haue the modestie before men, too vse the protestations which God liketh of: namely to confesse that in all respects wee haue deserued death, but if God admit vs to mercie: and let not the shame of our sin hinder vs from making amends for the offence which wee haue giuen by our dooing amisse. Herevpon it is sayd, that God after he had spoken vnto Iob, turned himself to Eliphaz the Themanite, and sayd vnto him: My wrath is kindled against thee and thy companions: for ye haue not spoken rightly before mee as my seruant Iob hath doone. VVē haue seene heretofore that God found fault with Iob: and now secondarily he findeth fault with his companions, yea and that much more roughly. Before we come to the comparison that is made here betweene Iob and his freends: we haue to marke the order, which is, that it is sayd that God hauing spoken those woordes vnto Iob, turned his talk to those that had wrongfully condemned him. Hereby we be warned, that although God chastize his own with fatherly gentlenessse: yet notwithstanding hee executeth his Iustice throughly vpon them: according as it is sayd that his punishments or chastizements begin at his owne howse or church. Yee see then that God rebuketh Iob, and in the meane whyle letteth the other alone which had offended more grossely than he. A mā might demād here, yea, is it so? VVhy doeth God set himself alonly at Iob, and at the partie that had least offended? For although he had doone faults, yet were they more too bee borne withall than the faults of his companions: and yet God seemeth to viter all his rigour against him alone. Lo what a man might say. Howbeit he is rebuked first, bycause the thing which I haue alledged out of the Prophet must be fulfilled: that is to wit, that God beginneth to chastize his own household folk first. VVhen he intendeth to execute his iustice, he beginneth not at the vnbeleeuers: he letteth thē alone, he spareth them as though he had forgotten their faults. Not that they be not throughly recorded, or shal not come to account: but for that he suffereth the sins of those whom

1er. 25. f. 29.
1Pe. 4. d. 17

whom he loueth not, to rype, yea and to rotte. Yea and in the meane while he chastizeth those whom he hath adopted, and whom he auoweth for his children: he sheweth them signes of roughnesse, while those that are strangers to him take their reit and welter in their ease & pleasures.

Thus ye see what is shewed vs in this text, and it is a verie profitable lesson for vs. For we see dayly the state of the faithfull is more miserable than the state of the despisers of God. The godly seeme too bee vterly forsaken of him, they drag their wings after thē, and they do but pine away in this world: and in the meane while the wicked set vp their crests and are merrie, and make iolly chere, euen in skorne of God. Now how would it trouble men to see these things, if wee had not this doctrine, that iudgement beginneth at Gods owne howse: according also as it is sayd in the Prophet Esay, that when God shall haue finished all his woork vpon mount Sion, then will he not spare the wicked. And the Prophet sayeth purposely that God must performe all his corrections in his churche, for somuch as his owne are those whom he setteth moste store by. Therefore he must visit them first, and clenze thē from their sinnes, & reforme them that he may bring thē home to himself, and he must not do it for one day and away, but till he haue made an end of his whole woork: & thē ther is a horrible vengeance prepared for those that abused his patience, and hardened their harts whyles he bare with thē, as S. Peter also warneth vs. Alas, my freends (sayeth he) let vs not bee greued at the children of this world when God letteth them alone in peace, and we in the meane while are chastized by his hand, so as our state is hard and troublesome to beare. Let vs beare it patiently (sayeth he): for seing that wee must bee faine to passe through the furnace, and too bee tried after that maner: what shall become of those whom God hath vterly forsaken? So then, let vs acknowledge the goodnesse of our God, according also as the Prophet sayeth, that those whō God hath long borne with, are likened to frutes that are reserued to the ende of the yere and are as good as rotten: & that such as are gathered sooner shal neuerthelessse be eaten, and men shal do them that honour, notwithstanding that they be gathered. And so let vs learne, that God procureth and furthereth our weifare, in that it pleaseth him to chastize vs first of al others, while the wicked giue themselves to making of good cheere. Howbeit we cannot say that Eliphaz and his companions were vterly reiected of God (for contrariwise he accepted them): but yet are they alienated from him for a tyme, and Iob must be faine to be a meane for them, or else they shall find no meanes of fauour and forguienesse. Then if we compare Iob with them, we will say he is one of the household of the churche, and the others are as ye would say banished out of it for a time till God haue reconciled them to him again. But yet ye see that Iob is rebuked, & in the meane while God speaketh not a woord to the others. Therefore let vs consider that (as I haue erit sayd) the more God loueth vs, the more hastie is he in visiting vs: and when he seeth that we haue stepped awrie, and are gone out of the right way of saluation: he watcheth ouer vs to bring vs home againe to him with speede. Now let vs come to the comparifon that is set downe heere betweene Iob and his freends. It is sayd that Iob spake rightly before God. How was that? For God notwithstanding condemned him as an ignorant, ouerweening, and vnpacient persone. And where is then the sayd ryghtnesse (I haue told you heretofore how Iob had vnderaken a good case, howbeit he proceeded amisse in it. Iob therefore ouershot himself in the following of his matter, but yet for all that, his case was good still. Contrariwise Iobs freends vsed goodly sons and such as we haue gathered holie doctrine out of: but yet was the groundwoork of them euill. They tooke a generall ground quite besides the case which was, that Iob was punished for his misdeeds, and that he was to be taken for a wicked and cursed creature, seing that God vsed such rigour towards him.

Furthermore also they did set downe a false and vntoward doctrine: saying that God doth euen in this world handle men according to their deserts. But that were as much as to take away the hope of the euerlasting life, and to shet all fauorablenesse of God out of this frayle and transitorie life: and that were a turning of all things vpside downe. And therefore it behoueth vs too call these two points to remembrance, that we may knowe the ryghtnesse that is spokē of here. And to be short, we must note the text that I haue alledged out of the Psalme heretofore, namely that the man is blisfed which iudgeth discreetly of the poore that is in aduersitie: where the Prophet sheweth vs that when wee see anie man in aduersitie, Gods will is, that we should haue the discretnesse, not too condemne him at the first dash, but to looke vp hygher: that is to wit, [to consider] that aduersities do some tymes befall men for the chastizement of their sinnes: sometyne for the tryall of their pacience: sometime to present some faults which they might fall into: and also that God setteth thē foorth to be as mirrours, to the end that we seing their obedience might be edified therby: and sometimes for some other secret causes vnknewne to vs. Therefore let vs eschew rashnesse when we see God afflict any man roughly, and let vs not be too swift of iudgement to say that he is woorthie to be so handled, and to commend such as liue at their ease, as though they were better beloued of God: for that were too vnaduised a iudging, so it were. Then if we haue the discretion in vs to consider the causes that are noted to vs in the scripture: we shall find diuerse times, that such as are the excellent seruants of God, are handled moste rigorously: and it will seeme to vs that God is against them: but wee muste not iudge after our owne fancie. If wee vse that modestie, God will alwayes succour vs when we be afflicted: but if we be cruell, and foolish in giuing too hastie sentence, the like measure must be moten vnto vs also. Furthermore for the better vnderstanding of that whiche is saide heere, namely that Iob hath spoken ryghtly, and his freendes amisse: it behoueth vs to take this generall rule, that when a man is in forwardnesse to followe God and to feare him, he same shal be accepted, notwithstanding that he commit grosse faults: whereas if another man haue not the true feare of God rooted in him, although he haue apparant vertues that are very commendable before men, yet is all of it nothing worth, it is but starke filth. Looke (I say) vpon a man that feareth God, and is rightly and purely mynded to giue himselfe to welldoing: and yet notwithstanding he shall haue many infirmities: hee haltereth, hee staggereth, hee recleth, yea and sometimes falleth flat downe. Yea, but his faulkes which hee doth, are forgiven him, and God dothe still reach him his hande to lifte him vp, insomuch that al falleth out to his benefite, by cause the marke that hee aimeth at, is to goe vnto God, and his minde leadeh him still thitherward. On the contrarie parte, it maye come to passe (as I sayde) that a man shall bee greatly commended, that hee shall haue goodly vertues, and that hee shal doe things worthy of honor: and yet in the meane while he hath no good roote in him, but is either a despizer of God, or vnmercifull towards his neyghbor. Now if a man be such a one, none of the things that men honor in him can please God. Hereby we may vnderstand in what taking Iob was. Iob (as I haue erit said) had al his life long bin giuē to welding: he had bene a ryghtuouse man and one that feared God: yea and the sayd singlennesse of hart is purposely attributed vnto him hertofore, to shewe that our lyfe shal neuer be wel ruled, till we bee cleane rid of all finedness, and walke as in the sight of God, and not as before men, and that we be not doubleminded, but substantially grounded to giue ourselues wholly vnto God. This hath bin spoken expressly of Iob. As concerning the present cace, he indured the affliction patiently: neuertheless, in the end when he was tormented with extremitie, he fretted and chafed: and specially when men fell to stinging of him, then he forgate and ouershot himself, seeming to be minded to resist God in that there scaped fro him many vnadvised words. Iobs faults were these, that his patience hild not out as it ought to haue done, & that he playd the sole in his talk, namely in some particular sayings: but yet for all that he kept on stil to the marke that I spake of in the beginning, & how soeuer he swarue aside, yet slingeth he not quite away, but holdeth on his race though he go not altogether rightforth: like as when an archer shots at a mark, although he hit not the whyte suil, yet do men see that he aimed well at it if he shoote somewhat neere it. Euen so stood the cace with Iob. And that is the cause why God attributeth rightnesse vnto him. So then let vs learne, that if we haue a pure and holie intent, and seeke [earnestly] to do good: although we be weake, although we be wrapped in many vices, although we happen to stagger and to fall, and although in effect we deserue too be forsaken of God: Yet notwithstanding he beareth with vs, and hath not an eye to our infirmities and vices to cōdemne them without forgiuennesse. And that is the cause why it is sayd in the scripture, that such as giue themselves to the seruing of God and to the keeping of his law, are rightuouse: after which maner Zacharie & Elizabeth were ryghtuouse before God. How were they rightuouse? where is such a mā to be found, as it is sayd in the Psalme? Must not all of vs needs be condēned as wretched sinners, and all of vs haue our mouthes stopped? Yes verely. How be it besides that God had receyued Zacharie and Elizabeth to gouerne them by his holie spirit: he did also accept their desirousnesse of wel doing, as if there were nothing but perfectiō in our desires, which are vterly vnperfect. Our obedience is not such as it ought to be: but yet doth God accept it in good woorth, by cause that when men are [earnestly] desirous to serue him, he layeth not their imperfections to their charge. And thus ye see why he accepteth them for rightuouse. Now then although there be faults in vs, yet will God forgiue them, and they shal be buried in his mercie, so as he wil not faile to take vs as iust and rightuouse, so be it that our hart bend thitherward to honour him and to giue ourselues wholly to his obedience, as I sayd afore. And this ought to serue vs vnto two purposes. For we see first of all that the Papists are out of their witts when they take these texts to ground their merits vpon. O (say they) behold, here is mention made of rightnesse: ergo we deserue to Godward and haue pure and right harts to come vnto him. Alas wherof commeth this rightnesse? deserue we such a cōmendacion at the mouth of our God? And he might also condemne vs a hundred thousand times without shewing vs any fauour. How be it forasmuch as he wypeth out our faults and forgetteth them, & intēdeth not to haue any regard of them: therefore accepteth he vs for rightuouse. And therefore in this cace let vs acknowledge only his mere mercie and goodnesse, & let vs honour him for the same. And furthermore, seing it is sayd that our Lord is cōtented with vs, & accepteth the things for good and cōmendable, which notwithstanding are defiled: and that although there be much amisse & many great faults and imperfections in our works, and that we deserue to be abhorred of God, because we can bring nothing to him of our own, but filthinesse, yet notwithstanding he accepteth & receiue those works which are so stained with vices, as a sacrifice of smeete sent: we ought to take corage to do well. For seing it is so, ought we not to be the more inflamed to serue and honour him. Ye see then what we haue to mark in this verse. But by the way let vs mark also, that we may well do heroical acts (as men terme them) & behaue ourselues as vertuously & courteously as can be deuized, and men may carie vs vpon their shoulders, and yet all this shal bee nothing, except wee haue a liuely roote in our harts, and be desirous to serue God, as the mark that we haue taken to shoote at. It were much better to go the right way limping, than to make greates leapes and yet be neuer the further forward: yea, or to make great shewes, and in the meane whyle to haue our harts snarled in all wicked affections. Then let vs beware that wee couet not to be prayd much of men, but let vs always come vnder the gouernance of our Lord, that he may hold the brydle ouer vs, and we bethink vs to giue ourselues to him obediently. But by the way we haue here a sure & infallible record of the thing that hath bin treated of before: which is, that although Iob fayled in some point: yet he ceased not to haue a good cace, seing that God who is the only cōpetēt iudge thereof, auoweth it to be so. On the cōtrarie part, although his friends had faire colours & reasons that were very fauorable to seeming: yet are they misliked here: And why? I haue shewed you the two reasons before: wherof the one is, that they condemned Iob because he was strikē of Gods hand. So then, if we wil not haue our iudgement reuerfed from aboue, let vs learne to leaue iudging at aduerture when God chastizeth men, and let vs cōsider well the causes that are conteyned in holie scripture: and let vs do it, not only towards our neyghbours, but also towards ourselues. Doth God afflict vs? Let vs be wise, according also as when S. James speaketh of paciēce he purposely termeth it wisdom. And surely the grettest wisdom that we can haue, is that after we once knowe that God is our father and haue receiued the grace which he offereth vs in our Lord Iesus Christ: we cā take the afflictions mekly which he sendeth vs, & bowing downe our shoulders vnder them, sal to cōforting of ourselues in our miseries, & to cheering vp of ourselues in our sorrowes. That is the way for vs to be rightly taught in the schoole of our God. So then, wher soeuer God scourgeth vs, let vs not cōceiue any hartburning or bitternesse against him (for we shal gayne nothing by it) but rather let vs beare in mind what the holy scripture sheweth vs. Namely that it is needfull for vs too be mortified, because we be too much giuen to the world, & be loth to think vpon the heauenly life. If we had our own desires, in what plight should we be? But there is yet moreouer, that God knoweth how there are many secret rebellions in our flesh, and therefore we had neede to bee subdued as it were by mayne hand. And again, wee should not know what it is to obey him, if he shuld handle vs [always] after our own liking & with our ease. And therefore he is faine to chastise vs, & to play rough play with vs: howbeit, therein he procureth our welfare by trying vs, and by sending vs rough & troublesome things. For if we grudge not against him at those times: this is our obediēce wel allowed. And the thing that we haue to mark here, is that if we iudge discretly of the afflictions that God sendeth to vs, and likewise to our neyghbours: we shal haue the said rightnesse wherof God beareth witness here by his owne mouth. Now for a cōclusion it is sayd, that God findeth Eliphas and his companions vnto Iob, and cōmaundeth them to offer sacrifices, and sayeth that Iob shall find grace to the end that their sinnes may

may be forgiven them. Heere first of all we haue to marke, that although God rebuke Eliphaz and his companions after that maner: yet he woulde not driue them quite away: and that although condemnation were pronounced vpon them, yet was it not to the ende they shoulde suffer it, so as they should lie still there, vtterly throwne downe without remission. There are then two sortes of condemnation which God pronounceth vpon men: and of those two, the first may also be deuised intoo other two. Generally God condemneth vs, either to the ende to acquit vs when he shall haue found vs to be humbled: or else to destroy vs vtterly, as he doth the vnbeleeuers. Yet notwithstanding there are two sortes of condemnation which are to our welfare. The one is of such as are already faythfull, whom God chastizeth dayly. For although God account vs of his houholde, and that wee bee fully reconciled to him: yet haue we neede to be condemned, and to be stirred vp thereby continually more and more, that we may be ashamed of our selues, and bee sorie and hate our sinnes, and seeke the remedie of them, to the end to magnifie his mercie the more, which he sheweth to vs in that we obtaine forgiveness at his hand. Thus ye see there is a condemnation which god layeth vpon his chosen, notwithstanding that they be at one with him, and he haue taken them into his flocke. And there is yet another condemnation which is healthfull also, and that is of such as are after a sort strangers from gods Church, and haue none acquaintance with him, according as we see how he condemned Saint Paule at such tyme as he was a persecuter. And euen in the person of Saint Paule wee may the better vnderstande the thing which I intende to say: for if I shoulde alledge twoo seuerall persons, the thing woulde not be so easie to be vnderstood. Beholde, Saint Paule was so wicked a man, as ye woulde haue thought he had bene vtterly past recouerie: and yet was he one of Gods chosen. He was marked out afore hande from his mothers wombe to bee an Apostle: and yet notwithstanding hee seemed not to be of Gods Church, but rather an vtter enimie to it. Neuerthelater God condemned him when he did beate him downe, and ridde him of the pride wherewith he was inflamed before, and made him in that cace as a poore slaue. That burthen was verie heauie to him, and it was a condemnation to him: yea, but yet was it to his welfare. It was meeete that the same pride of his shoulde be subdued and beaten downe, by force. Ye see then how it was a healthfull condemnation, but yet was it of a man vtterly estranged from God, & which seemed to be quite past hope of recouerie. Now after that Saint Paule was once condemned after that fashion, and therby brought into the folde of Gods flock, so as he became a sheepe, yea and therwithall also a shepheard, & was not onely one of the lambes of Iesus Christ, but also a shepherde of his flocke: yet behoued it him to be condemned againe. As howe? God buffeted him. For hee sayth that God gaue Satan leaue too giue hym buffets, as it were in way of reproche, to the intent hee shoulde not exalt himselfe by reason of the highnesse of the Reuelations which God had giuen him, and it behoued him too haue that counterpoyson too driue out the poyson of pride, and to keepe him from it. Thus we see in Saint Pauls person, that there are two maners of condemning which are to our welfare. Wee see the like in this present place, where Iobs freendes bee condemned to their owne saluation. For thereby God openeth them the gate, and sheweth them that they may hope for pardon, if they come too him with true repentance. But yet doth he draw backe from them, so as hee commeth not familiarly vnto them as he did to Iob, neither graunteth he them accessse and entrance vnto him, but by the meane that is expressed heere: that is to wit, that Iob shoulde make intercession for them. Heere therefore we see two diuerse examples of Gods mercie. And although he handle men after diuerse fashions: yet must wee alwayes consider that hee procureth the welfare of those whom he hath not vtterly forsaken. And thereby wee be taught to take all the corrections patiently whiche God sendeth. And although he seeme not too handle vs as his children, but to take vs as strangers: yet let vs nor cease to hope that he will pitie vs at length, & turne the condemnation whiche wee shall haue indured for a time, to our benefite and soulehealth. Now although we cannot lay forth all that is spoken heere concerning Sacrifices: yet must we note in one worde, that God in no time receyued men to mercie without sacrifices. And that was to betoken that if we will obteyn forgiveness of our sinnes, wee must haue recourse too the Sacrifice that was offered vp once for all for our redemption. For so long as Iesus Christ is not the meane betweene God and vs: we must continue accursed, forlorne, and hopelesse. Beholde, God being the wellspring of all righteoufnesse, sheweth himselfe an enimie of all sinne. But sin dwelleth in vs: therefore must God needes be at open warre with vs, and his vengeance must light vpon vs, yea and tarye vpon vs for euer: and there is no shift to scape from it, but by resorting to the Sacrifice whereby we haue bene once reconcyled vnto him. And therefore let vs marke, that wee bee so much the lesse to be excused nowadays, after that Christ hath suffered his death and passion, if we thinke to be quit before God by any other meane, than by the cleansing which Christ hath made, [for for any other cause] than for that hee hath made satisfaction for vs, to discharge vs of the condemnation of death wherein we were. Then if we seeke to obteyne mercie, (as we haue need to do, and as which is the onely meane whereby for vs to come vnto God) wee must alwayes beare in minde the death and passion of our Lorde Iesus Christ, who is the sacrifice of our redemption and attonement. When we go this way too woork, let vs not doubt but that inasmuch as our Lorde hath shewed himselfe pitiful towards such as offended in the time of the figures of the lawe, yea and extended his mercie to those that were not the bodie of his [peculiar] people: hee will also receyue vs at this day, seeing that the Gospell is published thorough the whole worlde, and that he hath made a common league as well with the Gentiles, as with the Iewes, so as there is no more any w. l. to put difference betwixt them. Let vs not doubt (I say) but that if we haue recourse vnto God by meanes of the sayd Sacrifice: he will preuent vs, to the intent that hauing obteyned fauor at his hande, we may be assured of our saluation.

Epb. 2. 6. 14.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him too cleanse vs more and more from them, and that whensoever we bee rebuked by him, he will therwithall make vs too feele his fatherly goodnesse, so as wee may haue whereof to take comfort in our aduersities, and not bee greeued though hee beginne too chastize vs, and in the meane while spare the wretched vnbeleeuers: knowing that by that meane hee declareth too vs, that seeing hee hath chosen vs to himselfe, hee will not haue vs too perishe. And therefore [let vs pray him] that hee suffer not his rodde to be vnprofitable to vs, so as we shoulde abyde still hardened in oure sinnes: but that hee wyll drawe vs to him throughly, that we may with all lowliness acknowledge our sinnes, and bee sorie for them in our heartes: yea and also protest before men how much we be bound vnto his mercie, to the end that our neighbors may be edified by vs, and one of vs draw another to the glorifying of him in all our whole life : and for the doing hereof, it may please him to stirre vp true, &c.

The.clix.Sermon, which is the thirde vpon the.xlij.Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the eight verse, and then vpon the Text insuing.

9. Then Eliphaz the Themanite, and Baldad the Suhite, and Sophat the Naamathite, vvent and did as God had commaunded : and the Lorde receyued the face of Iob.
10. And the Lorde turned the captiuitie of Iob vwhen he prayed for his freendes, and he blisfed the latter state of Iob more than the first.
11. And al his brethren, and al his sisters came vnto him, and all they that had bin of his acquaintance before : and they eate vvith him in his house, and had compassion of him, and comforted him, of all the aduersitie vvwhich the Lorde had caused to come vpon him : and he receyued of eche of them a peece of siluer, and of ech of them an ornament of golde.
12. And the Lorde blisfed the latter state of Iob more than the first, insomuch that hee had, xiiij. thousand sheepe, six thousand Camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, & a thousand Sheeaffes.
13. Also he had seuen sonnes and three daughters.
14. And he called the name of one, Iemima, and the name of another, Kezia : and the name of the thirde, Kerenhapuk.
15. And there vvwere not founde more fayrer vvomen in all the Countrey, than Iobs daughters : and their father gaued them inheritance among their brethren.
16. And after these things, Iob liued a hundred and fortie yeates, and he savv his sonnes and his sonnes sonnes vnto the fourth generation.
17. And he died aged and full satisfied vvith dayes.

WEE haue seene howe God in rebuking Iobs freendes, would not leaue them hopelesse, but called them to repentance by telling them that hee would heare them, and haue pitie vpon them. And so ye see that corrections are profitable too vs, when God shetteth not the gate agaynst vs, but sheweth vs that he is readie to receyue vs to mercie. For otherwise what should it boot vs to be couicted of our sinnes? We should be drowned in dispayre, if we toke not hold of Gods mercie: and so should we neuer bee touched with true earnestnesse to repent vs of our euill doings, but rather wexe hardhearted, so as we should chafe vpon the brydle, and there should be none amendment in vs. Therefore let vs marke well, that God worketh men a singular benefite, when after his causing of them to feele their owne naughtinesse, hee sheweth them that yet notwithstanding they shall obteyne fauour if they seeke it. But heerevvithall we haue seene also, that God commaunded those men to bring their sacrifices to Iob, to the end that he should pray for them: and that was too humble them. For although God shewe himseife gentle and welminded towardes vs: yet haue we neede that he should partly shew himseife hard to be intreated of vs. Yea and that is to make vs haue a disliking of our sinnes: for oftentimes it seemeth sufficient to vs to haue giuen one good sigh and away (as we commonly say in our tongue) and so we do as it were but dally with God. Repentance ought to make vs vtterly dismayd, and it ought to strike vs with feare whē we cōsider Gods wrath, which is able to ouerwhelme vs vtterly. We thinke not vpon that, but wee passe ouer it, as we would passe ouer whote burning coles as they say. In this respect it is good and profitable for vs, that our Lorde should as it were reyne vs short, and shew vs that there is yet still some naughtinesse lurking in vs, the which it standeth vs in hande too perceyue better. Then Gods asoording of so large penywoolles of his

mercie vnto men, is to the intent they should alwayes bee the more humbled, and cal to mind the faults which they haue committed. That therefore is the reason why it is said in this text, that Iob should pray for those that had offended. But yet notwithstanding, it is not to be doubted, but that as well by the sacrifices as by Iobs person, God ment too shewe that men haue neede of some meane or Mediator, to make them way to him, and to cause them to finde fauour according as we see, that in the law, God had ordeyned the high Priest to enter alone into the Sanctuarie, in the name of all the people, and that all men else should stande aloofe, acknowledging themselues vnworthie to preace neere the presence of God. For that was to betoken, that without a Mediator to go in vnto God on oure behalfe, it should neuer bee lawfull for vs to pray vnto him: and good right also is it that wee should bee hilde scorne of and shette out. Nowe then Iob hilde heere the roome and office of a Preeft when hee made intercession for his freendes: but hee tooke it not vpon him of his owne head: for that had beene to great presumption in him. It behoued him to sewe vnto God for [other mennes] pardon, and yet coulde not hee himseife come thither withoute a Mediator and Aduocate: and howe then coulde hee haue obteyned grace for all the rest, if God had not ioyned him that charge? And so as touching the present act, God appoynted Iob too bee a Preeft, and it behoued him so to be. For (as the Apostle sayeth) no man ought to take that honour vpon him, saving he that is appoynted by God: and such a one is a true and lawfull Preeft, like as Iesus Christ himseife was, who thoughte hee bee mayster in the Church, and the heade of men and Angelles, and sitteth in the glorie of God his father: did yet notwithstanding not thrust in himseife, but was called therevntoo with a solemne othe by him that sayde too him, I haue sworne and will not repent, thou art a Preeft for euer after the order of Melchisedecke.

Then let vs marke well that whereas Iob is set foorth here here for a Preeft: it is to the ende that wee should gather thereof, that whensoever we haue to seeke forgiueneſſe of our finnes, euery of vs muſt not thruſt forth himſelfe without hauing any better meane: but conſider that it is the office of Ieſus Chriſt to giue vs acceſſe, and to open vs the gate, and to bring vs to the preſence of god his father, to the end we may be heard there, and that the throne of Maieſtie may not be terrible but amiable to vs. Now if this were done in the time of the lawe, yea and euen among thoſe to whome God communicated not himſelfe ſo familiarly: what ſhall we do in theſe dayes when we haue a full declaration that Ieſus Chriſt is the only Aduocate which maketh interceſſion for vs, to the intent that our ſutes may be well receyued? And heerein appeareth the vnthankfulneſſe of the worlde. For what hath bene the cauſe of ſeeking ſo many Aduocates and Patrones, and that euery man hath had a ſeueral deuotion to bring himſelfe in vnto God, but by cauſe men haue not knowne the office of our Lorde Ieſus Chriſt? So then let vs marke, that whenſoever any of vs offendeth, hee muſt not ſteppe raſhly to the heavenly throne, but come thither by the meanes of him that is appoynted for the purpoſe. And then are we ſure that God will not ſhake vs off, for we haue his promiſe, whiche cannot deceyue vs. But if wee come thither geerily or at aduenture, it ſhall not boote vs a whitte. In like caſe is it with the Sacrifices that are ſpoken of heere: For the prayers were neuer heard without the Sacrifice. And why? For God intended to ſhewe that of good right, men are vnworthie to come vnto him, by cauſe all haue deſerued death, and therefore that their comming thither ſhould be but their deſtruction. Therefore all they that euer minded to obteyne fauour, haue brought ſome Sacrifices with them, too conſeſſe that they were in daunger of Gods iudgement, & that they could not be deliuered otherwiſe than by Sacrifice.

The verie Heathen men haue alſo followed the ſame: but they vnderſtode not to what ende: [and therefore] it was but onely a witneſſe agaynſt themſelues. Neuertheleſſe it was Gods will to leaue a preſident through the whole worlde, whereby men ſhoulde acknowledge that there was nothing but damnation in themſelues, and that they could not be ridde of it, except their finnes were blotted out by making ſome amendes. But nowe haue we the truth of it reueled vnto vs in the Goſpell: which is, that as oft as we pray before God, wee muſt haue our recourſe too the death and paſſion of oure Lorde Ieſus Chriſt: for we cannot otherwiſe be reconciled vnto him, and therefore our prayers muſt be beſprinkled with the bloud which he did ſhed to waſh away our ſpottes. Thus ye ſee howe we may become acceptable vnto God, notwithstanding that of good right he be our mortall enimie, and that as we haue made warre vnto him, ſo his vengeance and curſe lie vpon vs, that is to wit, by comming vnto him with the Sacrifice that was offered by our Lorde Ieſus Chriſt, and by applying the ſame to our uſe, to the intent that we & our prayers may be bliſſed and throughly accepted of God: for then will hee not fayle too receyue vs into fauour. How be it, it is to be noted here, that whereas God ſayth to the end I do no follie vnto you, (for ſo is it worde for worde in the text:) that maner of ſpeech woulde be ſomewhat with the hardeſt. But if wee marke what is written in the eighteenth Pſalme, wee ſhall haue a plainc and eaſie declaration of this ſaying. It is ſayde that God will handle men according as hee findeth them. VVith the frowarde (ſayeth hee) I will deale frowardly. This may ſeeme verie ſtraunge: neuertheleſſe, it proueth not that God chaungeth his purpoſe or is like vnto vs: but onely importeth that wee ſhall finde God to be a rough ryder to a rough horſe (as the prouerbe ſayth.) For if we be ſtubborne and ſtiffe-necked, ſo as wee will not bowe: God will come vpon vs with maine blowes of the beerie. Then it might ſeeme vnto vs, that God is terrible and ſeerce. According therefore as wee finde God too be, and as wee conceyue him too be in our fancie when hee ſtryketh vpon vs: ſuch a one is hee ſayde too be, althoughe no change can light vpon his Maieſtie. As muche is to be ſayde of this text. It is ſayde to the end I do no follie with you: as though our Lorde ſhoulde ſay, too the end that I handle you not according too your follie and frowardneſſe: for the worde importeth that alſo.

Too the intent then that I execute not my vengeance vpon you, that is to ſay, to the intent I handle you not after ſuche faſhion as you haue deſerued: looke that ye go to my ſeruant Iob. This is according to that which I haue ſayde already: namely that for as much as Iobs frends hauing knowledge of their offences were not yet ſufficiently ſubdued: God was ſaine too diſcouer their ſhame further, and too make them perceyue that if hee ſhoulde handle them as they were worthie, it woulde be a terrible dealing too them: and therefore that when Iob came as a meane betwixt them with his prayers, then he woulde be at one with them. And therewithall their obedience is declared, in that they did as God had commaunded them. And heerein we ſee howe men are chaunged when God ſpeaketh to them effectually, not only by making the heare his voyce with their eares, but alſo by making them too receyue it into their harts. For before that time Iobs frends had taken him for a reprobate, and gaue iudgement vpon him without admitting any excuſe. They ſpake luſtily agaynſt him as though he had bin but ſome ſillie worme of the earth, or ſome vylle thing than a worme. But nowe they come to him, yea euen with intreatance. For god hath bereft them of the pryde that blinded them before. Lo then what change followeth when wee be humbled before God, and that hee hath ſo ſpoken in our hearts, as we knowe what wee be. For there is nothing that keepeth vs from walking in feare, and from vtter abacing of our ſelues, but that we be ſotted with a fooliſh ouerweening, to thinke our ſelues too be that which we be not. Therefore God muſt be ſaine to teach vs. For all the men in the worlde cannot mend this fooliſhe pride w<sup>ch</sup> w<sup>ch</sup>re with we be puffed vp, till God haue put to his hande. But beſides that Iobs frendes had forgotten the pride wherewith they had ere whyles bene caried away, they did alſo ſhewe theyr repentance in obeying God: and in verie deede the true frute that ſheweth the roote to be good, which otherwiſe ſhoulde lie hidde in the heart, is that we induer too obey Gods ordinaunce. And that alſo is the cauſe why it is ſayde in the Actes. Men and brethren, what ſhall wee doo? Act. 2. f. 37. VVhen Saint Peter had as it were thundered agaynſt thoſe that had ere whyles deſpyſed oure Lorde Ieſus Chriſt: it is ſayde that they beeing wounded in theyr hartes, and pricked inwardly with remorse, ſaid what ſhal we do? They offered themſelues vnto God, to followe whatſoever hee ſhoulde commaunde them. Therefore wee ſee the like frute of Repentance in this Text: For Iobs frends vpon knowledge and putting away of the ſonde ouerweening wherewith they had been hild before, come and do all that God willed them. And ſo whenſoever wee bee throughly humbled before God, ſo as we be diſpleaſed with our ſelues: we ſhal alſo haue a willingneſſe and deſire to ſubmit our ſelues too Gods worde:

16.

Pſ. 18. d. 27
Leu. 26. d. 23

For it is one peece of our ouerweening, to do the things that we haue ymagined in our owne braine. And when wee will needes bee ouerwise, wee cannot obey God : but when we be vterly bereft of all pride, then we know that God ought to haue authoritie to tel vs what is good for vs to doo, and that there is nothing else for vs to doo, but to submit our selues without any gainfaying. Nowe it is added immediately, that God receyued the face of Iob, and turned his captiuitie, or was turned at his repentance, when he prayed for his freendes. Seeing it is so that God regarded the face of Iob, and accepted his prayer, forso- much as he had appoynted him to bee a preeft : I pray you haue not wee a much better certentie, seeing our euerlasting Aduocate who is entered into the Sanctuarie of heauen, that is to wit our Lorde Iesus Christ, shall neuer be refused, nor wee neyther if we come to God hys father by his meanes, holding euermore the way and furtherance that hee hath giuen vs? Beholde, Iob was a poore man, and euen entering into the high way to blaspheme God : and although hee did holde himselfe in pacience in the winding vp, yet had he such pangues as made him to sling ouer the feeldes, inso much that he offended God greuously, as I haue declared heeretofore : and yet for all that, when God inioyned him that office of praying, he heard him : not onely for himselfe, but also for straungers, yea and for such as had bene his enemies, and were as good well neere as separated from God. For they had vterly peruerted his woorde, and beaten downe and destroyed the hope of the endlesse life that is to come, as I haue sayde afore : and yet notwithstanding, Iob obteyneth grace for them. Nowe if it be sayde that God made that thing auaylable, which was but a little dimme shadowe : what shall bee done nowe that hee hath appoynted his owne onely sonne to bee the Preeft, and commaunded him, not too offer vp Goates and Calues or sheepe, but to offer vp both his bodie and soule in Sacrifice? Seeing then that the Sonne of God hath in his owne person offered himselfe for our redemption, and to do away all our sinnes, and ceaseth not to make intercession for vs still : shoulde we doubt of obteyning forgiuenesse for his sake, or of being alwayes receyued with all louingnesse and fauour at Gods hande? But (as I haue touched already) the naughty- nesse of the worlde sheweth it selfe in this, that men can not content themselues with one mediatour alone. The Papiests runne seeking to their Heefaints and Sheefaints, to be their Patrones and Aduocates. And what is the cause thereof? For that they yeeld not so much worship vnto Iesus christ, as to acknowledge that he hath bought them with his death and passion. They can wel ynough call him sonne of God, & Redeemer : but they acknow- ledge him not for their Aduocate, neyther flee they too him for succour to their Aduocate, neyther flee they too him for succour to their Aduocate, neyther flee they too him, they heare no rydings of it among them. And on our side, do we our dutie as becommeth vs? I speake of those that are duely taught. For as oft as wee shoulde pray vnto God : the euerlasting Sacrifice whereby redemption hath bene purchased for vs, ought too come to our remembrance and before our eyes. But we neuer thinke vpon it but at a glance : and there are manie so grosse and beastly, that although they ought to haue their eares deafe with hearing that Iesus Christ is our Aduocate : yet can they not discern betweene God and oure Lorde Iesus Christ, inso much that when they should call vpon the father in the name of our Lorde Iesus Christ, they wote not whither there bee any Aduocate that maketh intercession for vs or no. But it is no maruell enough our Lord do oftentimes so dazle mens eyes to the ende to turne them away from the meane of furtherance which he hath giuen them by his worde. For they be turned away by their own malicioufnesse, and haue shet the gate agaynst themselues, that they might haue none ac- cesse vnto God to call vpon him : according also as wee knowe that there is no opening, except wee haue Iesus Christ for our spokelman, whome they haue forsaken. And that is, bicause the diuell hath at all tymes so labou- red to put forth sonde ymaginations to carie away men hither and thither. But let vs keepe our selues from gad- ding out : and rather sithe wee see that God hath heard men by meanes of their Sacrifices, so that the Preeftes of the lawe entered not in vaine into the Sanctuarie that was made with mans handes, and was corruptible, when as they brought no better thing with the than the bloud of a beast : let vs be sure that nowe our Lord Iesus Christ will make vs too finde God pitifull and fauourable to- warden vs, so as we shall be receyued to mercie, doubtlesse if our prayers be grounded vpon the Sacrifice which hee hath offered, and that wee acknowledge howe it belon- geth to him to carie worde for vs, and to cause vs too be heard. Heerewithall we haue also to marke howe it is sayde heere, that God made Iobs captiuitie to turne, or was turned at his repentance : for so may the wordes bee ta- ken. But the playnest translation is, that he turned Iobs captiuitie, so as the anguish wherein he was, was taken a- way : or else, his captiuitie, that is to say, his cattell and substance [that had bene taken away from him] were restored againe. But howsoeuer it was, it betokeneth that in the ende God had pitie vpon his seruant. Yea and it is purposely expressed to haue come to passe, when Iob prayed for his freendes, that is to say, for those that had per- secuted him, as we haue seene afore. And heerein we see that if wee loue our enimyes, and procure their welfare and saluation : it shall bee to our owne benefite and pro- fite, and God will make the blissing to returne vpon vs. VVe be diuerse tymes afrayde least wee shoulde bee too gentle and kinde hearted when men haue offended vs : and this diuelish prouerbe, that if a man play the sheepe, the wolfe will eate him vp, is too much practised. That is the cause why we be so wedded to our owne reuenge, when men haue troubled vs or done vs any wrong. It seemeth to vs that in forgiuing, we bee layde open to all reproche, and that our enimies will take the more bold- nesse at it agaynst vs. But it behoueth vs to let all those fancies go : for God hath taken the charge of vs himselfe, and hath giuen vs a good Shepheard, euen oure Lorde Iesus Christ, who hath promised too keepe vs. And fur- thermore let vs marke well, that when wee pray for such as vex vs, the same blissing will light vpon vs. If it please God that it take place : it is verie well : whereas they were enimies before, nowe they shall bee our brethren. And if they continue wilfull in their malice, yet will our Lorde make all the requestes to redounde to our selues, which we shall haue made for them. Thus ye see why it is purposely sayde, that God looked mercifully vpon Iob, when he had prayed for those that had so misused him, as we haue seene. And so it behoueth vs to call to minde howe Saint James sayth, you haue heard of the pacience of Iob, & seene what ende and issue God gaue him. Now he sheweth vs that the afflictions which god sendeth vpon his children, last but a while, and that the end of the is right happie, so as it is farre better for them to be so af- flicted for a time, than to liue alwayes at their ease. For if God should spare them too much, there were not that ma which would not fall asleepe in this worlde : VVe shoulde no more knowe what obedience were : the lustes of our flesh would play the restiue iades : and we woulde thinke vpon vpon nothing but this present transitorie life. Therefore let vs vnderstande, that when God afflicteth his faithfull ones, first it is not of purpose to presse them to the vitermoeste: for hee knoweth what they bee able too beare: and Saint Paule sayeth accordingly, that forasmuch as God is faythfull, he will not suffer vs to be tempted beyonde that which we be able to beare. And furthermore he sheweth in the ende, that we haue cause to wish to be so beaten with Gods scourges, according as Dauid saith, Lorde it was good for me that thou didst chastise me. Insomuch that we may alwayes glorie in our aduersities and corrections. That is the thing which it behoueth vs too marke in this streyne. For it is not for Iobs sake that this was written, that God blisfed his latter state more than his first, that he doubled his goodes and substance whiche were verie great afore, that hee gaue him sonnes and daughters, & that he lengthned his life, so as he saw the children that came of his owne race vnto the fourth generation, after he had scene himselfe at so lowe an ebbe. True it is that here the holy ghost ment too leaue a memoriall of the gracious goodnesse that God shewed vpon the person of Iob: howbeit, that was not for his instruction, but for ours. Then is it not without cause that Saint James hath set vs downe this selfesame mirrour, saying: my freends, true it is that it is a hard and troublesome thing to kepe pacience when men are tormented: it is agaynst their nature. Howbeit, in the ende God turneth all things in such wise too their welfare, as they perceyue it was much better for them to haue bene so afflicted, than to haue bene to much & too tenderly borne withall and cockered. To be short, whe soeuer we are troubled with aduersitie, I meane not only of body, but also when we haue such hartbytings as set vs in a chafe, and tempt vs to dispayre, or to carpe against God: let vs bethink vs of the things which we haue read of Iob and of his pacience. For if wee compare his aduersities with all the aduersities that we be able to beare: we shall certenly finde that in him God ment to set oute a myrroure that passed al the temptations and troubles that dayly befall the Godly. See how Iob was on the one side spoyled of all his substance: hee had bene rich, and as a Prince in his Countrey: he is vtterly bereft of all things, and hath neither house nor any thing eise left him: besides this, yee see he was also bereft of his children: hys wife spyted him and was agaynst him: As for his bodie, behold, it was as a rotten carion, such a one as men would be loth to looke vpon, according as we haue scene him complaine that his skinned cleaued too his bones, yea and how it hath bene sayd that he scraped of the rottennesse of his fleshe [with a postherd.] This was a terrible sight, but yet were not the things that Iob suffered both in his goodes, and in his children, and in his wife, and in hys bodie, the cheefe things that he indured. All those were nothing in comparison of the anguise that hee abode, when hee sawe that God was agaynst him: and that also is the thing whereat he was greued when hee made his complaintes, saying: VVhat nowe? VVhy doth not God take me away? VVhy am I not rased out of the worlde?

 Must I linger here after this sort? And seeing I am but a poore frayle creature, why doth God presse me so greeuously? Iob then was in great trouble, when he saw that God was his aduersarie partie, and that he on his side wist not why. Now seeing it is so: it must not greue vs if we be meanly afflicted, and that God chastice vs according to our infirmitie, euerie man in his owne behalfe: wee must not thinke it straunge: but let vs resort to this storie which is written for our learning, and therevpon haue an eye to the ende. For if we looke no further but too the extremite wherein Iob was during the time that God persecuted him: alas wee shall bee vtterly dismayde, and there is none of vs all but he shall vtterly quayle, saying: VVhat booteth it a man to serue God, seeing that suche as haue walked in his feare, are most vnfortunate? But when we looke vpon the ende: that is the thing wherein we haue wherewith to comfort our selues: namely, first of all (as I haue sayde) bycause the afflictions of Gods children last but a while: and secondly they serue them for [salues &] medicines: and [moreouer] the end of the is alwayes happie: insomuch that they haue euer cause to glorifie God, not onely when he deliuereth them, but also bycause he mortifyeth all their wicked lustes: and also therein they haue a better confirmation of the doctrine, in that whereas our Lorde Iesus Christ is the liue-ly Image of all the faythfull children of God, they bee made conformable too him, as Saint Paule declareth in the eight to the Romaynes, that in all our aduersities wee be shaped like to the Image of our Lorde Iesus Christ, who is the eldest sonne in the house of God. And truly if we looke but onely vpon the crosse of Iesus Christ, it is cursed by Gods owne mouth: we shall see nothing there but shame and terrour: and to be short, it will seeme that the verie gulfe of hell is open to swallow vp Iesus Christ. But whe we ioyne his resurrection to his death, behold wherwith to comfort vs, beholde wherewith to asswage al our sorrowes, to the ende we be not ouer sorowfull when soeuer it shall please God to afflict vs. And this was purposely fulfilled in our Lorde Iesus Christ, to the intent we should knowe that this was not written for any one person onely: but to the intent that all of vs shoulde vnder-stand, that the sonne of God wil make vs partakers of his life if we live with him, and partakers of his glorie, if we beare all the shames and aduersities which it shall please God to lay vpon our shoulders, according also as S. Paule speaketh of it in another place. VVee see then that the cause why this is rehersed to vs, is that we should not be vtterly dismayde, when wee see that God afflicteth vs, nor conceyue any such sorow as should shet vp our harts and hold vs prisoners so as we might receiue no comfort: but that we should alwayes haue an eye to the end which God hath promised to his children, according as he hath shewed by effect, as well in Iob, as also in Dauid, and others, but cheeflyest in our Lorde Iesus Christ, who is the true and cheefe patterne of all the faithfull. True it is that it doth not comonly fal out that God doubleth his benefites towardes such as haue bene afflicted, so as it may be scene that they be farre rycher than they were before, & that they haue children and offspring, and all that is to be desired to the worldwarde. This is not alwayes scene: for God handieth vs not after one egall rate: he knoweth what is fitte for euery man, and it behoueth vs to frame our selues to receyue our portion in suche wise as it shall please him to deale it vnto vs, as at a householders hande which knoweth well what is meete for his household. But howsoeuer the worlde go, it behoueth vs to take it for a generall rule, that God will not onely bring our afflictions to an ende, but also make them to turne to our welfare, so as we shall perceyue that he forgot vs not, at such time as he afflicted vs, but rather shewed himselfe continually a father towardes vs, in that he suffered vs not too fall too fast asleepe in this worlde. As for the temporall blisings, well may wee take them also as God sendeth them: howbeit let vs haue an eye to the principal: which is, that if there were nothing else but that we bee confirmed in Gods goodnesse, that wee haue the greater assurance of his ayde, and that our fayth is alwayes exercised when we be afflicted: is not that verie much? The man that scarce knewe how awaylable Gods fauor is to helpe vs vs at our need, doth in affliction see that God strength-neth him in such wise by his holy spirite, that he beareth the affliction meekly: & when he is deliuered, the knoweth he that god did put to his hand: & therupon he gathe-reth that seeing god hath assited him for one brūt, he wil neuer faile him after. If we had none other thing, but that on the one side we see the help that God giueth vs: and secondly that he worketh in vs by his holy spirit, to the intent we should not quaille: and finally sheweth vs by experience that he is redy to help vs at all times: I say if we had no more but that: were it not an inestimable profite? But there is yet more: which is, that God maketh vs to perceiuē our infirmities which we knew not before: & ther-by we be the more prouoked to cal vpō him, as though he had whetted vs therevnto. And on the other side, whereas we had taken the corrections to come by haphazarde, we be taught to receyue them as at his hand, & to make our profit of thē. And again, whē we be so striken down we be the better disposed to seke for the heauenly life: for such as royit it out to the worldward, do turne away frō God.

 Contrariwise, when we bee ouermaistred, and God hath cast vs downe to the ground, and we be brought so lowe & feeble as we wote not where to becom: it is to the end to make vs to cleaue vnto him, and to taste better of the spirituall welfare that is prepared for vs. Then if we had none other things than these, ought we not to know that the things which are written of Job are performed in vs, and that we haue a true example of them? Therefore let vs suffer God to handle vs, and to deale his benefites to vs as he himselfe shall see good. But howsoeuer we fare, let vs assure our selues that the end shal alwayes be happie. And truly if there were none other thing but this, that afflictions serue to bring vs to the glorie of our lord Iesus christ, and that whē we be once taken out of this world, we shall be in companie with the sonne of God and his Angels: ought we not to honor thē? And although they be sharpe and hard to our flesh: yet notwithstanding haue we not whereof to reioyce cōtinually, and to yeeld thanks vnto God, specially when he deliuereth vs out of our present miseries? Howbeit, forasmuch as all could not be discharged at length, and it is ynough to haue a short summe of the things that are sayd here: I forbeare to speake now of the bewtie of Iobs daughters: for in effect the scripture mēt to betokē, that God made him to prosper in such wise to the worldward, as we may see with our eyes that he fauored him, yea euen beyond the commōrate. And let vs not thinke it strange, that God would in those dayes vter his loue towards the faithfull, by earthly and transitorie prosperitie. For the heauenly life was not then so perfectly discovered, as it is nowadayes by the Gospell. Iesus Christ was not yet manifested, who came downe hither to lift vs vp, and clothed himselfe with our flesh, to shew that God dwelleth in vs, and hath ioyned vs to his glorie & immortalitie. These things were not yet come to passe, and therefore it behoued the faithfull to be handled partly like little children. And that is the cause why that when the auncient fathers are spoken of in the scripture, it is purposely said that God blisshed them in their offspring, in their cattell, in their possessions, and in such other things, and specially in length of life. And why so? It was for thē to be helped by those meanes in wayting till the heauenly life were discovered vnto vs, vnto whom our Lord Iesus Christ hath opened the gate of Paradise by his comming, to make vs mount vp aloft with him. Then if God make not vs nowe to prosper so much to the worldwarde, we must not be greued at it: for our state is not worse thā the state of the auncient fathers: we haue a farre better recompence which ought to comfort vs. For example, let vs take but only that which is said cōcerning long life. God in his law hath highly esteemed the long life that he gaue to the faithfull. And yet notwithstanding many vnbeliee-uers and vter reprobates haue liued long. Therefore we must not rest there, forasmuch as it is a benefite that may be cōmon as well to Gods enemies, as to his frends: It is not the souereine good thing, it is not the true & perfect happinesse: no, it cometh farre short of it. But we must also adde the second point: which is, that the fathers of old time knewe not yet so perfectly as wee do, that God had prepared thē an heritage in heauē. True it is that they had some tast of it, & they had the same faith which we haue: but yet had they no such opening as we haue in our Lord Iesus Christ. Therefore it was meet that God should let thē liue long, and make them to profit [in knowledge] by lōg expēiēce in the world. Lo why Iob liued long time. Now adayes our life is shorter, & that is bicause Iesus Christ is appeared vnto vs, & hath shewed vs that we are but straūgers in this worlde, that wee might runne to the heritage which is purchased by his blood. The thing that was then but in shadowes, was to be confirmed by vniuersall benefites.

 But now we haue the substance: the shadowes & figures are past: we haue the bodie of thē in our Lord Iesus christ: Col. 2. c. 17. therefore we must be contented with whatsoeuer God giueth vs, and referre our selues wholly to his guiding. And furthermore let vs vnderstand, that we must be cōtented with the life that we haue liued, whēsoeuer it shal please God to take vs out of the world. True it is that when the scripture speaketh so of Iob & Abrahā, that they died old men and full satisfied with dayes: it is to expresse the tem-porall blisning that I haue spoken of. But howsoeuer they fared, neither Iob, nor Abrahā, nor such other like would euer haue bin satisfied with liuing in this worlde, if they had not aimed at a better & more excellent end. Ye see thē how it was requisit that God should prolong their life: to the end to giue them the longer experience of his goodnesse: which thing is not nowe so requisite for vs, which haue a more large declaration of Gods fatherly loue towards vs. Therefore it behoueth vs to be satisfied with our life, and to dispose our selues to die when it shall please God, so as we may go hence with a glad hart, & not with gnashing of our teeth as the vnbelieuers do. For if they had liued a hundred thousand yeres, yet would they fain tary here beneath stil: for they haue none other hope but of this present life, & it seemeth to thē that death dispat-cheth all. And that is the cause why they are neuer redy to go out of the world. Contrariwise the fathers of old time were wont to confirme their faith by the length of the life which God gaue thē: and therewithall disposed thēselues to depart whensoeuer God listeth to take them hence too himselfe. And what ought we on our side to do nowadays?
 I haue told you alredie that we must not loke to liue long to take knowledge of gods fatherly loue therby: for if we liued but three dayes in this world, it were ynough to giue vs a tast of Gods goodnesse & mercie, and to cōfirme our faith. For seeing that our Lord Iesus Christ hath died and is risen again, we need no long time in this world to know that God is our father, and that we be sure of our saluation. Therefore as soone as he giueth vs knowledge of the truth of his Gospell, let vs alwayes be readie to die, assuring our selues that he hath adopted vs for his children, and that he will shew himselfe our father both in life and death. Ye see then that we must alwayes bee satisfied with life, seeing that God hath giue vs so good a pledge of his loue in our Lorde Iesus Christ, and we must not desire to haue our life prolonged here, to the end to haue a larger confirmation thereof. VVherfore let vs continually pray him, that hauing guided vs cōtinually with his holy spirit, he

Gen. 25. a. 7.

he will draw vs [hence] to himselfe: and that wee may come thither full satisfied, because he hath nourished and mainteyned vs, and shewed vs that our true life and cuerlasting happinesse is prepared for vs aboue.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too vouchsafe to touch vs with them more and more, that we may come to him with true repentance to frame our sel-

ues after his righteousnesse: and that forasmuch as we be wretched sinners, and wrapped and ouerwhelmed in so many temptations as it is impossible for vs to discharge our selues of the hundred part of our dutie, it may please him to ayde vs with his holy spirite, and too beare with our infirmities and imperfections, vntill he haue quite & cleane rid vs of them. And so let vs al say, Almighty God heauenly father, &c.

All prayse, honour and thankes be vnto God.

¶ The prayer which master Iohn Calvin made ordinarily before the beginning of his Sermons.

Let vs call vpon our good God and father, praying him too vouchsafe too turne avway his face from the great number of faults and offences, vvheryby vve ceasse not too prouoke his vvrath against vs: and forasmuch as vve be too too vnworthie to appeare before his maiestie, it may please him to looke vpon vs in the countenance of his vvelbeloued sonne our Lorde Iesus Christ, accepting the desert of his death and passion, for a full recompence of all our sinnes, that by meanes thereof he may like vvell of vs, and vouchsafe to inlighten vs by his spirite, in the vnderstanding of his vvord, and graunt vs the grace to receyue the same in true feare and humilitie, so as vve may be taught therby to put our trust in him, to serue and honour him by glorifying his holy name in all our life, & to yeeld him the loue & obedience vvhich faithful seruants owe to their maisters, and childrē to their fathers, seing it hath pleased him to call vs to the nūber of his seruants & children. And let vs pray vnto him as our good mayster hath taught vs to pray, saying. Our father, &c.

Let vs fall dovne before the face of our good God, &c. (Here he addeth as the matter treated of in his sermon, giueth him occasion to require at Gods hand, and because the same chaungeth almost in euerie Sermon, it cannot here be specified.) That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darknesse, to the right vvay of saluation, for the doing vvheryof it may please him to raise vp true & faithfull ministers of his vvord, that seeke not their ovvn profit and vainglorie, but onely the aduancement of his holy name, and the vvelfare of his flocke: and contrariwise roote out all sects, errors, and heresies, vvhich are feedes of trouble and diuision among his people, to the end vve may liue in good brotherly concord all togiether: and that it may please him to guide vvith his holy spirite, all kings, princes, and magistrates that haue the rule of the svvorde, to the end that their raigning be not by couetousnesse, crueltie, tyrannie, or any other euill & disordered affection, but in all iustice and vprightnesse, and that vve also liuing vnder them, may yeelde them their due honor and obedience, that by the meane of good peace and quietnesse, vve may serue god in all holinesse and honestie: and that it may please him to comfort all afflicted persons, vvhom he visiteth after diuers maners vvith crosses and tribulations: all people vvhome hee afflicteth vvith plague, vvare or famin, or other his rods: and all persons that are smitten vvith pouertie, imprisonment, sicknesse, banishment, or other calamitie of body or vexation of mind: giuing thē all good paciencie, till he send them full discharge of their miseries: and specially that it may please him too haue pitie vpon all his poore faythfull ones, that are disperfed in the captiuitie of Babilon vnder the tyrānic of Antichrist, cheefly vvhich suffer persecution for the vvitnessing of his truth, strengthening them vvith true constancie, and comforting them, and not suffering the vvicked and rauening vvoules to execute their rage against them, but giuing thē such a true stedfastnesse as his holy name may be glorified by them both in life and death: and finally that it may please him to strengthen all Churches that are novvadayes in daunger and assaulted for the quarell of his holy name, and ouerthrow and destroy all the deuises, practises and attempts of all his aduerfaries, to the intent that his glorie may shine ouer all, and the kingdome of our Lorde Iesus Christ be increased and aduanced more and more: Let vs pray him for al the sayde things in such vvise as our good master and Lord Iesus Christ hath taught vs to pray, saying: Our father, &c.

Also let vs pray our good God to giue vs true continuance in his holy faith, and to increase it from day to day, vvhereof vve vvill make confession, saying: I beleue in God the father, &c.

The blissing of the people after the Sermon.

The grace of God the father, and the peace of our Lord Iesus Christ through the felovvship of the holy Ghost dwell vvith vs for euer. Amen.
